QUEEN'S GROWS, BUILDINGS RISE

Queen's
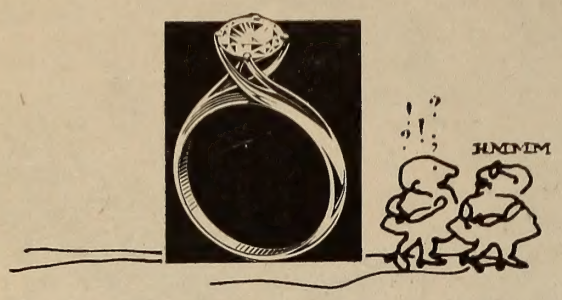
vol. XCIX no. 1 Thurs Sept 16 1971

Queen's is bigger than ever this fall, with more students, more freshmen, new buildings under construction, and a new tradition which goes into effect Saturday.



The tradition is the student parade to the new west campus stadium; see the story on page 3.

The freshman class numbers a record 1771. As of Tuesday morning, there were 282 applied science freshmen and 160 in commerce. The combined orientation programme had 1329 freshmen signed in, of whom 1243 are in arts and science, 50 in nursing, and 36 in rehab therapy. A few later arrivals were expected, and some freshmen, chiefly mature students, were not participating in orientation.

Enrollment as a whole will also be up this year. For the first time full-time enrollment was expected to exceed eight thousand. Figures from the office of academic planning showed a probably full-time enrollment of 8728, of whom 4043 would be in arts and science.

Construction is going on across campus and more is due to start soon. The mining engineering building, south of Dupuis Hall, was delayed by a plumbing contractors' strike during the summer and will not meet its scheduled December completion date, but the departments of mining

Saturday parade will open new Richardson Stadium

View of new Richardson Stadium on west campus

The new George Richardson Memorial Stadium will be opened Saturday with a parade and dedication ceremonies just before the Golden Gaels play the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees.

A guest at the dedication will be the honourable James A. Richardson, federal minister of supply and services, and son of the man who donated the original stadium to Queen's in honour of his brother.

Richardson will speak at the dedication ceremonies before the game, and will perform an honourary kick-off, assisted by Ron Stewart, formerly half-back for the Gaels and later the Ottawa Rough-Riders.

The old Richardson Stadium, north of Victoria Hall, was built in 1921 in honour of George T. Richardson who was killed in the First World War. The Gaels played forty-six season in it (there was no football during World War II) and won league championships for almost half of them.

In addition the old stadium was the site of pep rallies, frosh gatherings, and several university convocations.

In 1936 Franklin D. Roosevelt received an honorary degree from Queen's at a convocation in the stadium, and in his address made a historic promise of United States protection for Canadian independence.

The stadium is undergoing demolition, which began last spring after years of rumours, to make room for the arts-social sciences complex which is to be built on the site.

A plaque which was attached to the west stands has been moved to the new stadium, where a second plaque will explain the move, fifty years after the first stadium was built.

There will be flag-lowering at the old stadium at 12:45 Saturday, following a noon pep rally jointly sponsored by the Queen's Bands and the joint orientation committees. Chancellor J. B. Stirling will speak briefly at that ceremony.

A final oil thigh will begin the parade, which will follow Union Street and Sir John A. Macdonald Boulevard to the new stadium site. The parade will be led by the pipe band and then four girl cheerleaders carrying sod from the old stadium site, which will be laid in place on the west campus, and a 1920's football.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18

Living with Queen's . . .

Welcome to Queen's, frosh and other newcomers.

Whether you stay here a few weeks, a year, four years or a lifetime, what happens to you in this place will have an important effect on what you become.

At worst, when you leave here you could be pretty much the same as when you came, which would mean your time here would have been wasted.

You could leave embittered and frustrated, which might appear to be a sane reaction to what Queen's is, but would more likely indicate that you did not try very hard while you were here.

You could leave with glowing memories of your days at old Queen's, of football games, friends, harried activities, classes made and missed and graduation. This type of reaction is what the Alumni Association seems to expect from graduates, since they play on such nostalgia when soliciting funds from graduates.

Perhaps you could even leave educated.

Education, of course, has little to do with classes, which will vary from the boring to the brilliant but which will mostly be forgotten. Rather, to be educated means that you will have come to a better understanding of yourself, of your abilities, strengths and weaknesses.

Of necessity, most of your education will take place outside of the classroom, if at all. The classroom is basic to the university's and the school system's concept of education, which is imparting knowledge. The classroom concept, however, is impersonal and often either ignores or is unrelated to the need of an individual to know himself.

The school system, as well as Queen's, is bureaucratic, designed to process large numbers of students and not to deal with individuals, who are all exceptions to the rules upon which every bureaucracy is based. This does not mean that the Queen's bureaucracy is intentionally against your pursuit of an education; it simply means that it is poorly suited to helping you acquire self-understanding and self-knowledge.

The university, however, is more than a bureaucracy for processing thousands of students and professors, more than classrooms courses, and books, more than knowledge. It is most importantly an aggregation of people, and it is because of this that some education may take place here.

Most of your education here will occur through your interactions with other people or through being alone. Through talking with other students in interminable rap sessions, through working with them on extra-curricular projects or on class papers, through talking to those profs who make themselves available (and there are many), and through sitting by yourself, thinking out why you are here or even feeling horribly alone in this what-at-times-may-seem-like a vast, empty, uncaring institution, you will learn about yourself.

Most of all, as you learn to come to terms with tiis place, which is many ways is a microcosm of society, You may become educated.

No matter how positively or negatively you may react to this place, however, you can always find other people who feel similarily and to whom you can relate. There is a vast variety of people here, from boors to bores to geniuses to fascinating types and just ordinary people and they all have something to offer in terms of experience.

There is really only one way your time here can be wasted and that is if you do not try to take advantage of what is here. Having tried, you can flunk out, quit, switch courses, or graduate any number of times and have gained something. Without the effort, you only lose a few years which could have been better spent.

. . .and a word on classes

The above is not intended to imply that classes are worthless. Most of them are far from worthless. In terms of acquiring information, learning about a subject, Or perhaps stimulating thinking, classes can be invaluable. They should be used for those three purposes though and not expected to supply education.

Moreover, what courses and which classes you take will have important effects for how well you stand up to the pressures of university life. Completing course requirements can be hard enough without having the added frustration of knowing that a course is meaningless or that you should have taken something else.

You have until October 15 to make your final decision on what courses you will be taking. This gives you at least four weeks of classes in which to attend lectures, perhaps talk to profs involved and to decide what you will take. Since many of the courses may be new to you (since they were never offered in high school) and since course descriptions in the calendars usually sound more interesting than the actual classes turn out to be, it would be a good idea if you spent as much time as possible shopping around to find which courses you want and-or can handle.

This process, however, should not be drawn out any longer than necessary, since you could find yourself a month behind by October 15 in a lot of courses if you switch courses too often.

Don't be intimidated by the description (page 2 of the Arts calendar) of what must be done to change a course. It looks complicated, probably because department heads and advisors would prefer that you not bother switching, but the process is usually a simple matter of filling out a form (available in your department office) and getting it signed.

Chipping away at our civil liberties

The following editorial appeared in the Windsor Star Sept. 2.

Too many of Canada's citizens whose job it is to enforce the law, administer the police forces and legislate new criminal laws are drifting perilously close to extremist positions which can, if adopted by governments, lead us to the brink of repression.

Almost coincidentally these events have occurred:

Federal solicitor-general Jean-Pierre Goyer, the man who is in charge of the RCMP, has surreptitiously begun creating a new arm of the law which is euphemistically called a research and planning staff on internal security, and:

Quebec Solicitor-General Roy Fournier has suggested that Quebec (and presumably all provinces) should have the power to bring in its own "war measures act" when it feels its (democratic) institutions are threatened, and:

London, Ontario, Police Chief Findlay G. Carroll, president of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, told that organization's Calgary convention that identification cards should be carried by all citizens to help police in law enforcement.

Taken separately, these events may not seem like much, but taken in the context of increasing crime, particularly politically-inspired crime, such as that of last year's October Crisis, and the government's fear for the security of the state, these are very significant indeed.

They come on top of Quebec Justice Minister's Jerome Choquette's call for compulsory identification cards for Quebecers (who could be arrested for not carrying them) and his demands for the establishment of a Quebec secret police force.

They come on top of inaction on the part of the federal government to do away with the writs of assistance which give the RCMP the power to go anywhere without a warrant.

They come on on top of seemingly isolated events like the violence in the Gastown district of Vancouver where police conducted their own version of the 1968 Chicago police riot.

The mood in this country is one which endangers civil liberties. Public apathy has allowed this mood to fester.

That apathy, allowing those who would use repression to deal with social unrest, brings a reminder of all those Nazi-era good Germans who "didn't know what was going on."

engineering, metallurgical engineering and computing science, as well as part of the geology department, will be moving in there next spring.

Behind Agnes Etherington Art Centre, contractors are putting in sewers, plumbing, gas lines and heating pipes in preparation for construction of the new arts-social sciences complex which is to rise, starting this winter, on the site of old Richardson Stadium north of there.

The complex will take several years for completion over a number of stages; eventually it will link Watson, Ellis, Dunning and Macdonald Halls and provide a major centre of academics on campus.

Demolition of the old stadium went on over the spring and early summer, parallel with construction of the new stadium a mile to the west.

The platform party, students, and alumni will follow.

Richardson and other dignitaries will speak at the new stadium beginning at 1:50. The game is scheduled to begin at two o'clock.

There will be other events, including a reception sponsored by the alumni association in the gymnasium before the pep rally, and another sponsored by football old boys at McArthur Hall after the game.

Dedication ceremonies for the new George Richardson Memorial Stadium were arranged by a special university committee chaired by vice-principal (development and information) James M. Courtright. The student representative was bands manager Doug Romans.

It will be the first time in many years that orientation week has not concluded with a "Hello Kingston" parade along Barrie and Princess streets. Those parades, in which gaels (formerly vigilantes) escorted arts and science freshmen in their initiation uniforms, circled around and returned to the stadium site in time for the game. The distance to the new stadium makes a Princess Street route impossible.

Romans said he thought parades to the west campus could become an instant tradition on football Saturdays. The band will try to lead a parade out to the stadium for each game this season, he said.

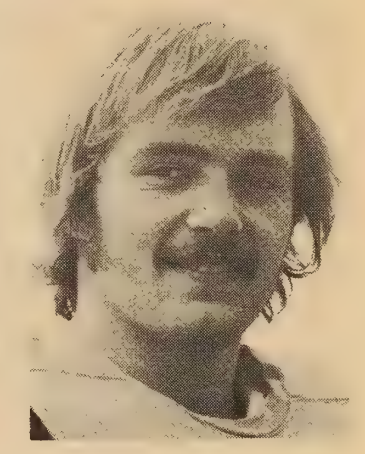
This year's frosh

Patricia Spence of Artsci 75 comes from Yellowknife, Northwest Territories, and is attending Queen's on a grant provided by the federal government to any NWT student who wants to attend university. After graduation, such students are expected to spend at least two years back in the north, helping to develop the country's resources.

Miss Spence said many students, afraid of the unknown outside the Northwest Territories, do not make use of the grants; but her father is a Queen's graduate and "ever since I was in grade two I knew I'd come to Queen's.



She said Queen's is big enough to be different from Yellowknife, but still small enough to have a personal touch. Queen's spirit reminds her of the pride Yellowknife citizens have in their city, she said.

Her father is a director of the newly-chartered University of the North, a "moving campus" which will bring university courses to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

Miss Spence is working for a B.Sc. degree in life sciences.

Dave Hadden, a six-foot, two-hundred-pounder out of Upper Canada College, is the best of a fine crop of Artsci 75 rookies now playing for the Golden Gaels. Described as "very tough" by Gael veterans, the big rookie has earned the starting fullback job on the strength of fine inside running and great desire. Hadden will be wearing number 27 this Saturday against the University of Ottawa.

Susan Coish, from Northern Secondary School in Toronto, was The Toronto Telegram's "Sweetheart of the Week" September 2. She is a talented swimmer, teaches swimming during the winter and was a camp counsellor — and swimming teacher — this past summer as well. The Telegram said she is a poet as well. Miss Coish is in Rehab 74 (physical therapy).

Peter Watts of Artsci 75 has become a core staff member of CFRC, the Queen's radio station. (At signing-in he divided his time between helping with the CFRC equipment and going downstairs to sign in.)

He may be a member of the team which does play-by-play on CFRC for Golden Gaels football this year. Watts is from Kingston and went to Frontenac Secondary School.

The dangers of killing time

by WILLIAM SHANNON

It is not astonishing that today's high school students regard history as the "most irrelevant" subject and that, according to Robert Reinhold, undergraduate history enrollment at leading (American) colleges has dropped as much as one third in recent years.

Ignorance of history and disdain for history are symptomatic of the malaise of today's youth culture and of the larger society which nurtured it. This malaise is the logical outcome of intellectual trends which began with the onset of the modern industrial age.

History is the accumulated burden of what men have done in past time. Time has always seemed the enemy of man since each of us is conscious of his own mortality.

When faith in a life after death began to wane with the Middle Ages, time became much more man's preoccupation. Yet since most people lived on farms or in rural villages, they had no choice but to order their lives by nature's ineluctable rhythms. It takes so much time for seeds to produce a crop, for vines to bear fruit, for animals to produce their young.

With the coming of industrialism, life became geared to the artificial pace of technology. At first, that merely meant that if one worked in a factory, one had to adjust oneself to the rate of the machine.

Gradually, however, the ever-accelerating inhuman pace of technology has invaded every domain of life. The values of the factory - efficiency, speed, total use of available resources - have become the values of the home and of leisure.

It is not simply that we refuse to accept the traditional tyranny of time, that we are impatient and unwilling to wait.

We set out unconsciously to kill time off. With incredible ingenuity, we began paring away at the time needed to do different things.

The consequences are now all around us. It is illegal to drive slowly on an expressway; the law commands a minimum speed. Railways and ocean liners decline while the jet plane races overhead.

The revolution in food-processing and packaging in the past 50 years is an attempt to prove that no meal, no matter how ambitious, requires time or painstaking preparation. This revolution has already produced bread that tastes like tissue paper and is twice as soft, chickens and turkeys with the flavour and texture of cellulose, and hamburgers like plastic wafers. Everything's pre-mixed and freeze-dried and instant. It may not taste very good but it saves time.

Television replaced books and radio as the dominant cultural force. It is often criticized for its violence and its banality. But television's most subtle debilitating influence is that it makes audiences passive and accustoms them to instant gratifications. There is not the investment of mental effort and of time which a serious book or a good newspaper requires.

The children of the television age see politics as a happening, a demonstration, a dramatic confrontation, They do not realize how much time and effort are needed to alter the character and direction of a large, mature, complex society. When one political drive fails, they despair and declare that "the system" has failed. Their despair, like the apathy of the hippie and the alienation of many middle-aged people, is a response to a world of undirected technology and unnecessary speed.

Resenting death, we murdered time. Now, time vanquished, we lie exhausted alongside our victim. Almost too late, we see that what we have slain is not time but our sense of ourselves as humans. Left alone with our machines, we know not how to wait, to prepare, to discipline and deny ourselves, Therefore, we know not the regjoicing which comes when we have reaped and consummated and brought to fulfillment, all in good time.

The fear of leisure

By ARNOLD TOYNBEE

Modern man dreads being solitary. After working hours, if there is no one else in the room, he turns on the television, takes some alcohol or perhaps some more noxious drug, puts himself to sleep with a sedative, and waits for the start of the next working day.

Of all the anesthetics that modern man has at his command, work is both the most respectable and the most effective, and for this reason it also easily becomes the most compulsive. A modern rich man will continue to work furiously, even when his earnings are 10 times as great as his needs. In financial terms he is now working for the tax-collector, but in psychological terms he is still working for himself.

Work is the sovereign anesthetic, and, for modern man, this is an inestimable boon. It saves him from the solitariness that he fears - and his fear is well-founded; for when a man is alone he is really alone least of all; he is then naked in the universe; he is face to face with God; and his confrontation is formidable.

Being a modern man myself, I have been a compulsive work-addict ever since I went to a boarding-school. I drugged myself with work at that stage in order to withstand the pressure of the school's primitive tribal way of life. The addiction has kept its hold on me, but I have been lucky. My work, like so many other people's, is partly a means of escape, but it is mainly an opportunity for following my bent.

For me, therefore, work is not drudgery; but I see many people round me who submit to drudgery thankfully because this is, for them, still a lesser evil than the loneliness that they shun.

What are we shunning? The contemplation of our human situation: this, I think, is what we dread. We have been brought into the world without our leave having been asked, and this world in which we have awoken to consciousness is alarmingly mysterious. We do not know why we are alive; we do not know that there is any reason at all for our existence. We do know that even the longest human life is infinitesmally short by comparison with the age of this planet and of the universe.

We also know that, brief though a lifetime is, it lasts long enough to make us aware that our world and we ourselves are full of faults. If a non-malevolent and responsible-minded human being had been an omnipotent creator, he would not have made nature - including human nature - anything like what it is.

This is disconcerting, and so is the paradox that a man, being conscious, is aware that he is going to die and abhors the prospect of death, though he knows that death is going to be the only complete release for him from the evils of life at which he repines.

The contemplation of our human condition has disturbed us ever since we became aware of our existence as individuals insulated from our corporate existence as members of a family or a tribe. For primitive man, the terror of the prospect of the individual's death seems to have been abated by the knowledge that he would leave living descendants behind him. This survival of death by proxy does not console modern man. He is an individualist and is perhaps also an agnostic.

Modern man therefore takes refuge in anesthetics, and most of all in the opiate of work, which keeps his thoughts away from contemplation by keeping his eyes fixed on the conveyor-belt or on the drawing-board.

Pre-industrial man could not take modern man's perennial refuge in work, for pre-industrial work was dependent on the seasons. There were not yet those wheels that can turn, in an artificially lighted factory, for 24 hours in the day. There were close seasons, in which the hunter or farmer or shepherd was, perforce, left alone with his thoughts, and, in the pre-industrial age, there were, in every society, some people who let their free minds turn to contemplation.

Contemplation is not a merely intellectual activity. Contemplation means facing the facts of our human condition. It means confronting the universe and God, and it is impossible to confront God without trying to put oneself into harmony with the ultimate spiritual reality, however difficult and terrifying this quest may be. Contemplation, in this active meaning of the word, is the activity that makes human nature human.

Our modern industrial civilization is unique, among all the various ways of life about which we have information, in being not only un-contemplative but also deliberately anti-contemplative.

It is also unique in the acuteness of its fear of death. The combination of this pair of distinctive traits suggest that the most effective way of dealing with the fear of death may be the traditional way, which was to look death in the face and to try to come to terms with it.

Meanwhile, our technology is advancing toward automation, and this is going to impose on us and our successors a far greater amount of leisure than was ever imposed by Nature on our predecessors. Work is going to become as rare an anesthetic as the most costly and most strictly prohibited drug. The great majority of us will have to get along without being anesthetised by factory-work or office-work.

When the work-avenue of spiritual escape has thus been closed, shall we recover the human faculty of contemplation which has been cultivated by other men in other times and places?

Re-activating a long-disused spiritual faculty is as difficult and painful as re-animating a long-disused limb. We cannot be sure that we shall succeed in this, even under the pressure of inescapable necessity. We can, however, be sure that, if we do not succeed, the automation age of modern history will be grim.

Hoechst thinks ahead

Moving with the Times

This year Canadian Hoechst marks its eighteenth year of growth in Canada by moving into new custom-built Montreal headquarters. The Canadian expansion has been closely linked to the worldwide development of Hoechst, which is now among the world's top five chemical companies, with worldwide sales that last year totalled approximately 3.5 billion dollars.

In Canada, sales have almost doubled in the past three years. The new St. Laurent head office and warehouse buildings will provide space for a 100% increase in the company's head office staff, and have been designed for expansion to accomodate increased Canadian production.

Research: Window to the Future

Today's research creates the products of tomorrow. One-third of Hoechst's current sales come from products which did not exist 10 years ago. And with worldwide sales approximating close to 3.5 billion dollars last year, Hoechst spent close to 100 million in pure research, and on laboratory buildings and equipment. The results of this investment decide Hoechst's position in future markets, including Canada.

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organization, Canadian Hoechst has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

This new building is just one of the more visible indications of Canadian Hoechst Limited's continuing investment in Canada.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the Company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. Hoechst likes it that way. So do their customers, here and around the world. Hoechst thinks ahead.

Applied Sexual Politics:

By LESLIE KAYE

Some of you women may have come to Queen's to acquire a meaningful degree instead of, or as well as, an MRS. It may be helpful for you to know the nature of the situation you may encounter when you want to apply your learning and training after graduation.

Kate Millett notes, in Sexual Politics, that the wage structure in North America (particularly the U.S.) places white men above black men, who are above white women, when it comes to earning an average annual income. Black women are in the poorest category. Millett states. "The disparity is made somewhat more remarkable because the educational level of women is generally higher than that of men in comparable income brackets. Further, the kinds of employment open to women in modern patriarchies are, with few exceptions, menial ill paid, and without status." In other words, women generally get the jobs men don't want to do -- the shit jobs.

Women in the work force are only necessary in times of war and expansion, and are discharged when the pressing need is gone, relinquishing their jobs to men. Even in socialist countries the people at the top of the bureaucratic hierarchies are male.

In today's society there is emerging a new conflict between the career woman and the housewife. Through the process of divide and conquer, this conflict may undermine any radical social change taat is necessary to place women in the position they deserve -- equivalence with men. Women and men can never be "equal" for the same reason you were taught in arithmetic that apples and oranges are not equal. They are separate entities, but science has not been able to prove anything but a biological difference. The emotional and intellectual differences are culturally bred.

(As an aside, our country will never be a democracy until women share with men the rights they should have. A democracy is government "by the people", something which cannot be in a country where women are conditioned to be unambitious in all fields, including politics.)

Few men seem to realize that by casting women in rigid cultural bonds, they bind themselves to stereotypes as well. The superficial definitions of "masculinity" and "feminity", based on domination and aggressiveness on one hand, and subjugation and passivity on the other, make imperious demands on both sexes to act in ways that may be far from their inherent natures. Human beings are born with varying personality traits which are either molded or distorted by their socialization. The social system as it now distorts these traits more than it molds them. There are virtually no personality differences based on sexual characteristics exhibited by a child until he-she is about 18 months old -- the age when she-he begins to acquire the use of language. This would indicate that the behaviour differences show after that age are cultural. Little girls are no less aggressive than little boys until they are taught aggressiveness is "not nice," "unfeminine." (Aggressiveness is closely allied to ambition.) Older girls are taught that sciences, business, law, etc., are male perogatives. ("You'll never catch a husband studying that sort of thing.")

There is also a type of cultural lag between the policies of universities, who generally admit women, as students, into most fields, and the policies of industries, laboratories, etc., who often have discriminatory hiring practices. Those fields designated as "female professions" -- teaching, nursing, physiotherapy, and such, of course hire women, but it is unlikely that their jobs will have responsibilities at the administrative or executive level.

So be prepared to have to fight the subtle negative social attitudes that try to keep you from following your chosen career (eg., your boyfriend doesn't think you should be an engineer) and also be prepared for a fight when you demand job and wage parity when you leave here. If you so desire, plan to be a well-educated and well-rounded housewife and mother.

But let it be your choice. Don't let anybody else plan the future you have to live with. As a university woman you can prove that a woman can be intelligent, independent, and very attractive too.

ACCIDENTS CAUSE PEOPLE

It has been rumoured that there were about 40 un-wanted pregnancies last year. These pregnancies are not only unwanted but also completely unnecessary. The policy of the campus Health Service (on Stuart St., right beside Chown Hall) is that birth control information is readily available, and that, if the patient will undergo the complete examination required by the Food and Drug Administration, and there are no medical contraindications to the pill, the doctors at Health Service will supply any girl, on demand, with birth control pills. If other methods are indicated (for example, the loop) referal to a gynecologist will be made.

Pick up the handbook, Modern Methods of Contraception, at registration and don't be afraid to go to Health Service if you need information or help.

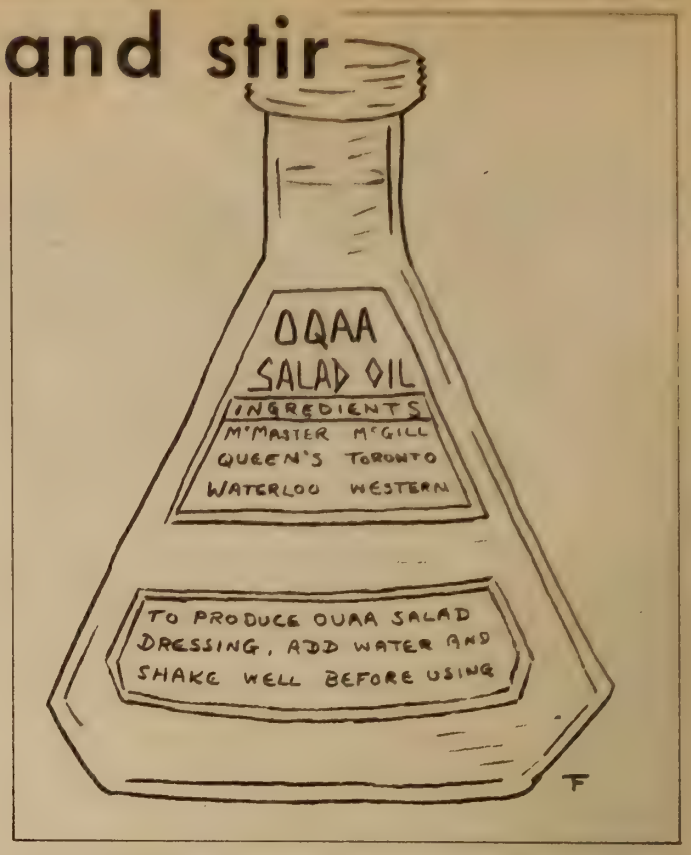
Just add water and stir

By JIM WRIGHT



In scanning last weekend's football scores, loyal O.Q.A.A. fans may have noticed a few new teams and at least one wierd score. Unfortunately, this wasn't exhibition football; it was the beginning of the O.U.A.A. (Ontario Universities Athletic Association). Certainly O.Q.A.A. wasn't the greatest league on earth (McMaster and Waterloo saw to that) but, (with the aforementioned exception) it was a strong, well)balanced league which, for the years provided good football. So what happened?. Due to the incredible number of changes we have elected to answer this question one sport at a time; beginning with football the, believe it or not, least complicated.

The new O.U.A.A. is divided into two sections, East and West each consisting of two divisions. The East Section includes the Capital Division, Queen's, U. of Toronto, and Carleton; and the East Division: Laurentian York and U. of Ottawa. Sure enough, when the smoke cleared one of the Western most universities ended in the Eastern division. The Western Section is composed of the Central Division : McMaster, Guelph and Waterloo Lutheran, and the Western Division :Windsor, Western and Waterloo. Meanwhile, McGill has been left to trample the little colleges in Quebec in the name of the sanctity of the new Q.U.A.A.

Using the teams in the Capital Division as an example, the schedule for each division goes like this. Toronto, Carleton, and Queen's will play a home and home series against each other, one game against each team in the Eastern Division (the other half of the Eastern Section) and a game against one team from the Western Section. Simple!

The playoffs are more complicated. If the sun sets at 6:45 p.m. Oct. 21, the wind blows south to Detroit and Trudeau stays in Ottawa for a week, the first place team of East plays Central and West plays Capital. Otherwise, the first and second place teams in one division could both be in the playoffs. We'll explain this later.

With such an ingenious system, it seems ludicrous to second guess the organizers but we can't help wondering why there was no allowance for talent.

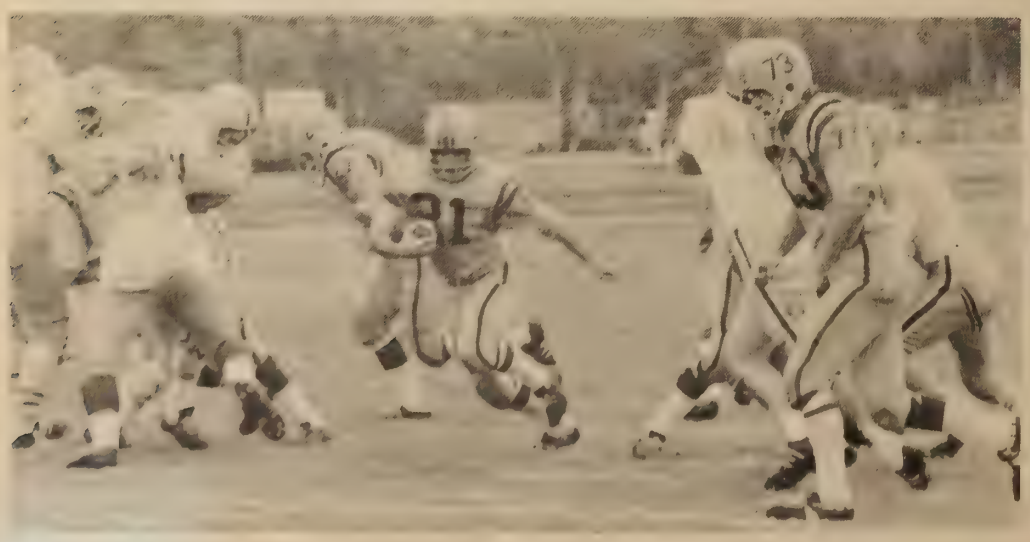
Voyageurs welcome Gaels

By JIM WRIGHT

The Gaels opened the 71-72 Season in Sudbury Saturday with a convincing victory.

The game was close for the first five minutes as the Gaels and Voyageurs twice traded downs. Then the Gaels began to gain momentum. First, Doug Cozac slit the posts for three points. Then, four plays later, Bill McNeil ran a punt back to the one yard line. Brian Warrender went through the formality of running the point over the goal line for the first of the four touchdowns which he managed to collect during the sixty minute romp.

Another convert made the score 10-0.



Again Laurentian punted to the Gaels for another scoring lesson. The Gaels used the final two plays of the quarter to set up for a score and promptly sent Gord McLellan over to start off the second quarter. Another convert made it 17-0.

The Voyageurs had their hands on the ball for three more downs before the Gaels were allowed to stage another stroll into the end zone. This time the Gaels started at their 42 and took nine plays to send Warrender over from the three yard line. Cozak made it 24-0 with another accurate kick.

On their last set of downs in the half, Laurentian punted to Stu Lang, allowing him to show his running ability in returning the ball to the Voyageur 24. A touchdown pass from Tom Taylor to Alex Melvin was nullified by a Gael offside. However, the pass was tried again and completed to the three yard line where Gord McLellan carried the ball over for the second of his three touchdowns. Cozac missed - blocked.

Half time score - 30-0.

The second half was more of the same, featuring fine Cozak converts, touchdowns by John Booth, Gord McLellan, Brian Warrender and Doug Hadden for Queen's. It also featured an 11 play drive, including a fake punt, which brought the Voyageurs their only score. The convert was blocked by an angry defense and the final score was 65-6.

Dean of women chosen

Mrs. EvelynReid will become dean of women at Queen's on November 1.

She succeeds Mrs. Beatrice Bryce, who retires after eleven years as dean. Mrs. Bryce was to end her term of office at the end of August, but has remained for two months because of the delay in finding her successor.

Mrs. Reid is now at Columbia University, New York, as executive secretary of the Center for Religion and Life. The Center has been a spawning-ground for student initiatives at Columbia this ear, according to Dr. Jim Whitley of Queen's who was chairman of the committee seeking a successor for Mrs. Bryce.

And, he said, Mrs. Reid's position there enabled her to help reduce tensions during the 1968 disruptions when Columbia was closed down for days by radical action.

Mrs. Reid has spent most of her life in universities, Whitley said, but she has also worked with youth in Harlem, where her husband was an Episcopal (Anglican) minister.

The committee of which Whitley was chairman, set up to find a successor for Mrs. Bryce, included principal Dr. John J. Deutsch, Miss Jean Hill (dean of the school of nursing), Dr. T. Stewart Webster (dean of student affairs), and three students — Vicki Gilliatt, then president of Women's Residence Council, AMS vice-president Janet Rogers; and Arts and Science Undergraduate Society vice-president Jocelyn Cote.

There were many responses to the advertisements the committee put in professional journals asking for applicants for the deanship. But it took the committee several months to reach a decision.

In early August the committee met with Mrs. Reid while she was in Kingston visiting her daughter, Susan Kilblank, who is a caseworker for the city welfare department.

The members decided she was the most capable person to deal with the job, both in residences and in the community in general.

She will have two offices on campus— one in Victoria Hall, as did Mrs. Bryce, and one in the new student affairs centre at 165 University Avenue, intended to help keep her in touch with the university outside residence.

Mrs. Bryce is retiring from her deanship but will continue to teach in the department of English. She became dean in 1959, the year Chown Hall was opened, and saw the number of women in residence grow from about 250 to almost 1100.

A reunion of former dons and other residence students, held in Victoria Hall in mid-June, presented Mrs. Bryce with her first hot-pants outfit and, as a special token of the position she has held on the Queen's campus a grandmother clock.

Hoff! Hoff!

A hellible horralump! AMS goes into business

During the summer the Alma Mater Society (the student government) went into business on a big scale, with the opening of the Heffalump boutique, a summer food stand, and a house rental programme...

These projects, as well as the student pub, the Student Typing Service, and Job Bank will be amalgamated into a wholly-owned AMS subsidiary to be called Queen's Student Agencies.

AMS vice-president Victor Bradley said that QSA does not exist at this time, but that at tonight's AMS meeting he will present a by-law amendment which would establish it.

He said the QSA projects are being run on the authority of inner council at present , but will all become part of QSA when outer council approval is finally given.

While there is no QSA, there have been two QSA directors. Marcia Barber of Commerce 72 held the position for most of last year and did much of the groundwork. She was succeeded by former AMS vice-president Peter Griffiths in March.

In a report to the summer meeting of outer council, Griffiths outlined the reasons for the establishment of QSA, AS AN OUTLET "to provide for summer and part-time employment for students and to provide services to the citizens of Kingston at the most reasonable prices". In addition, he said QSA was a way of providing "closer relationships between the people of Kingston and Queen's University".

Under Bradley's proposal, QSA will be run by a board of directors, three of them appointed by the AMS outer council, subject to recall. The director and a non-student member would be elected by the board; the sixth member, an assistant director, will be elected by project managers.

Bradley said QSA is not intended to make money in the long run. The only financial commitment to the AMS will be for the repayment of any capital investment made in the various projects and services. After that repayment, any surplus would be used to defray expenses in non-revenue-producing services.

Bradley also said he expects some of the surplus to be used to raise wages and lower prices, and as self-funding capital for any other projects QSA might undertake.

The food service operated this past summer, selling ice cream and sandwiches on the plaza between Jeffery Hall and Agnes. It employed three students, but lost $1,800 because of poor weather and an unsuccessful venture selling food at a local swimming hole.

The housing service is an expansion of the "new house co-op". The AMS rents some twenty houses from the university and sublets them to students. The number of houses is expected to grow, but it will fluctuate as the university needs land for future expansion.

There has been a waiting-list for renting the houses during most of the summer. Bradley said that in the long run the house rental programme should net two to three thousand dollars per year.

Job Bank, a clearing house for summer employment, placed about 250 students in 400 jobs for part or all of the summer. It was financed by a grant from the university this year, but in future will have to be supported by a surplus from other QSA operations.

The pub, The House of Commons, has been in operation for two years. It will expand this year into the second-floor common room in the Union, which will provide common-room space in the daytime and pub space in the evening.

The pub renovations will require an AMS capital investment of ten thousand dollars. (The original investment in the pub was fourteen thousand dollars, half of which was paid by the university. About $3500 of the remaining investment has already been paid off from pub operating profits.)

The typing service has been run for a number of years by the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society. It is being sold to the AMS for the between $2000 and $1500. One new policy being instituted by the AMS is the installation of two xerox machines of different sizes, to provide better photocopying service than the machines in the library, and low-cost copying service as well.

The Heffalump is a boutique started at the beginning of this summer to provide an outlet for student crafts. It is located at 231 Princess Street (formerly Colette's). Now in operation, the Heffalump (the name may be changed, its manager, Jane Corkin, says because of copyright restrictions), sells a variety of student crafts handmade sandals, and some box stock on a consignment basis.

The AMS has about six thousand dollars invested in the Heffalump; the investment is expected to be paid back within the next two years.

Besides Griffiths and Miss Corkin, QSA administrators this summer were Bob McFarlane (housing); Greg LeBlanc (ub); and Pat Devitt (food stand).

Library liberates books

Douglas Library put a computer circulation system into effect July 1, reducing paperwork and filing time on the records for about 225,000 books. The books changed over to the new system first were those with usual heavy use, mostly social sciences and humanities.

The old paper filing system is still in use as a back-up to the computer system. But the time the new method saves enables library staff to spend more time on reader services such as searching for missing books.

The time taken to check out a book will be reduced by about half. Students will also find that a list at the circulation desk and on each stack level which shows what books are out and when they are due back.

Automatic processing of loan records means overdue notices will come more promptly. Loan periods remain the same — one week for undergraduates, four weeks for graduate students, and four months for staff — but library administration and and the senate library committee will soon be reviewing these, according to associate librarian Ted Phillips.

Douglas Library has also moved 14,000 more books onto shelves in the reserve reading room where they are accessible. These are uncatalogued books, the famous "backlog" which has been waiting in the basement for staff to process them. The books are arranged by numbers, keyed to the card catalogue, and can be borrowed for standard loan periods (using the old paper circulation system). The backlog, Phillips said, is the result of cataloguing inefficiency because technical staff are scattered over four floors of the library. But the books will be available for use even before they have been fully processed.

The cataloguing division of Douglas Library, headed by Miss Elizabeth Skeith, is making inroads into the rest of the backlog, Phillips said. The remaining 35,000 books unprocessed should be available by October 1, he explained, and after that the processing staff will concentrate on keeping up with new books as they arrive.

Douglas Library has announced the following hours for the fall term:

Monday to Thursday, 8.00 a.m. to 1.00 a.m., Friday, 8.00 a.m. to 11.00 p.m., Saturday, 8.45 a.m. to 11.00 p.m., Sunday, noon to 1.00 a.m. After 11.00 p.m. Sunday to Thursday, 5.00 p.m. Friday and Saturday, only the circulation desk, reference room and purple room will remain open. Periodicals, documents, archives, reserve room and other special departments may have further restricted hours.

Planner proposes university centre

Detailed plans for a $7.5 million university centre, to be built at Union Street and University Avenue, will come before the Queen's board of trustees when it meets next month.

The centre would rise in several stages and over several years, on the northwest corner of the intersection, which presently is the site of the 131 'union Street temporary building, the Dunning Hall Annex, and several private houses.

Reports produced by the University Centre Panning Committee, appointed last year, and by an outside planner both recommend building a university centre on that site as soon as possible. They also emphasize renovation of the existing Student Union as a major part of the new centre, and recommend establishment of several "sub-centres" across campus.

If the board of trustees approves the idea in principle, detailed planning will go ahead.

An informal users' committee for a university centre was set up during the summer by consultation between principal Dr. John J. Deutsch and AMS vice-president Victor Bradley. That committee will become official once the trustees give their approval.

The major planning study was done for the university centre planning committee by Toronto architects Parkin, Searle, Wilbee and Rowland.

It says the first phase of construction should be "accommodation for primary centre users" in a new building of about 66,000 square feet. Such users would include a bookstore and other retail outlets, food services, lounges, offices for student groups, and alumni facilities. This phase would cost about $3.4 million, the report says.

Parkin recommends that the second phase be renovation of the existing Union at a cost of $1 million.

The Union would be connected to the new building by tunnel. Some of its present space would allow expansion of recreational facilities in the Phys Ed Centre. Reading rooms and the student awards office would occupy more of the space. The major use would be what the report calls "major spaces" for multi-purpose use — dances, large meetings, and forums.

Offices and clubrooms would occupy the renovated basement of the old Union.

Parkin's suggested third phase, costing $3 million, would include more office, service and retail space in the new site, as well as a Recital Hall and mixed-media theatre.

According to the report, sub-centres are intended to "knit the campus together". These would include social space in the new arts-social sciences complex; the art centre and the new music building which is to rise just west of it; a lounge and reading-room area linking Douglas library with Gordon Hall and including the present library terrace; extensions to the drama facilities in Theological Hall; and major renovations to Ontario Hall.

The report says Ontario Hall is "uniquely historic", the architecture of the main campus has been largely planned in proportion to this old building. Parkin recommends that it be entirely renovated, adding one level to make it a five-, not four-storey building

Ontario Hall would then contain the departments of art history and film studies.

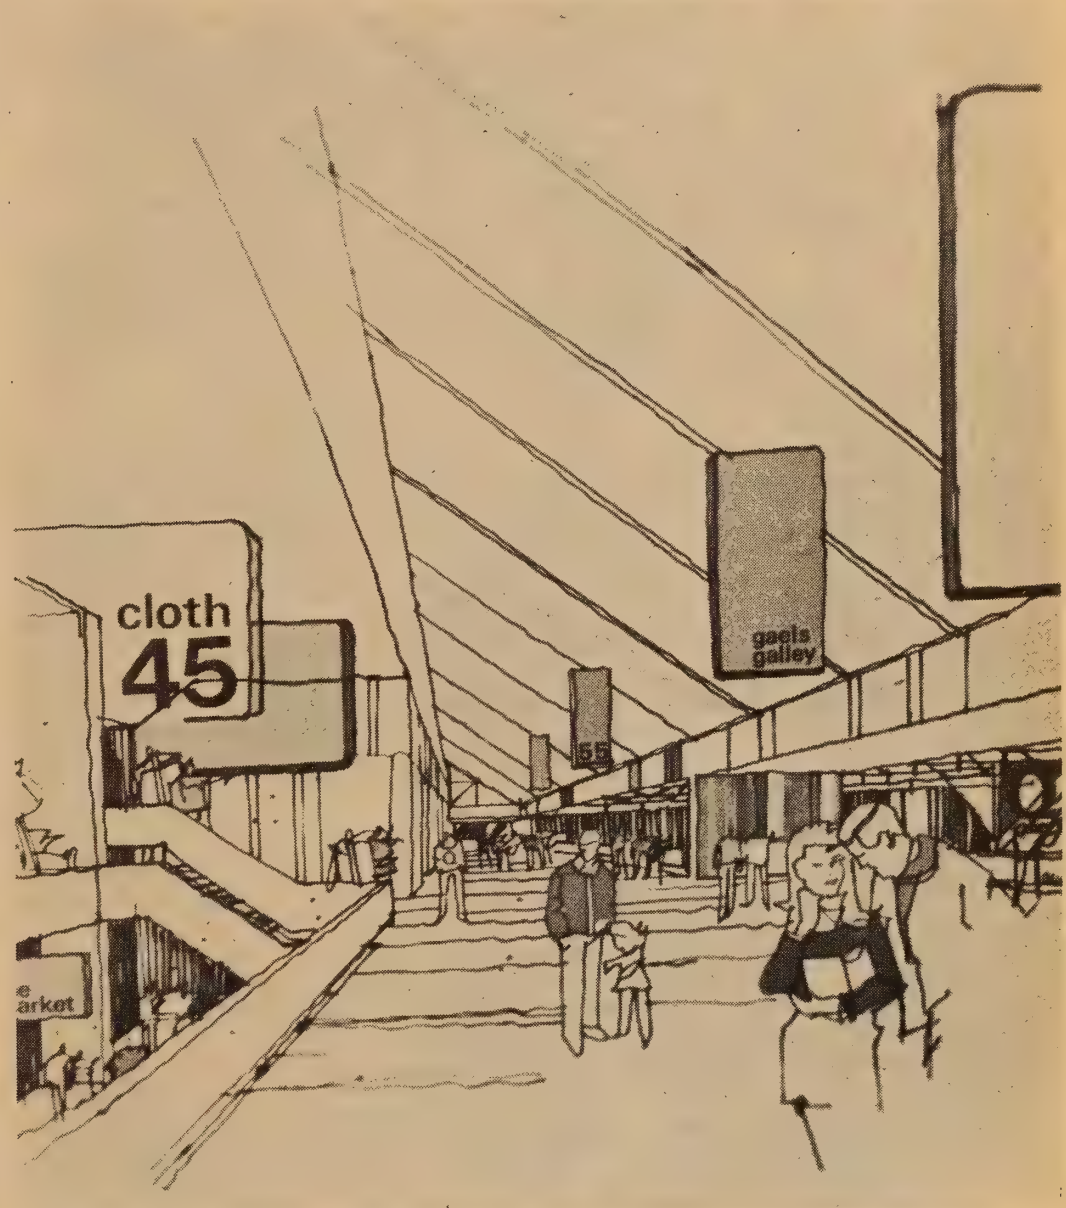
The Parkin proposals are by no means final. The board of trustees will probably discuss them in general terms before making any decisions to go ahead with a university centre project.

An architect could then be appointed and the users' committee made official.

One feature of the university centre, as the Parkin consultants visualize it, would be a mall running north-south through the centre of the new building. This "street" wold be lined with retail and service outlets.

North of the university centre itself, in the same block south of Earl Street, the Parkin report proposes "high density student housing" and parking for 250 cars. To the east, between University Avenue and Division Street, would be open or park space.

Building the university centre in this area, and including a city block of open space, is part of a "campus zoning" proposal first published as an appendix to the Parkin report.



This zoning outline shows eventual main campus expansion as far north as Johnson Street between Barrie and Alfred Streets, with applied science buildings occupying most of the space north of Union Street other than what the university centre would use. Dupuis Hall and the new mining engineering building are the first phase of expansion in this direction.

Arts and social sciences would be concentrated west of University Avenue around the arts-social sciences complex. The "historic core" of the campus would be devoted to earth and life sciences.

Queen's has never officially adopted a master plan; until the last few years construction was planned on an ad hoc basis. A. "proposed master plan" from the office of the university campus planner was produced in September 1970, roughly indicating areas for academic and service buildings; but it took no notice of the arts-social complex, now a fait accompli to be built starting this winter where old Richardson Stadium stood.

And it indicated Leonard Field as "residential" areas but Victoria Hall as "recreational".

The residences are, in fact, included by Parkin in a list of "satellite locations" where non-academic functions take place. Also on this list are the faculty club, Grant Hall, Dunning Hall, and the west campus theatre and stadium.

AMS says students should vote in Kingston next month

The inner council of the AMS has urged Queen's students to vote in Kingston, not at their parents' homes, in the October 21 provincial election.

AMS vice-president Victor Bradley said this policy was agreed on at a conference Friday among student council leaders from eight Ontario universities.

The student presidents called on chief provincial returning officer Roderick Lewis to clarify the new provisions of the Election Act under which students can vote by proxy at the cities they consider their permanent homes, if they are attending university too far away to return on election day.

Lewis issued a statement Saturday saying that it was a students own decision whether his parents home or the place he lives while at university is his real residence.

University dormitories will be enumerated like any other dwelling-place, Lewis said.

Bradley said Sunday that the Chief Returning Officer for Kingston and the Islands, the riding in which Queen's is located, had agreed that Queen's residences would be enumerated.

He said enumerators usually ask three questions: Are you over eighteen years old? Are you a Canadian citizen (or British subject)? And where do you live?

Students who indicate that Kingston is their permanent address would presumably be put on the voters' list for this riding, Bradley said.

He added that, since polling places are usually arranged wherever there is a concentration of voters, it would probably be possible to vote right at Leonard Field or Victoria Hall.

In the past, Queen's has been included in a subdivision whose resients voted at the Frontenac County courthouse. But before the channge in the age of majority, few people who lived on campus were eligible to vote.

Bradley said a student who is enumerated, either in a residence or in a house or apartment, would be eligible to vote in this riding.

A student who prefers to vote in some other riding, such as the one in which his parents live, can write a letter assigning his vote by proxy to a friend or relative in that riding. The friend may then obtain a certificate from the chief returning officer there and vote on behalf of the student.

The AMS will be advertising to urge that students who consider Kingston their real home, whether or not they stay here year-round, give Kingston as their permanent address when the enumerators ask.

This would represent students better, Bradley said, and also improve understanding between the university and the rest of the city, by giving students a common interest and representation with other residents.

Kingston and the Islands is one of several ridings which may be extensively affected by a large student vote. The riding of St. Andrew-St. Patrick, in which the University of Toronto is located, probably would also swing with the student vote.

Use of frosh 'spies' should be stopped

For the second year in a row, two 'spies' were planted in Gael groups during frosh week.

These fake-frosh went through all the activities of the week with the other frosh in order to provide ASUS with first hand information about how the frosh reacted to the programme. Most of the Gaels did not know of the presence of these 'spies' and a few who found out were angered by the practice and objected to the element of deceit involved.

We, too, find the practice objectionalble and feel that it should not be continued next year, not only because it is a deceiving practice but mainly because the use of such infiltrators, for whatever purpose, accustoms people to a society in which it is acceptable to spy on our neighbours, a society in which we are always being watched.

The use of participant-observors has become a common practice for gathering information for social science research or governmental studies, as well as for gathering information for drug busts or for keeping track of potential subversives. Frequently, the activities of informers is carried on under the guise of social research and often information gathered for relatively innocent purposes falls into the hands of people who have no business seeing it.

As such activities become more and more common for 'acceptable' purposes like research, however, a climate is created in which it becomes easier for government agencies to use the same methods to keep track of those they dislike or those who disagree with government policies too vocally. Such activity has become so common in the United States that some protest meetings have been attended solely by infiltrators and such activity in Canada has been increasing through such things as the Youth Culture Study, or Jean-Pierre Goyer's special intelligence unit. The events of last October indicate that the federal government is only to glad to jail those who advocate sweeping changes in the system. In the face of such crack-downs, people could well become reluctant to criticize the government and would lose their basic rights to privacy and free speech.

It is obviously not being suggested that the use of two 'spies' in Gael groups will lead to government jailings of innocent people, but the basically unnecessary use of 'spies' in this instance could be one more step towards a growing acceptance of spying activities as normal.

By HENRY OTTINGER

As you know, I began the semester in a way that departed from the manner in which I had taught composition classes in the past. Much of my attitude at that time was influenced by Farber's book, "The Student as Nigger." On the first day of class, I READ TO YOU THE FOLLOWING:

"School is where you let the dying society put its trip on you. Our schools may seem useful: to make children into doctors, sociologists, engineers — to discover things. But they're poisonous as well. They exploit and enslave students; they petrify society; they make democracy unlikely. And it's not what you're taught that does the harm but how you're taught. Our schools teach you by pushing you around, by stealing your will and your sense of power, by making timid, apathetic slaves of you — authority addicts.

That sounded like a breath of fresh air back in February — and I suggested that we try to break the mold, that we could write papers on any subject we wanted, that we could spend class time discussing things, either "the burning issues of the day" or otherwise. You seemed to agree, and we spent time agreeing together that indeed Farber had the word, and we would do what we could to break the mold.

As you know, things went from initial ecstasy to final catastrophe. And recently I fell back — no, you forced me back — into assigning general topics. As a result of that action, and a lot of other factors, this semester has been the worst I have ever taught. In fact, I even debated with myself whether or not to go on teaching next year. But in some ways, the semester was valuable because I learned something, if you didn't.

Let me share with you some of the things I learned. Keep in mind that this does not apply to all of you but it does apply to the majority.

I learned that all this bull about "getting it together" or "working together" (be it for peace or a grade) is just that — bull. The 1950's were labeled by pop sociologists as "the silent generation." I assure you that they had nothing on you. Ten years ago, the people around the fountains wore saddle shoes, chinos and long hair. Now they're barefoot, wear Army fatigues and have long hair. Big revelation: it's the same bunch of people.

Generally, this class has been the most silent, reticent, paranoid bunch of people in a group I have ever encountered.

You had an opportunity to exchange ideas (which, if often turned out, "you have not got"), and you were too embarrassed to do so

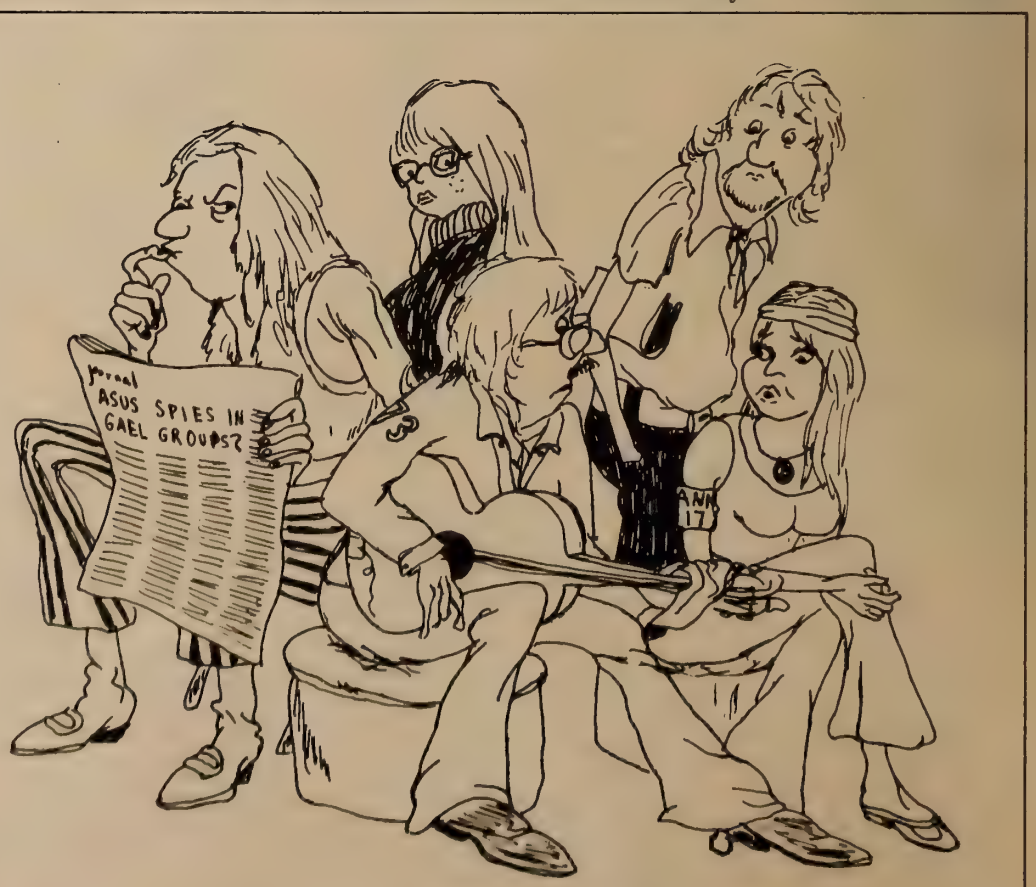
You had an opportunity to find out something about yourselves. This, by the way, is the crux of education. And as far as I can see, you found out very little.

You had an opportunity to explore ideas — on your own — and didn't. Most of the papers hashed over the usual cliche-ridden topics. One person went so far as to churn out a masterpiece on the pros and cons of fraternities, a topic that was really hot back in 1956

Most of all, you had the opportunity to be free free from the usual absurdities of a composition class where topics are assigned, thesis statements are submitted, and so on. You also had freedom of thought, as long as it was confined to the standards of formal English. You had the opportunity to be free — to be responsible to yourselves — and you succeeded in proving to me and to yourselves that freedom is slavery, a line from 1984 which I hope, for the sake of all of us, isn't prophetic.

But you protest (Oh, how I have wished you would): "We're incapable of handling all this freedom at once. You see, Mr. Ottinger, we've been conditioned; we're not used to all of this."

Well, I read that in Farber, too, and it's bull. Rats and dogs are conditioned, and are usually incapable of breaking that conditioning. Human beings can break conditioning, if it's to their advantage. But here it's too good an excuse to say, "I'm conditioned." Obviously, then it's to your advantage not to break out of the mold.



Why is it to your advantage? In short, why did the class fail?

It failed because thinking causes pain. And, like good little utilitarians, you want to avoid pain. It's so much easier to come up with instant esthetics, instant solutions, instant salvation, instant thoughts. After all instant things, like breakfasts and TV dinners, are easily digestible — and easily regurgitated — and not terribly nourishing.

One of the most nauseating remarks I have heard this semester is, "Gosh, college is no fun" or, when an idea is presented, "It doesn't turn me on."

If you don't believe that knowledge for its own sake is a valid and valuable goal, then you're in the wrong place, and you'd do much better in a vocational school, studying how to be a plumber or a beautician.

(This article was derived from a final lecture delivered by Henry F. Ottinger, an instructor in English and a doctors' candidate at the University of Missouri, and appeared in the New York Times on July 22).

NOTES:

These prices were gathered by a general survey during the week Saturday 11 to Saturday 18 (last week). Prices will fluctuate from day to day, from week to week, and from store to store. You may get a good deal if you watch the food ads run every Wednesday in the Kingston Whig Standard.

Most of the much-touted wholesale food stores do not save you that much money, and are fairly far away, so you must consider delivery and transportation costs over and above the prices of the goods. One food store that is fairly distant and has advertised that it is very good for its general food prices turned out to have more expensive tinned goods.

Ken and Ray's meat was cheap, and looked it. Some of the packages of hot dogs were green.

Bennett's meat was generally expensive, but of reasonable quality.

Bennett's and Dominion's lettuce heads were of good quality, Bennett's especially.

A & P offered bacon at 33 cents per pound but it looked like lard with small pieces of meat in it.

Any type of instant or white rice in any of the stores was too expensive to be worth buying. Besides that, white rice has neither taste nor food value.

Brown rice is not only cheaper, it is more flavourful and nutritious.

Ready-to-serve soups generally cost one and one half times the add-water-or-milk types. The convenience (?) of this type is probably not worth the expense.

Condensed from Last Post

Trhuoughout the summer, when so much of the attention given to youth in the media was concentrated on the federal Opportunities for Youth programmes and the report of the Committee on Youth, a special Youth Culture Study, done for the Department of Health and Welfare, managed to escape notice.

In many ways, it could be the most important, since in practice, if not intent, the project severely endangers the civil liberties of the people.

The project, which will cost about $500,000, employed about 200 young persons whose job it was to report on the personal, social and political habits and beliefs of anyone between the ages of 18 and 25, in and around 13 cities. Most of the information was to be gathered as these 200 workers moved among various groups of young people, talking to them and then making notes on what they found out.

As outlined in the instructions to Observers, the types information sought included such things as the following:

— "Find out, in the example of the bra-less female, why she is bra-less — is it a political reason . . . ? Do they see their particular style of appearance as an invitation to some people to interact with them. . . ?

— "(Find out) how a person provides for sexual needs — regular dating pattern, prostitutes, masturbation, hustling on the street, etc."

— Find out what are their aspirations. Are they within traditional institutions . . . or are they non-institutional such as — my biggest aspiration is to be a nice guy, a revolutionary, etc."

— "Is there a leader in the group (under examination)? . . . Try to note the intensity of his control over others — e.g., what he says goes and no-one would ever dare question his decision, etc."

— "What sort of literature do they read — comics, magazines . . . political books etc."

All this information, which ranges from the overly curious to a great deal which could be very useful to police and the RCMP should they wish to intensify their crackdown on political activists, goes into a central computer in the Health and Welfare office. Senior official in that office has said that the RCMP has access to Health and Welfare files.

In terms of tracing dissidents, the RCMP would certainly find a lot of information: specifics on political interests, dope and sexual habits, who thinks what and who influences whom.

Though the method of information gathering looks quite innocent, the instructions to the information gatherers makes it quite specific that the data collected is to be kept hidden and secret: "Upon leaving 'The Field' immediately proceed to a private or semi-private location . . . where you can transfer the essential items of the Observation to paper. (In case of extended Observations, it is recommended that this task be performed during, as well as after, the Observation, by retiring to the bathroom for a few minutes.)"

Observers are also warned: "Make certain you remove the previous day's notes from your pad before re-entering The Field: never return to The Field with your notes."

The project is planned to continue for no more than three years.

Experience vs rhetoric or, Welcome

An address by Eric Mann, B.A. (Cornell), SDS field worker, to the frosh at the University of W

I'm very happy to be here, but also in some ways very nervous.

And I'm thinking that a lot of the things I would like to say would be platitudes.

I would say things like "welcome" or "I'm sure you'll have four happy years at university", "that these are going to be the four happiest years of your life", and a lot of the other things people say when you come in as freshman.

One of the reasons I won't say it of course, is because I don't believe it. And another reason I won't say it is because it was said to me and it wasn't true.

There is another reason why I'm worried about speaking tonight. I have very mixed feelings about speaking to a group of people, many of who won't agree with a word I say. I guess that's o.k. because some of you probably won't agree with anything anyone tells you in the next four years, and you'll have about as little choice as you do this evening.

Now you at least have some choice this evening because there are no grades being given, but if you walk out, try to walk out quietly. Ill try and begin by talking about what happened to me, and try and explain what I think may happen to you. My parents never went to college. They spent a lot of time, talking to me about college. Now, they've probably never even seen the inside of a college, but they knew a lot about what it was like.

They told me that if I went to college that that would be a place where I would meet people who are getting together in quest of knowledge, a place where I would really broaden myself, learn a lot about the world, and make the kind of friendships that I could not make in high school, I would find college different, you're really going to like your work in college.

College was being held up as a very practical utopia. And so I went to school, I remember being very happy.

I said to myself "I'm going to really make it at this place. This is going to be the place where I'm going to find myself." What an expression! Finding yourself.

Well I don't know where it started to go downhill. Six weeks after the school year started, some of the people got mid-term grades. And at the end of mid-term, a small percentage of the people were asked to leave. And so the dormitory I was in, became, a very scary kind of place, in some way maybe like a jail.

Ed Hogue, class of 64, left after six weeks to go back to Kingston, New York. I thought, well, somebody else will fill that room. We don't need him. We've got a lot of students here. He couldn't cut the mustard. Maybe somebody else can. Goodbye Ed, have a nice life. Then came first semester grades.

I remember first, grabbing my books and running into the library. Man, was I studying, 5, 6 maybe 7 hours a day, taking so many notes. I would write 7 pages of work and then write 10 or 11 pages of notes...

I remember trying very, very hard to do well, and having the sense that this was the place where I would prove that I was intellectual, if not superior, at least talented.

But many problems started to develop. found out something; something that took me four years to acknowledge. What I found out was that I didn't like to read and write too much.

I hope you like to read a lot, and I hope you like to write a lot, because that's what college is. Stripped of all the rhetoric. You get your books, you read a lot, you listen, and you write.

Once in a while, you're not even allowed to talk. But the main thing, is that you'd better like books a lot.

You'd better be committed to the idea that reality is found in books, because the whole university system revolves around that concept.

If you like to sing, if you like to speak, if you like to organize, you can do that, it's called extra-curricular. It's not essentially valuable it's something that's needed to keep you busy and interested enough to go back to that essential task of more reading and writing.

Now, I think a lot of us wouldn't want to be here, if that was the definition of four years of our life. If you went up to the average person on the street and said "Hey, I've got something really good for you. Wanna come to a place where you spend four or five hours a day reading and writing? Sound great doesn't it?" How many people would spontaneously say "Wow", "That's exactly what I've been looking forward to doing for four years. How do I join?". "Oh, you don't join, you have to pay." "Oh that sounds good. I pay to read and write for five or six hours a day.".

Clearly the university was not based on a voluntary system. We weren't there because we found it rewarding. We were there for a whole series of different rasons. But very few of those reasons came from inside ourselves.

The reason was pretty clear why you went there, because when you got out you could say you went to Cornell. It really didn't matter what the hell you did for four years. You were paying to say you went there. And people competed to see how they could go there with the least amount of effort.

Cornell, you see is a big fraternity school. And I remember sitting with one of my friends saying "We don't want to join the fraternity because fraternities limit your individuality. Fraternities cut you off from other people. Fraternities are racially selective, they're economically selective. They're against everything we stand for." My friend said, "You're absolutely right."

We walked home together and two days later we were both in fraternities. The reasons were clear. We did have the option not to join, the analogies are not quite the same here, but I'm trying to get at some basic points.

Joining a fraternity protected you from the job of being a person. Instead of saying "Who's Eric Mann" and hearing "Well, I'm a lot of different things. You'll have to get to know me", by joining I could say "Tah Delta Fi". Now Tah Delta Fi may not mean anything to you; I.B.M. may not mean anything, and yet when you think about it, Buick, such and such a church or such and such a street mean something—they are ways we define ourselves.

They avoid the problem of being somebody. In fact, they say, "Don't you want to know who I am"? I drive that car. Don't you want to know who I am? I wear silk ties...

You can identify yourselves in many ways. But the main point is that these labels allow people to avoid having to be somebody. And in a certain way this makes it easier, because we don't have to worry about each other.

Looks are very important, because we all know we are living in a society where what things look like are considered more important than what things really are.

And so we see how certain things begin to be built in; about how we look at people, how we look at ourselves.

O.K. I went back to second semester. I started making little charts. "Well, if I get a ninty in this, no a 95 then I can afford a 70 in this. That will give me an average of 85. Boy, that sounds good. I think I'll get an 85 this semester.

So I would work out my projected goal, and I had the fantasy that this time things were going to be different. I remember that my first average was 79.8.

Now at Cornell, 79.8 was a very dangerous average to have because 80 was the lowest possible grade to have because that made you sort of smart. With anything below 80 you were then run of the mill. At 80 they would say, "Hey, he's a pretty good student". Now I went through a big identity crisis wondering if I should tell people that my average was really 79.8, because 79.8 was very different from 80. 80 is smart and 79.8 is "Oh, I see".

And either way I felt that a set of numbers had been developed to define who I was. I was now Eric Mann, Tah Delta Fi, 79.8. The second semester was worst than the first.

In the second semester, it was warm, and somehow I couldn't get into that 5 or 6 hours a day. Somehow I really liked the springtime. But there is a problem with that 5 or 6 hours if you like to walk around, and that is one of the most amazing things about college is that you're never finished.

You find that when you take an afternoon off, there's this cloud hanging over your head. "I am three weeks behind in Ec.-101".

Well, that's o.k. If you're not going to do your work, at least enjoy your afternoon. "Sure. But I'm three weeks behind in Ec-101. What am I going to do? So I found that I never enjoyed either work or leisure.

So I did the only logical thing. I went to sleep. I found myself sleeping eight, then ten hours.

My basic conclusion about college was that it's a pretty good place, but is just wasn't for me. I left Cornell the day after my last final—and I didn't go to graduation. And a very funny thing happened the next year.

The funny thing that happened the next year was a thing called "Berkley".

Now thousands of students at Berkley went around protesting on the issue of free speech. They began to talk about something called the multi-versity.

What they mean by multi-versity is me talking to you without knowing you, me talking through this microphone to hundreds of people, not one to one, not as a group, but as mass education, mass indoctrination.

The students began to say "Maybe" — they didn't say it to me but I knew they meant it . . . "Maybe Ithaca wasn't you fault. Maybe it's because that place stinks. Maybe that place wasn't built for human beings. Maybe you weren't the only guy sleeping. Maybe you weren't the only guy that hated that work. Maybe you weren't the only guy who wanted to leave in his freshman year but stayed three more years because the world needs that "piece of paper" as we are so often told.

Maybe we can't change things right away but at least what Berkley did for me was for the first time say to me, "You're a person and you count and an institution that makes you feel like shit, that is the bad institution, not you."

That changed a whole lot of my feelings, about myself and the society. I began to think maybe it wasn't just the university that didn't care about me. Maybe I could look around and see other things.

For years we have been telling black people that all they had to do was get integrated into our good world because we had the good life. But all of a sudden some of us discovered that the good life wasn't as good as we thought it was.

I want to talk about college as an extension of the kind of life that it's preparing us for. College in many ways is a very bad place. But it's a very logical place. And it's always bad things that make sense.

I remember being told by a teacher once, "You're doing very good work, keep it up."

Keep what up? Sitting at that desk for three hours — you know, sitting in a system of reward and punishment. Of course, there's the sympathetic principal who comes home to your parents and says, "Joan is a very promising student. But she just can't seem to apply herself. She just has no span of attention. Why don't you work with her?"

And so having been given that reinforcement, the parent begins to say, "Joan why are you such a discipline problem? Why can't you be a good girl like all the other girls?" So Joan begins to feel that there is a priority being placed on being a good girl.

A good girl is a quiet girl. A good girl is one who does the assignment.

"The profit system places us against each other."

The main main thing is that she wasn't writing these things because she cared about these guys. She was writing because a whole system of rewards and punishment had been set up.

So we can talk about what it's like to work in a school which produces people who do things not because it is important to do them.

Now, isn't this the same thing as working in a factory which produces televisions that are made not to work in about two or three years, even though we have a technology that could make them work for fifteen? Why do we make a television that we make last for 3½ if we can make it last for 15?

Well, the answer is clearly because we want to sell a lot of televisions.

Now you may ask "Who's we"? You say that we don't want to sell more televisions. They want to sell more televisions. They have a way of talking to "we" and it makes it seem that we're all working together.

Their argument goes like this. Look, if our t.v. lasts for 15 years, then we wouldn't sell a lot of t.v.'s. Therefore, if we don't sell a lot of t.v.'s, then you would be out of work. See, you have a vested interest in selling a t.v. that lasts for 3 years because that 15 year t.v. will knock you out of a job.

Now what kind of relationship is that to work? We've all been given that American myth about American Craftsmen.

Theroetically, a craftsman is one who makes things for other people. And yet, industrial society makes things for profit.

That's what I mean by things being logical — if you keep a system that's based on profit, they you might as well turn out your own televisions because it all makes sense. If you want $3.46 an hour or $4.12 an hour as a factory worker, they you have to accept certain compromises.

And what are the compromises? Well, in order to make $4.12 an hour, which is a very high wage, factory workers don't usually make that, you have to work in a company that's highly automated.

A highly automated company usually makes its money by breaking down the job into a lot of very small parts, and using a lot of technology. I met a girl who said to me, "That's a very nice toy." I said, "Thanks, I bought it for my daughter." She said "Yeh, I used to make them". I said, "Oh, you used to make this toy? It must have been a good job." She said, "Well, not really. I used to work in the inspection department." "You see, when you push the button in little Annie-Fanny's back, her right arm goes up and down like this. And my job was pressing the button four times. If it worked four times in a row, it passed inspection. If the arm stuck, it didn't.

That was her job. Eight hours a day. 5 days a week, 48-50 weeks a year, pushing that button, watching that button and that arm go up and down, up and down.

That's what we call "CRAFTMANSHIP" in America.

The steel worker wants steel that wears out and we want steel that lasts.

The butcher wants meat that's cheap and we want meat that's good.

The profit system places us against each other.

The profit system guarantees that work is going to be meaningless. And that just doesn't go for that particular worker.

Some of you may say, well yeh that's true, but you know how workers are." You say, "Yes sir, that's why I'm going to college, I don't wanna pour blood on meat, I don't wanna raise that arm, I want a job with real responsibility. I want a job that's going to make me somebody. I want a job with great insight and creativity. Yes sir, that's why you go to college."

Now let's talk about men and the few women who will take careers. The kind of careers that people take in business are being advertised today as very dramatic, very exciting, dynamic. But let's talk about it. You are a personnel director. You are told you have a lot of responsibility, a lot of freedom. But what kind of real responsibility do you have?Your have the responsibility to tell people what to do. What's your job? Your job is to get them to work harder.

Why? Because working harder makes more profits. You ought to read Business Week to see what the business men think about you.

For example, Business Week advertises that Feder's air conditioners should be used in the factory. Why? Because the days of the sweat shop are over.

Great. That's a really great idea. Maybe the bosses are getting a little more humane. But wait — why do we want Feder's air conditioners? Because do you know that cooler workers are happier workers? And happier workers produce more. And workers who produce more make more profits for the company.

So in fact, the only way you can sell a Feder's air conditioner to a factory is to tell people they'll have cooler, happier workers who will make more money for them by their increased production.

But the only way we can sell them is by selling them to people who see something in it for themselves.

But your job still is for you to do what the guy on top says and then tell the people under you what to do.

Now I imagine what a lot of you are saying is "He's interesting and kind of funny, but man he's so sick. He is so depressing. He's painting a distorted picture. In fact a lot of people aren't really that unhappy. I know a lot of people who beat the system. He's one of these professional revolutionaries who's trying to stir me up. He's trying to get me mad. I'm going to handle it. I'm going to make it. Some people don't make it. But I'm going to make it."

Now I'll just say that some of you will make it. But I think you'll make it in very limited terms. I think the only way you can make it under the present system that we both live under is by selling yourself short.

I think the only way you can make it is by saying that the idea of really doing what you want is Utopian — that the idea of really enjoying life all the time is a nice idea but isn't practical.

If you make those concessions then you're right. You will be happy because what each one of you has really said is "I don't really count".

What you're saying is "Despite the fact that we've been told that Canada is a democracy, down deep we all know that we can't change these God-damned countries. We know people more powerful than us make the decisions.

As a result, we don't even want to think about the kind of questions I'm raising, because if I'm right then that means what is expected of you — to help yourselves — is to become radicals.

Shinerama happens in Kingston this Thursday, September 23.

It is a nation-wide affair, in aid of cystic fibrosis, a birth defect which causes respiratory and digestive difficulties. While cystic fibrosis does not physically limit a child who suffers from it, the average lifespan for such a child is not more than sixteen years.

Money from Shinerama will be used for research into a potential new treatment, which now prolongs the life-span to twenty, and through individual chapters of the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation of Canada, to financially help parents of children with cystic fibrosis.

Shinerama is not the same event in which arts and science freshmen were shining shoes Friday; that was part of ASUS orientation's Charity Day for Camp Outlook.

Shinerama organizer Linda McDonald said volunteer shoe-shiners should report to Leonard Field on Thursday any time between 9 a.m. and 9 p.m. She added that shiners get free admission to a Grant Hall dance which starts at 9 p.m. Thursday.

Queen's stands alone

Wanna buy a piece of history?

Wanna buy a piece of lumber?

Either way, see the Alumni Association. They are selling off pieces of the stands from old Richardson Stadium, at a dollar a piece.

Of course, if you lived on any one of several floors on Leonard Field or in Vic last year, you already have a piece of bleacher...and for free. Quite a number of board feet mysteriously disappeared from the east stands during last April's exam fever.

Which represents another Queen's tradition, probably just as old.

University appoints officers, department heads

Several senior appointments were made by the university during the summer:

Herbert M. Edwards, professor of civil engineering, will be associate dean of the faculty of applied science. Edwards was acting dean last year, after Dr. Jim Brown resigned and until Dr. Robert Uffen took over this fall.

Eric W. Thrift will be university campus planner. He has been general manager of the National Capital Commission at Ottawa. Thrift succeeds Graham Andrews, who has returned to Australia. Acting campus planner has been Kurt Gesell, who is also secretary of the university centre planning committee.

Dr. Edward J. Monahan will be executive assistant to principal Dr. John J. Deutsch. Monahan has been executive secretary of the Canadian Association of University Teachers for the past six years; he succeeds Dr. Jim Whitley, who has become director of the student affairs centre at Queen's.

Dr. John Waldron becomes associate dean of the faculty of medicine, responsible for student affairs. He will remain an assistant professor of psychiatry as well.

Dr. Istvan Anhalt, of the University of Ottawa, becomes head of the department of music, succeeding Dr. Graham George, who returns to full-time teaching.

J. W. Grove is the new head of the department of political studies; he succeeds Dr. H. G. Thorburn, who is now on sabbatical leave. Grove has been teaching government and politics at the University of Manchester since 1949.

Dr. John Downie will be acting head of the department of chemical engineering this year while a committee seeks a permanent successor to Dr. R. H. Clark. Downie is chairman of a senate task force on the "steady state" (no growth) planned for Queen's, and is former president of the faculty association.

Lyman R. Robinson, professor of law, becomes associate dean of the faculty of law, succeeding Dr. Bernard Adell, who is on sabbatical leave.

Dr. K. S. Gunn has been appointed senior executive assistant to Dr. George Harrower, vice-principal (academic). He will be involved in academic administration and planning.

Cecil E. Law, professor of business has been made the first permanent director of the Canadian Institute of Guided Ground Transport, started at Queen's two years ago.

Peter Dorn of the University of Toronto press comes to Queen's as coordinating director of graphics, in charge of university printed matter and design.

G.J.H. Wattsford, director of administrative services, becomes director of the new department of university services, which adds to his responsibilities such areas as conference coordination, time tables, room bookings, the division of concerts, and the office of the coordinator of social arrangements, another new office, to be held by Mrs. Olive Higdon, who has been administrative assistant to the vice-principal (academic).

Bob Buller, a 1971 Queen's graduate and former bands manager, pub manager, AMS speaker and Tricolor Award winner, is now secondary school liaison officer under the registrar's office.

Bonham is new vice-principal

A new chief money man for the university took over during the summer, in a time of great financial pressure on Queen's and other Ontario universities.

He is David H. Bonham, who becomes vice-principal (finance) succeeding L. G. Macpherson, who retired. Bonham had been assistant vice-principal (finance) for a year.

The appointment becomes official October 1; transition went on during the summer. Macpherson, who had been vice-principal since 1965, was previously dean of the school of business. For many years he was one of the most influential of the university's senior officers.

At the May board of trustees meeting, rector Alan Broadbent spoke on behalf of the Alma Mater Society and of Elrond College, saying that Macpherson had been of great service in the early planning for Elrond, the student-owned residence now being built north of campus.

Bonham has been at Queen's since 1965, as a professor of law and business and then as executive assistant to principal Dr. John J. Deutsch.

He will be faced with a difficult situation this year, as Queen's operates on its first deficit budget in many years -- for a loss of about $500,000 on operating expenses of $32 million.

Ontario government grants to universities rose between two and three percent for this year over last, compared with a rise of about six per cent in the cost of living. The financial situation for universities is therefore grim.

And the $6.5 million quota of the capital fund drive now being conducted by Queen's is not being reached as fast as its organizers had expected.

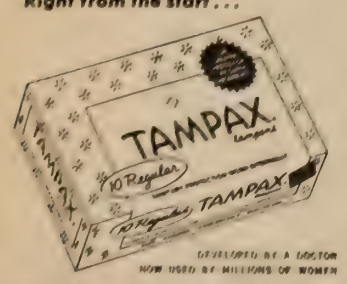
There's no doubt in her mind



When it comes to choosing the right sanitary protection, there is no doubt in her mind. She uses Tampax tampons and has, right from the start. They were developed by a doctor, so she knows they're safe. And they give her the protection she needs.

Tampax tampons are softly compressed to give better absorption. And they're the only tampon that comes in three absorbency-sizes: Regular, Super and Junior. Because they're internally worn, there are no bulky pads, pins or belts. So she's free to dress the way she wants and do what she wants, every day of the month.

Use Tampax tampons, without a doubt.

OPENER ELUDES GENEROUS GAELS

As home openers go, Saturday was almost perfect. The new stadium was ready, the field was in good shape, the sun was shining, and all the planned parades and luncheons went off without a hitch. But the game had not been in progress long before it was realized that one important detail had not been covered. While the Gaels fell all over themselves welcoming the Gee Gees to the new field, the visitors ruined the day by starting a rain of footballs. The two teams just didn't seem to have a firm grasp of the situation. In fact, as it turned out, the Gaels never had a grasp of the Ottawa pass receivers either. No matter how much turf is planted from the old field into the new, the playing tradition must be carried by the team. Although the Gaels have always been known as a tough team there was no excuse for the cheap-shot, half-tackle style which they chose to use in their opener.

The official kick-off was probably one of the longest any football fan will ever see. Certainly it was longer than the Gaels' kick-off. But the Gaels have been known to plan things like that, and with Cozac's first interception two plays later, it seemed as if the Gaels were in control. This illusion was slowly but surely squelched by the Gee Gees.

After a trade of downs the Gaels found themselves in a punting situation deep in their own end-zone. Instead the Gaels generously spotted the Gee Gees a two point lead on a safety. A recovery of an Ottawa fumble and an interception by Doug Cozac kept the Gaels in the game until late in the quarter when Norm Luckie completed a ten yard pass to Dan Slee for Ottawa's first touchdown. The convert made the score at the end of the first quarter Gee Gees nine - Gaels zero.

Second Quarter

In the second quarter another interception by Brian Casey set up the Gaels for a field-goal by Cozac, the only scoring of the quarter. But, again it was an interception and a poor Ottawa punt which kept the Gaels in the game.

In the second half the Gaels took a temporary lead when Gord McLellan ran a punt back from the Queen's 46 yard line. Cozac put the Gaels ahead for the one time in the game with a slim ten to nine lead. A roughing penalty against Queen's set Ottawa up on the Gaels 15 yard line where a quick pass from Luckie to Ryan put the Gee Gees ahead to stay. However in an insurance move the Gee Gees successfully completed a two point conversion. It proved more embarrassing than necessary. An interception by Ottawa, the second play of the last quarter, set up the Gee Gees for an insurance three points as Gibbs kicked a 27 yard field-goal.

Suddenly it seemed as though the Gaels had grasped the significance of the game as they marched down the field for a touchdown with Brian Warrender crashing over from the seven. Then Ottawa delivered their final blow with a touchdown pass-and-run play from their own 17 yard line. (Just 92 of their 337 yards gained in the air). There remained only for the Gee Gees to make two interceptions in the dying moments and the fans to leave the stadium to announce the finish of the Ottawa triumph.

Throughout the game the Gaels not only collected over 120 yards in penalties by cheap-shot tactics but also missed initial tackles while attempting to line up ball carriers for a good hit. Of course 64 yards total passing on four completions of eighteen attempts was really no aid either. No need to give up, the Gaels did gain over 200 yards on the ground and they are still tied for first with both the other teams in the capital division.

Queen's Bands

As usual one of the earliest organizations to surface on campus this year was the Queen's Bands. Cheerleaders, Highland Dancers, Majorettes and the Queen's Pipe Band and the Queen's Brass Band appeared at the football game last Saturday.

The Queen's Bands appear at every football game throughout the season. Parades, half-time shows and clowning in the stands are some of their responsibilities on football days. This year the Majorettes and the Brass Band will be playing at Toronto and York. The Pipe Band and the Highland Dancers will appear at Carleton and Toronto. Both bands will play in the Queen's at-home games. The Cheerleaders will be at every game.

If you are interested in becoming a member of the Queen's Bands come out to a practice:

Highland Dancers - 301 Kingston Hall 6:30 Mon., Tues., and Wed.

Pipe Band - 301 Kingston Hall 6:30 Tues.

Majorettes - parking lot behind Vic or Grant Hall (if it's raining) 6:30 Mon., Tues., and Wed.

Brass Band - Grant Hall 6:45 Mon., Tues., and Wed.

Cheerleaders - Bews gym 6:00 Mon., Tues., and Wed.

Previous experience in these activities is not necessary for membership in the Queen's Bands. Spirit and interest are all that's needed.

TEACHERS

Emergency meetings between Kingston teachers and the board of education have yet to produce agreement on increases in salary for Kingston's teachers, and students at several of the high schools have been protesting the delay...

Starting Monday, the teachers began a work-to-rule campaign which has left the students with no advisors or coaches for extra-curricular activities.

Students from several of the high schools have walked out of class in protest against their lack of extra-curricular activities and nearly 2,000 high school students congregated outside the board of education office Monday to urge the board to settle the dispute with the teachers.

No settlement had been reached by last weekend.

HEALTH

Ontario's old age pensioners and poor will receive free medical and hospital care next year, Premier Bill Davis announced Monday, and medical and health premiums for all residents will decline.

On April 1, 1971, all persons or families with no taxable income under the increased federal tax exemptions will receive free medical and health care. Since personal tax exemptions will rise to $1,500 from $1,000 for single people and to $2850 from $2000 for a married couple, most students will receive free health care.

Also, starting next July 1, the separate hospital and medical plans will be integrated, so that subscribers will make only one monthly payment.

HEARINGS

A group of ten Canadians will be holding public hearings on the effects of War Measures Act, beginning Oct. 12 in Montreal.

The inquiry, headed by Woodrow Lloyd former premier of Saskatchewan, will study the War Measures Act, how and why it was applied during the kidnapping crisis last fall, the legislation's effects on human rights and civil liberties, and assess the role of the government, citizens and the media during the crisis.

They will also study the act's successor, the Public Order Act and the nature of federalism during the crisis.

In May, Justice Minister John Turner appointed a committee to consider replacement legislation for the Public Order Act, which expired at the end of April, but he made it clear that the government had no intention of providing a format for opposition members to criticize the government's activities during the fall crisis.

GOYER

Solicitor-General Jean-Pierre Goyer has instructed the RCMP to stop making payments to juvenile informers.

Since his August announcement that the RCMP would never have juveniles (persons under 18) on its payroll, Goyer nas been subjected to considerable criticism because of a number of disclosures that some juveniles have been paid regularly for informing to the RCMP, particularily in the Cornwall area.

In future, the RCMP may accept information from a juvenile on first contact but must seek parental consent for any further information and may not pay a juvenile, assign him an informant's number or use juveniles to purchase drugs.

But I thought you had been working on a contingency plan . . . !

The seasonally adjusted unemployment rate increased to 6.5 per cent for the month of August, despite Finance Minister Edgar Benson's prediction that it would decline.

A total of 450,000 people were unemployed in midAugust as the rate increased from 6.3 for July and nearly reached the August level for last year which was 6.6

At the same time, inflation continued unabated as the Consumer Price Index rose 0.7 per cent over the July level, to a level 3.4 per cent higher than a year ago. Food prices increases of 2 per cent were the major cause of the increase.

Compared to a year ago, clothing prices in August were 2.1 per cent higher, transportation costs were 4.3 per cent higher, health and personal care prices 1.6 per cent recreation and eading 2.5 per cent higher, tobacco and alcohol prices 2.5 per cent higher and food prices 3 per cent higher.

TELY

Publication of the Toronto Telegram, begun over 95 years ago, will cease as a result of a decision announced by publisher John Bassett Saturday.

Rising production costs and a declining share of advertising revenue have led to losses of $2,000,000 over the past two years and expected losses this year could amount to another million.

In making the announcement in a front page article Saturday, Bassett made no reference to difficulties the Telegram was having in wage negotiations with its employees' unions, two of three of which have voted to strike after turning down the company's offer of a wage freeze for 1971, and $10 per week for 1972. The unions sought a $40 a week increase, the same amount granted employees of the Toronto Star.

LORTIE

The first week of the trial of Bernard Lortie, 19, charged with kidnapping Pierre Laporte last October, came to a close with the sworn statement of guilt by Lortie being read into the court records.

In the statement, made to police, Lortie admitted that he, Francis Simard, and Paul and Jacques Rose had kidnapped Laporte from outside his home.

Paul Rose and Simard have been convicted earlier of the kidnapping and murder of Laporte and sentenced to life imprisonment.

Three others have been convicted of complicity after the fact in the murder-kidnapping. Michel Viger has been sentenced to five years in prison and Collette Therrien and Richard Therrien have each been sentenced to one year in prison.

THE WORLD

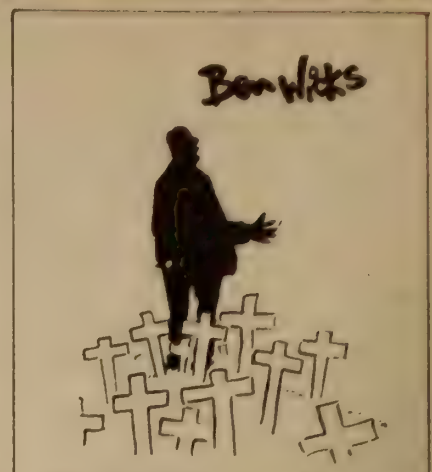
ISRAEL

Israel and Egypt exchanged missile fire along the Suez canal Saturday in the most serious outbreak of fighting since a ceasefire began 13 months ago. Both sides characteristically blamed the other for starting the fighting.

The hostilities along the Suez canal coincided with a burst of fighting between Palestinian guerillas and Israelis along the Lebanon border.

Both sides had been on the alert before the hositilities began after the Egyptian air defences downed an Israeli transport plane over the Sinai desert Friday.

ATLANTA — All but one of the 102 murder counts against Capt. Ernest Medina for his part in the My Lai massacre have been dropped or reduced.



On the charge that Medina is responsible for the premeditated murder of 100 Vietnamese civilians, the jury hearing the case in Atlanta will be instructed to convict Medina of involuntary manslaughter — an unlawful homicide committed without intent to kill — or to find him innocent.

Medina still faces a murder charge for the killing of a Vietnamese woman and an assault charge for firing two shots over the head of a Viet Cong prisoner.

IRELAND

A total of 107 people have now been killed in the two years of Catholic-Protestant fighting in northern Ireland, following the deaths Friday night of two Ulster constables.

The constables died after gunmen in a speeding car opened fire on them near the border of the Irish Republic. Police on both sides of the border are co-operating in efforts to track down the gunmen.

"As Commissioner, my job was to get those hostages out of that prison!"

ATTICA

ATTICA — The confusion surrounding the events at Attica State prison in New York and the need for further investigation prevented the burial Friday of the bodies of the 42 prisoners and guards killed at the prison last Monday.

The deaths occurred when New York state troopers and National Guardsmen stormed the state prison, housing 2254 inmates, to put down a four-day rebellion in which about 500 inmates, mostly Puerto Ricans and blacks, had taken 38 guards as hostages.

The riot was apparently sparked when an inmate was placed in solitary for his part in an attack on a guard on Wednesday, Sept. 8.

The state troopers stormed the building after the prisoners refused to comply with an ultimatum that they give up the hostages. The inmates insisted that they be granted amnesty before they would give up the hostages, a request that was denied by New York Corrections Commissioner Russell Oswald.

After the assault Oswald contended that the ten hostages killed had been killed by the prisoners, who slit their throats. However, an autopsy Tuesday revealed that nine of the ten hostages had died of gunshot wounds, apparently from shots fired by the state troopers, since no guns were found among the weapons used by the prisoners.

Investigations into the causes of the rebellion and the killings are continuing.

New York Governor Nelson Rockefeller has publicly supported the assault action, which in terms of violence and bloodshed is the worst prison riot in the US in a generation, and he has taken full responsibility for it. He is supported in his stand by President Richard Nixon.

However, strong opposition to the attack has also appeared among those who see a connection between the decision to attack the blacks at Attica and the prison killing of Soledad Brother George Jackson, a Black Panther, and among others who feel that the attack was unnecessarily violent and could have been avoided.

VIETNAM

Police opened fire with automatic rifles and tear gas Saturday on hundreds of militant 'buddhist students demonstrating against President Nguyen Van Thieu's one-man election campaign and in protest of the American presence in South Viet Nam.

At least six students and six policemen were reported injured in the rioting.

All would-be opponents of Thieu have dropped out of the Oct. 3 election race charging the president with rigging the vote.

The Band falls through

AMS concert officials reported Tuesday night that they have been unsuccessful in getting a big-name band for the Homecoming concert October 14.

"I hate to say this, but we took it in the ear again," campus activities commissioner Wally Palmer told the first AMS outer council meeting of the year.

He said the AMS, represented by Queen's Entertainment Agency director Dave Merrick, had been close to signing a contract with the band to perform. But their agent cancelled out, Palmer said.

An alternative group had not been chosen yet, he added.

From corner of the room came the voice of senior meds representative Andrew Pipe: "Can anybody here play the kazoo?"

Questions about concerts were answered by Merrick's wife Anne, who was at the meeting as temporary representative of students in the faculty of education.

She said attempts had been made during the summer to arrange "block-booking", by which Queen's and other universities could sponsor a particular group on consecutive nights and sign a joint contract for all the performances.

An arrangement with the student government of the University of Waterloo had fallen through, Mrs. Merrick said.

Palmer announced that in addition to the concert, Homecoming events will include an indoor street dance - "another first at Queen's". It will be held in the arena October 13.

Commerce president Bill DeLucia complained that this would conflict with the first annual Commerce Society banquet, and was told that some arrangement could be made.

Homecoming also features alumni events and the reunion football game October 16 against the University of Toronto Varsity Blues.

AMS coordinator for Homecoming is Laura Gill of Artsci 74, daughter of Murray Gill of the alumni association, who is in charge of events for graduates.

AMS gets organized

The Alma Mater Society got itself organized at Tuesday night's outer council meeting, which was mostly an information session for returning council members.

Points discussed included liquor, Queen's Student Agencies, and birth control handbooks, among others.

AMS president Patrick Riley was asked why AMS constables had tried to enforce an alleged rule against liquor at parties held by or for first-year students. Riley said he did not know where such a rule existed: "I think it's a myth."

Senior meds representative Andrew Pipe said the rule used to be part of the constitution of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society. He said it was put there after an Arts 70 freshman drunk virtually destroyed Browns Restaurant in Kingston, but the rule disappeared in rewriting of the constitution last year.

Vice-president Victor Bradley pointed out that, aside from any such rule, residence common rooms are public places and require a licence from the Ontario government if liquor is to be served.

The proposal that the AMS help take over the north Kingston food co-op, to provide groceries to students at wholesale prices has fallen through, services commissioner Glenn Hall reported. "Negotiations have broken down just by the simple fact that they weren't successful."

Shortly after that incisive statement Riley broke into the procedure to explain to new members what the executive was doing: "I don't know why we go through all these formalities, but we do."

Proposals to formalize Queen's Student Agencies, a new AMS subsidiary intended to operate services ranging from a boutique to the campus pub, were presented and will be discussed by outer council October 4. Riley pointed out that the folder describing QSA, distributed to students at registration, is not yet an official statement; the structures described in it have yet to receive outer council approval.

Services commissioner Hall then raised the question of birth control handbooks, pointing out that the AMS is distributing at registration a handbook written by Dr. Ted Johnston of the Queen's department of obstetrics and gynaecology. He said it had been decided to buy copies of another handbook produced by students at McGill University, but that he personally was not happy with the political stands taken by that book.

It includes passages endorsing women's liberation and radical action, and carries on its cover the clenched-fist Women's lib symbol.

"I'd like to be known as a person who stands for birth control," Hall said. He asked that the AMS disavoew the radical politics however.

Meds representative Pipe replied, "You seemed to suggest that medicine morality and politics don't mix and I want to take violent exception to that."

The council proceeded to pass Hall's motion, stating that the book was purchased because of its "completeness and availability rather than for any political bias it might be considered to show."

Those who opposed the motion included Pipe, Bradley, internal affairs commissioner Jim Richardson, and education commissioner Mike Payne.

Tams can be sold back

Freshmen who do not want to keep their tams can return them for a refund, the combined orientation committee has announced.

A message to members of artsci 75 says unused tams will be worth $3.15; second-hand ones, $1.00.

Tams were the subject of much argument when the artsci-nursing-rehab orientation for this year was being planned last winter. They have never been returnable before.

The committee's statement appears below.

TO ARTSCI 75

You have almost completed your first week of classes in this new year. Hopefully, most of you participated in the orientation programme preceding this week. Those of us who were involved in organizing the orientation programme enjoyed being able to help, and hope that each of you found it worthwhile.

Queen's tams were part of what was presented to you in this orientation week. To many graduates and undergraduates, their tam is representative of what they have come to value about Queen's.

However, in the past, some students have expressed the feeling that tams were forced upon them. For those of you who feel this way, we have made arrangements to purchase back as many tams as we can manage financially.

The purpose of this new policy is to obtain an indication of how large a group share this view. The response that is received will certainly carry some weight in future decisions about the role of tams at Queen's.

Tams will be resaleable at the Red Room in Kingston Hall, Monday and Tuesday, September 27 and 28, from 6 to 8 p.m. Tams returned in original wrappings will be worth $3.15; second-hand tams will be worth $1.00.

Freshettes frigid

By Val Hanbidge

I sleep in the nude. It's easy and it's comfortable. But I am now offering prayers of thanks to all the gods and fates who saw ti it that on the night of Semptember 21 I was wearing pyjamas. Though they amounted to no more than an old, tattered pair of baby-dolls with buttons that refused to stay shut and a very strategically placed hole that is not (maybe) visible to the untrained eye, I am convinced that they saved my life. Or shall I say, they saved me one hell of a lot of embarrassment when the fire bell rang and we were told to leave the building. I am eternally grateful.

It is truly amazing how many sadists and parasites gather at the first hint of excitement. In this case, they came in the form of boys. Laughing and pointing. Most of them, by the way, had thick sweaters or jackets. Does chivalry live? Don't you believe it. I had approximately 33 inches of bare leg, and not one boy offered his pants.

I am a freshette. I have been told countless times that university is an "experience" Well, I am now experienced. In future, when a fire bell rings I will not dash madly from the building. I will calmly put on a pair of slippers and a housecoat I may burn in a fire of hell for saying that. But I will not freeze.

Davis campaigns here

Ontario premier William Davis visited Queen's briefly Wednesday on the first leg of his campaign for the October 21 provincial election

Supporters and members of the press poured out of the Davis' campaign buses when they stopped in front of the Union at 9:30 Wednesday morning. A passing student commented, "There's more of them than there are of us - Davis must carry a crowd with him."

He spent twenty minutes circling the second-floor common room in the Union, shaking hands with students in the crowd and stopping occasionally to answer individual questions in a low voice.

Then the candidate invited the whole group, about 75 students, to address questions to him.

One student asked whether reducing the voting age from 21 to 18 would give Davis' Progressive Conservative Party more votes. He replied that this had not been the purpose of the change, but it might be one possible result.

Davis was also asked about deflationary measures which the Ontario government might take. He said corporation taxes had been lowered but that there were no other plans at present for lowering taxes.

He did not make any speech or policy statement.

Fund drive may be in trouble

An unfavourable economic climate may affect the future of Queen's University expansion. The capital fund campaign launched just over a year ago has taken in a total of $4.5 million to date about two-thirds of the $6.5 million available.

The Ontario government is maintaining a policy of budgetary restrictions, and there is strong public feeling against increasing tax support of the costs of higher education. Even at best, government grants have never been intended to cover the total costs of university expansion; private funds are needed.

Meanwhile, the university expands. Applications for positions in the freshman class are running seven times the places available, and this year 95 more first-year arts and science students were admitted than had been planned originally.

The capital fund campaign has been conducted on three fronts - students alumni, and the business sector. Each is facing its own difficulties.

The Alma Mater Society, on behalf of the students, has pledged $500,000 to the campaign, specifically for the new university centre. This money is coming from a $5 per student levy over the next seven years) at present, it appears that the total will fall some $100,000 short of the objective..

In addition, students pay $10 each per year towards operation of the present Student Union and paying off the costs of its construction.

Alumni have contributed $728,000 toward their objective of $1 million in the fund drive. A special emphasis has been made during this campaign to reach Queen's graduates on a face-to-face basis.

Corporate gifts and pledges total more than $3 million, even in the face of declining profits and a general economic slowdown. Contributions are sharply down from the forest and chemical product industries, both of which have contributed generously in the past.

In the 1957 fund campaign it took thirty weeks for Queen's to raise $4 million. In 1964 it took seventy weeks for $4½ million. The current campaign has taken seventy weeks to raise slightly less than did the 1964 campaign.

Vice-principal (development and information) Jim Courtright said the current campaign is four times as effective as the 1957 one, since the value of the current dollar is roughly half what it was in 1957.

He also said that the increasing number of Canadian universities has made fund-raising a highly competitive business.

Senator to be chosen

An election will be held in mid-October to fill a vacant position of student senator from the faculty of arts and science.

Senator Peter Adams, whose term ran until September 1972, resigned during the summer when he transferred to law school at the University of Windsor.

Doug Donald chief returning officer for the Arts and science Undergraduate Society, said Tuesday the election date has not been set. He said it would be as close as possible to the senatorial election in the Graduate Student Society, which is scheduled for October 14.

Adams was a member of the senate's committee on campus planning.

In Canada, we are cut off from our own reality

BY ROBERT FULFORD
IN SATURDAY NIGHT

The two men on the bus in Toronto were both black. One was a West Indian who believed in integration and civil rights, the other an American who believed in segregation and black power.. The American did most of the talking. His argument, loud and confident, was that there was no future in co-operating with Whitey, in Canada or anywhere else: black power was the Negro's only real hope. The West Indian disagreed, but quietly. Finally the American got off the bus.

"Those goddamn Americans," the West Indian said. "No matter what colour they are, they're all imperialists."

The anecdote was stuck in my head during the six months since I heard it. I take it out every week or so, examine it in the light, turn it this way and that. Then I look, through it, at some new aspect of the American presence in Canada.

As a prism, that anecdote has a curious effect. It makes all Americans look alike. Freaky kids just off the bus from Des Moines look like corporation lawyers flying in from New York. Stylish painters from Los Angeles begin to resemble envoys from the Pentagon. Radical education professors dropping in for a quick conference look very much like TV hucksters. Seen through that prism, Abbie Hoffman and Richard Nixon are brothers and Andy Warhol is the colleague of Ed Sullivan.

I've come slowly to the conclusion that my prism isn't necessarily lying to me. For the fact is that these people - some of whom I have every reason to love, some of whom I have every reason to hate - have two things in common: (1) They know what they are doing and thinking, and they believe the rest of the world should do and think much the same thing. (2) They have behind them unprecedented power - cultural, political, economic, or all three.

American painters know that American painting is what matters in the world, and American radicals know that American radicalism is what matters. Their ideas differ in content from those of militarists or industrialists or admen; but there is something remarkably similar in the style.

This style - call it, at risk of falling into rhetoric, The Imperial Style - helps make the creation of an independent Canada difficult. Of all the peoples of the world, English-speaking Canadians are closest, geographically and culturally, to that style. We feel it at strongest and its purest, and we absorb its message more profoundly than anyone else.

The message that style carries, put at its simplest, is this: in all things America is first, the rest of the world second.

Perhaps, in a sense, everybody should feel that way about his country and its culture; perhaps pride, so sought-after by the oppresed of the world, is a fine thing to maintain once you have it, as the Americans most certainly do. The problem arises elsewhere - in those countries where the American belief in American superiority comes to be accepted as fact.

There can't be many such places, these days, European countries have - or at least have had in the past - built-in defenses against this problem: they have countervailing mythologies of pride. French people, say, assume France is best and brush aside all evidence to the contrary. Asian countries have similar defenses, and so do countries whose ideology is seen as superior to the American.

English-speaking Canada, unfortunately, has no such counter-force, or second-strike, pride. It hasn't the history the other countries have, or the ideology. And so it falls into a very special kind of national alienation.

Alienation, defined politically, is the feeling that you don't count. If a man is too ignorant and poor to be treated as important by anyone, then he's alienated as an individual from the political and social processes of his society. But what if a whole nation feels that it doesn't count?

English-speaking Canadian alienation, in this sense, is the belief that what is important is happening somewhere else, usually somewhere to the south. The Imperial Style - delivered to us at all levels, and through all media from TV to school textbooks - makes this plain. Just as our schools once taught us that literature was something written by dead Englishmen, so our media now teach us that important events are things that happen to Americans or are caused by Americans. In both cases the result is to cut us off from our own reality - "invalidate our experience," in the phrase (from another context) of the psychiatrist R.D. Laing.

This alienation explains several otherwise puzzling aspects of Canadian behaviour. It makes understandable, for instance, the almost total silence of Canadian young people in the face of the arbitrary and oppressive War Measures Act imposed last October by the federal government.

Several commentators pointed out at the time - I think George Bain of the Toronto Globe and Mail made the point most impressively - that, had any such action been taken by Richard Nixon against American radicals, the university students of Canada would have risen in fury. But when it was done in their own country they reacted hardly at all.

The reason is that the media have taught English-speaking Canadians not to care about Canada. They have taught us, for instance, that civil rights are things American governments violate, and that issues of importance to liberals and radicals are American issues. America is the land of heroes and villains, victims and executioners; America is where things happen.

What I'm suggesting is that the problem of Canadian independence may be even more complicated than we have assumed, that it reaches beyond questions of economic and cultural sovereignty. The profound psychological and spiritual dimensions of this national alienation in English-speaking Canada touch every aspect of our life as a country. If we are to achieve anything important as a society in the future we must deal with them, and deal also with their root causes.

We won't do this, of course, by being angry at Americans, whether friendly or unfriendly ones. We may react with rage when American academics suggest that, say, the University of Toronto, if it tries really hard, can someday become Harvard; we may laugh bitterly when American union leaders clearly imply, as they often do, that the American way is the way to happiness for Canadian workers; we may legislate furiously (as we surely soon will, under one government or another) against American ownership of Canada. Still, we can't change Americans, or the American ideal. In the end American imperialism in Canada is a problem Canadians will have to solve.

letters to the editors

Dear Editors:

I must assume that the article on page 4 of Tuesday's Journal was an editorial as it was unsigned. While I appreciate your concern lest we become a "police state" where everyone is watched and deviants from the norms are punished, I cannot sympathize with the example you chose to illustrate this point. You confuse the workings of a secretive organization, such as an undercover police force, with the operations of members of a committee of the ASUS who were working in co-operation with the Orientation Committee. As you pointed out in your editorial, this "participant-observation" (as I choose to think of it) was tried last year very successfully and the results of the two observors of last year formed a substantial part of the "Mellow-Yellow Paper on Orientation" which was a public document and, I might add, very positive in its approach.

I was disappointed that you chose to berate the efforts of the ASUS to update and improve its orientation programme, which in my opinion is already the most progressive, balanced and extensive programme on the campus, and say nothing about the assinine programmes run by the faculties of Applied Science and Commerce, whatever their reasons for doing it.

Let me assure you that the intentions of the Orientation Study Committee and its observors were honourable ones, that their findings and opinions will be made public and that their purpose was to positively evaluate this years orientation programme and make recommendations based on their findings for next year's programme. This does not seem unreasonable, as the ASUS Orientation programme seeks to orient some 1,300 to 1,400 students and involves some 200 or more upper classmen who put in well over 12,000 to 14,000 hours planning and executing this programme. ASUS orientation, as you can see, is a large undertaking and it would be unfair and unreasonable to expect the Orientation Committee to carry out an evaluation of their own programme as well as administer the many other duties they have prior to and during Orientation Week.

Orientation

Dear Editors:

Good Old Queen's still hasn't changed. And the Orientation Week farce has gone on for yet another year.

The freshmen are still wearing tams, shorts and other ridiculous garb. They still submit to the insulting term frosh. They are still press-ganged into jumping about arm-in-arm or otherwise making fools of themselves until they are blue in the face. They still sit around in little groups on the lawn with their Gale leaders giving the impression of a bunch of kids out with mama and papa.

The Gales, too, are still ego-tripping as much as ever (why else would they take the job?) and there is no telling how much drivel they hand out in the name of fact.

And even the Journal does its bit to perpetuate the conditioning that the freshmen go through when they say in Thursday's paper "...and some freshmen, chiefly mature students, were not participating in orientation." How do you like that one, frosh? They don't even figure the rest of you are mature.

So what about the benefits of orientation. You meet people? Sure, but you can meet people without going to a concentration camp. You create spirit? Sure, but what does this spirit really do besides win football games. And you'll win the football games anyway if you get really hammered and enjoy yourself.

Philip Miller

(Ed. Note: "Mature student" is a term applied to persons seeking admission who do not have the required Grade 13 or equivalent standing for regular admission, have not previously attended a university and who reach the age of at least 23 during the calendar year of application.)

People make the difference — ha !

By a Disenchanted Bank Teller

You must have noticed sometime during your weekly visits to withdraw five dollars that almost every bank is plastered with alluring posters volunteering unlimited funds to finance that car you want or the trip you need. Of course they want to lend you money. They make all their millions on the interest you pay. If you are forced to avail yourself of this "service", beware of the old "let's just take the interest off the top and get it out of the way" trick. This play enables the bank to charge you interest on a principle which in fact they have never given you. For example, if you borrow $100 at 12 percent, and they take it off the top, they are only giving you the use of $88 you are paying for the use of the $100 you asked for.

Chances are you are not a "good" customer. In the bank, being good has nothing to do with how well you manage your meagre earnings; According to bank standards, "good" is synonymous with "rich". If you are fortunate enough to fall within this category, there is no limit to the services which the bank will provide. Tellers and accountants will listen attentively while you discuss your latest operation. Cheques and statements from five years back will be dug out of the vault, a service which sometimes requires hours of labour, and you may never be charged. Sometimes such customers are exempt from all regular charges in the fear that unreasonable costs would drive their precious capital to another bank.

I suspect you are a customer of a different status. Ironically, if your balance does not exceed number of digits the sum which suffices to render obsequious slaves of your manager and staff, you are subject to every debit the bank can remotely justify.

(Have you ever looked at the signature card you signed when you opened your account which has small print that says you gave your permission to let the bank debit you for charges whenever they want to?) If, heaven forbid, you should issue a cheque which you neglect to cover beforehand, you may or may not be notified before your cheque is sent back to the payee dishonoured, depending on the degree of benevolence generated within the bank on that particular day. At any rate, the cheque is usually sent back NSF (not sufficient funds) with a charge of $1-2. to your account because you were nasty. And if your boss gives you a bad cheque and you cash it at the bank, you are the one stuck with reimbursing the bank, not the bum who wrote you the cheque.

But if you feel that the bank is abusing you, at least it does not own your soul, something it has accomplished with its employees. It is general knowledge to those within the bank that the bank will hire just about anybody. You do not need education. You hardly even have to be able to speak English. All they ask is that you be able to count, and even that is not insisted upon. But in return for the negligable prerequisites they ask a lifetime of rotten pay and unreasonable responsibility. Tellers pay cash differences when they don't balance but are simultaneously encouraged to hurry when the bank is busy. Since no other bank employees other than tellers have custody over cash, all money taken in by senior officers is haphazardly deposited on some teller's wicket. This means that any mistakes in the calculations of the accounting department may be pinned on the teller who stamped a cheque out of respect for the man who can fire her.

For the teller, illness is a major offense. Not only is it seen as an exhibition of gross lack of responsibility by the accountant whose efficient teller system you have in your audacity screwed for a day, but because the bank is never prepared for such emergencies, you cause your fellow tellers to despise you while they attempt to do their own job and yours at the same time.

The $70 a week starting salary does not seem to inhibit the bank from insisting that employees dress in Bay Street business garb (this summer hot pants were a favourite), and of course stockings for the legs that nobody sees.

Women in the bank have little chance for advancement under the current system. Transfers for girls are very rare, and consequently if you wish to get ahead, you've got to wait till the woman in the position you wish dies or quits, and then you must vanquish all the other girls who are trying to get there first.

Although the men are regularly promoted in the training programme provided for them, they are forced into a much stronger dependence on the big banking machine. After a number of years of devoted service to the bank, they are offered exceptionally low interest rates on loans. With this assistance, they purchase cars, homes, land, in fact all the accoutrements of the good life with the power of the banks money. Eventually they are in a position in which they simply cannot afford to relinquish the fringe benefits derived from the bank even if they detest their jobs. If they quit, their interest rate reverts to the normal rates.

Thus is appears that recognizing the current philosophies which prevade the banks of our nation, it is advisable to stash your money right alongside your dope in the comfort of your own home or go to a trust company where the interest is higher.

Methods of abortion:

Perhaps the crudest and least effective method of population control is abortion. It is analogous to "closing the stable door after the horse has escaped." Yet, pregancies do arise as a result of ignorance, failure of normal contraceptive methods or carelessness and consequently a consideration of abortion is warranted.

Until recently, many women desirous of an abortion were either callously ignored or cruelly exploited by quack abortionists. Since the omnibus amendments to the Criminal Code, however, it is now possible for women to obtain legal abortions, when there is indication that the well being of the mother is threatened (and the psychological and emotional well being is just as significant as the physical status of the patient.) or where there are indications that the unborn child may be congenitally malformed or damaged or in cases where pregnancy has occurred as a result of rape, incest etc. In practice, the ease with which one can obtain a so called "therapeutic abortion" varies from centre to centre. Obviously, there are many hospitals where abortions are not carried out (those institutions affiliated with various orders of the Roman Catholic Church, for example) but most publicly supported hospitals have abortion committees and perform such operations.

There are three commonly performed methods of abortion: 1) a dilation and curetlage (commonly known as a D&C) performed under general anesthesia. In this procedure the cervix (opening of the uterus) is gradually dilated allowing the physician to enter the uterus with a curette - a surgical instrument which is used to scrape loose the embryo and the placenta. Hence the uterine lining (the endometrium) is gently removed and no cutting of body tissues is involved. Such procedure is only used during the first three months of pregnancy.

2) In the process known as vacuum aspiration, a hollow tube (the aspirator), connected to a suction pump, is inserted into the uterus, and the uterine lining, fetal and placental tissue is carefully pulled away. This method is rapid, (taking between five and ten minutes) but is usually used with a general anesthesia. Like the D&C, this procedure is used only during the first three months of pregnancy.

3) After three months of pregnancy the fetus is too large to removed through the cervix. If it is essential that an abortion be performed after this point an operation similar to a Caesarean section is performed (a hysterectomy). This involves cutting through the abdominal wall and removing the fetus from the uterus. It is a complicated and involved procedure and requires at least a week's convalescence.

-a procedure which is not widely adopted involves replacing the amniotic fluid (fluid of the uterus which surrounds and protects the fetus) with a salt or sugar solution. This kills the fetus and induces labour and a subsequent miscarriage in 20-24 hours. This is a successful but difficult method which must be carefully performed in a hospital.

When properly performed, abortions are safe, and usually cost $75-$100 (but are usually covered by medical insurance). If you have further questions about abortion, inquire at the Student Health Service or your family doctor.

the Dormouse

By Alan Broadbent

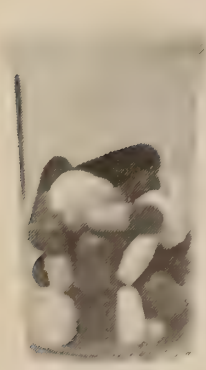
A university is held by some people to be a rather precious place. Those who have attended university in the past will be aware that for the most part these people are faculty members, or senior students who are heading to graduate student careers and therefore have a stake in the place.

To hold an institution dear is probably not necessarily a bad thing, providing that the values of the institution have been put under careful scrutiny, and that the expressed values are parallel to the expressed goals of the institution.

However, too often in the university, the expressed values and expressed goals are out of step. The whole thing is seldom looked at very closely, and the values are pushed forth from year to year without any grander aim than preserving the university.

This is most often done at the first of each year in the classroom. The faculty member will set the tone of whatever is to follow. In sometimes subtle ways, the professor will establish himself as the repository of knowledge, and will indicate to the class the straight and narrow path of learning. He will let students know that his words are fabulous, and that emulation is the sure way to share in his light. Even if he does not claim to know all of the answers, he is sure of the questions; that his questions may not be of any consequence to those before him is only proof to him that there is a lot of learning to be done.

Some professors have had the courage to look closely at what the university is doing. Some of them are now farmers in the maritimes or on the prairies, for the courage of their convictions wasn't the best route to job security. A few are still within the walls of the universities, and are plying subtle ploys to strike new directions.



Their methods are those of enlightened madmen for seeming insanity allows their colleagues to view them with sympathy, rather than fear. One professor will enter his first class of the year, and direct each student to stand at readiness, pen in hand, paper at a 45 degree angle to the desk, and brow full furrowed. He advises them that he does not show up each morning for his own benefit, but to educate them. He then produces his lecture, carefully typed and rather yellowed from the years. He begins reading the lecture at dictation speed, pausing only to spell difficult words (over two syllables) and to cast cold looks at coughers and sneezers. The class, totally intimidated by the fierceness and rigour of the man, bends to the notebook, catching every word and inflection. They write like a buffalo stampede. Gradually the lecture becomes more and more trivial, the words less and less meaningful, and the tone more and more facetious. However, there is no change in the attitude of class; every word is recorded in notebooks. Finally, in perfect harmony with the end of class buzzer, the Professor ends with the sentence ". . . and thus, all students are dolts".

The Professor sweeps up his notes, and disappears. The class is stunned; gradually the point becomes clear. They were coerced into being dolts. They think over what has happened to them, and they make the professor work with them for the est of the year. The class becomes demanding and the learning from that point is co-operative; the institution suffers wound that will suffer it to some extent for a long time.

To the end of such attrition, a group of people have suggested a project to force thought and responsiveness into the sytem. They will circulate at random in the university during class hours. Opening classroom doors, they will level an accusatory stare at the professor and class and announce that "this is all bullshit". If it isn't, the class will to on. If it is, maybe someone will have the courage to make things work for more people.

The drug company makes it, your doctor will prescribe it, and it's all legal drug abuse.

By J. Maurice Rogers,
Ph. D. PSYCHOLOGY

The continuing and justified alarm over illegal drug use by the young has obscured an underlying problem that is larger and even more threatening to society. It is an epidemic of legal drug abuse that is just what the doctor ordered.

Depression, social inadequacy, anxiety, apathy, marital discord, children's misbehavior, and other psychological and social problems of living are now being redefined as medical problems, to be solved by physicians with prescription pads. Psychiatrists as well as physicians of every other specialty now prescribe a wide variety of mood-altering drugs for patients with emotional, motivational and learning problems, and even the mildest psychologist discomforts.

Physicians who overuse psychoactive drugs are wedded to an obsolete medical model of human behavior-the concept that psychological problems have medical causes. This viewpoint widens the physician's jurisdiction by classifying more and more persons as potential medical patients, and it allows an earnest medical healer to respond to all who seek his help.

The image of the physician as expert and benign beings to evaporate when we see physicians pushing psychoactive pills whose consequences are not fully understood into patients whose problems require human, not chemical, solutions.

Doctors are strongly encouraged in their pill-for-every-problem syndrome by drug manufacturers who bombard them with advertisements in psychiatric and medical journals:

"WHAT MAKES A WOMAN CRY? A man? Another woman? Three kids? No kids at all? Wrinkles? You name it...If she is depressed, consider Pertofane."

And:

"SCHOOL, THE DARK, SEPARATION, DENTAL VISITS, MONSTERS. THE EVERYDAY ANXIETY OF CHILDREN SOMETIMES GETS OUT OF HAND. A child can usually deal with his anxieties. But sometimes the anxieties overpower the child. Then he needs your help. Your help may include Vistaril."

And this advertisement, which shows an attractive but worried-looking young woman with an armful of books, and describes the problems that face a new college student:

"Exposure to new friends and other influences may force her to re-evaluate herself and her goals...Her newly stimulated intellectual curiosity may make her more sentitive to and apprehensive about national and world conditions." The headline reads: "TO HELP FREE HER OF EXCESSIVE ANXIETY... LIBRIUM." .IBRIUM."

Such advertisements redefine normal problems of living as medical problems to be solved by drugs. Most small children, of course, are at some time afraid of the dark or anxious about school. A person may become depressed after personal loss, upon facing a new job, having to adjust to new conditions, or upon experiencing impotence in the face of increasing social turmoil. But the advocacy of drugs for such problems is socially irresponsible.

Drug companies depend on this country's 180,000 physicians to sell their prescription drugs The doctors must be reminded, cajoled, pampered. The drug industry spends over three-quarters of a billion dollars each year on advertising directed solely to physicians - over $4,200 per physician per year.

The drug companies hold that their advertising is beneficial because it helps doctors learn about new drugs and new uses for old drugs. But many of the drug advertisements are grossly irresponsible, especially those that push psychoactive drugs - sedatives, sleeping pills, tranquilizers, energizers and mood-elevators. They are irresponsible because they make broad, unsupportable claims of benefit and applicability. They are irresponsible because they expand drug usage into areas that call for human coping, not escape via drugs. They are irresponsible because they cajole the physician toward the notion of better psychological living through chemistry.

Last year there were more prescriptions written by psychoactive drugs than there were persons in the country - and this does not include prescriptions in hospitals and clinics.

It is clearly in the financial interest of the drug industry to maintain large numbers of persons on drugs just as it is in the interest of the medical profession to define more and more human problems as medical. It is especially important for the drug industry to recruit new groups to drug use and to find new uses for its products. Flattered and seduced with bountiful free samples from the pharmacological industry, the physician increasingly assumes, with legal sanction, a role analogous to that of the pusher.

Because psychoactive drugs tend to produce a psychological dependence people often continue to use a drug after it has served its immediate purpose because they are uneasy about giving it up and relying on their own resources. A club leader may take prescribed tranquilizers because the thought of giving a speech without them makes her anxious. A truck driver who has combated fatigue with prescribed amphetamines may come to expect himself to be tired when he drives without them.

Women use psychoactive drugs twice as often as men do. Many seek prescriptions for these drugs because they are lonely, anxious, dissatisfied or unhappy; because they are not as popular, thin, vigorous, interesting or beautiful as they have been led to believe they should be.

Not counting what was dispensed in hospitals, U.S. pharmacists in 1970 filled more than 220 million doctors' prescriptions for mood-altering drugs, which at an average of 10 pills per prescription, worksout to about two billion doses of these drugs in one year.

What is most amazing about these numbers is that these pills cannot cure anybody of anything. They are purely palliative. They make you feel better while you are taking them but they cannot make you better.

In fact, they may make it harder to cure what is ailing you by obscuring your symptoms both from yourself and your doctor.

- Nicholas von Hoffman

Among the most widely prescribed psychoactive drugs are the tranquilizers. These chemicals originally were developed for chronically disturbed psychotic patients. But every year they are used more and more in the normal life-sphere for personal and social problems that physicians and the drug industry have converted into medical problems. When someone dies, for example, it is not uncommon for a physician to prescribe tranqulizers for the next of kin. The drugged family is then denied the opportunity to resolve a vital human experience.

Nursing homes often use tranquilizers excessively to quiet elderly patients. Nelson H. Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, has asked Congress to investigate this forced pacification program. Many doctors, says Cruikshank, "give blanket instructions to nursing-home staffs for use of tranquilizer drugs on patients who do not need them. Exclusive use of tranquilizers can quickly reduce an ambulatory patient to a zombie, confining the patient to a chair or bed, causing the patient's muscles to atrophy from inaction, and causing general health to deteriorate quickly.

One ad that appeared in medical journals shows a smiling, elderly woman sitting in a wheelchair, playing cards with other olds persons. "SHE IS GOING STEADY WITH HER PHENOTHIAZINE TRANQUILIZER," says the headline. The ad obviously implies that phenothiazine will promote sociability. But research, ignored by this ad, shows that one of the undesirable side effects of these drugs is that they reduce one's desire and ability to interact with other people.

It is obviously very profitable to a drug company to hold exclusive rights to the only drug on the market for a certain disorder. Sales of the drug will increase if there is an epidemic of that disorder, or if the disorder comes to be defined so vaguely that more and more human problems can be seen as symptoms of it. There are drugs for "simple nervous tension," "worry," "anxiety," "lack of energy" - maladies that are defined so broadly that everyone can recognize some of the symptoms in himself at times.

Ritalin and other drugs that normally function as stimulants (dexedrine, Tofranil) have been found to have a paradoxical effect on certain children who suffer from the childhood disorder called minimal brain dysfunction. Such children are described as overactive, destructive, hostile and unmanageable. With daily doses of stimulant drugs they allegedly calm down, become more sociable, and increase their attention span. Unfortunately, the symptoms of minimal brain dysfunction are so vague they border on the normal hyperactivity of children. An alarming number of children have been given these drugs without the neurological and psychological examinations that are necessary for a diagnosis of minimal brain dysfunction. Exuberant children may have ritalin prescribed primarily because parents want to quiet them down, or because teachers report hey are fidgety and inattentive in the classroom. maha, Nebraska school officials recently ered that between five and 10 per cent of the -school children in that city were being given ally prescribed amphetamines to modify their oom hyperastivity or inattention.

Food and Drug Administration has warned that drugs are physiologically addictive and must be with extreme caution. Despite this, their use medical auspices expands alarmingly. About children now take Ritalin daily: CIBA Pharutical Company reportedly sold 10 million s' worth last year.

Leon Wanerman of the Mount Zion Hospital and al Center in San Francisco asserts that "the on to place a child on medication is too often without careful study...But if you put a child of on drugs for a protracted period of time, what u telling a child about drugs and how they make el better?" Dr. Ernest Dernburg, also of Mount eels that such practices imply to the child "that sn't have the capability to get people to like him it an outside agent. And you can't arbitrarily e that as an adolescent he will give up this n." Such a drug program, Dernburg believes, l ultimately prevent the child from developing n abilities to deal with his feelings."

me for an immediate examination of the legal ture, of the role that psychoactive drugs play n life.

ust combat the medical-psychiatric model of behavior that seeks a drug for every gical discomfort and under when a person who continuously calm, anxiety-free, happy and is defined as a medical patient.

ust question a medical approach in which ctive drugs are used as an easy solution, a coverup, a simple, acceptable way to avoid dealing with personal and interpersonal problems. Such "treatment" is counterproductive: it tends to become self-perpetuating, it does not solve the underlying problems, it keeps the person from learning how to cope with his world, it often reduces a person's willingness to interact with others, and it may actually impair the body's self-regulating psychological functions. In addition, it lulls the medical and psychiatric professions into false security by suggesting that there is no urgent need for further research, no need for the development of more humanistic approaches.

One of the most disturbing effects of psychoactive drugs is that they convince the drug user and those around him that psychological problems have chemical solutions-that relief is just a swallow away, that better psychological living can be achieved through chemistry, rather than by coping. The attitude that prompts one to seek psychological quick-change in a doctor's office can also lead one to a pusher on the street corner. That the medically prescribed drugs are standardized and chemically purer begs the question.

The drug-abuse problem is compounded by the pharmaceutical companies that seek new drug markets and bigger sales, that exhort everyone to feel better fast, and that persuade physicians and the public that unpleasant human emotions are abnormal and should be suppressed with drugs.

The drug-abuse problem is further intensified by those physicians who see themselves as universal healers, who take the easy route by prescribing psychoactive drugs without considering more relevant proaches. Appealing, simplistic solutions to personal distress are the hallmark of the unprincipled politician, the intolerant social reformer, the medical quack. From a responsible professional the public must demand concern for potential dangers and services confined to areas of competence.

The welfare of society is too precious to be entrusted solely to the hands of physicians. We may have been basing our trust on a myth of medical competence. Perhaps what may be needed in local communities is a citizen review board for medical practice.

No doctor in his right mind would maintain a patient on such a drug, particularily a drug of no therapeutic value, if he knew what was going to happen. If he knew.

..But many doctors, perhaps most doctors, don't know. One of the reasons they don't know is because they get at best a rudimentary training pharmacology in medical school.

- Nicholas von Hoffman.

. . . and uppers

Law-enforcement officials and others concerned with the drug problem in the U.S. have been alarmed for some time about the immense uncontrolled production of amphetamines by U.S. pharmaceutical firms, which produce the drugs cheaper than anywhere else in the world. These firms, as well as supplying the U.S. market, do a large export business, Great Britain included.

In 1970 alone well over 3.5 billion individual dosage units of amphetamines were produced in the U.S., according to statistics from drug firms. Stockpiles could be well over that amount. Figures on actual usage are nearly impossible to come by.

Some say that more than 5 billion individual doses of emphetamines are made a year. Reps. Cornelius E. Gallagher (D) of New Jersey and Claude Pepper (D) of Florida estimate that half of all amphetamines produced wind up in illegal channels.

Production of methamphetamine last year reached more than 1.2 billion doses.

Doping down the little woman.....

By Roland Berg

Spreading their persuasive advertising claims over the pages of widely read scientific journals and medical magazines directed to doctors, the pharmaceutical companies have duped many physicians into prescribing expensive, mood-altering drugs for nonexistent illnesses. And since the ads appear only in these journals, the women who are their ultimate targets never see how they and their problems are portrayed. Here are some examples: A full page photograph shows a woman in her mid-thirties, arms akimbo, a glum, somewhat defiant look on her face. The copy, in bold headlines, proclaims: THE COLLECTOR. AT 35 SHE'S COLLECTED, AMONG OTHER THINGS, A COLLEGE DEGREE SHE'S NEVER USED, TWO CHILDREN UNDERFOOT MOST OF THE DAY, A HUSBAND WHOSE CAREER TAKES HIM AWAY MOST OF THE TIME, A FOLDER OF UNPAID BILLS, AND VARIOUS SYMPTOMS - REAL OR IMAGINED. The copy closes by urging her physician to prescribe the particular tranquilizer the company is peddling.

Another well circulated ad pictures a nail-chewing young housewife gazing apprehensively through prison bars of mops, scrubbing brushes, and brooms. The clarion message to physicians announces: YOU CAN'T SET HER FREE. BUT YOU CAN HELP HER FEEL LESS ANXIOUS. YOU KNOW THIS WOMAN. SHE'S ANXIOUS, TENSE, IRRITABLE SHE'S FELT THIS WAY FOR MONTHS. BESET BY THE SEEMINGLY INSURMOUNTABLE PROBLEMS OF RAISING A YOUNG FAMILY, AND CONFINED TO THE HOME MOST OF THE TIME, HER SYMPTOMS REFLECT A SENSE OF INADEQUACY AND ISOLATION The answer: a magic tranquilizer the company manufacturers.

A third advertisement shows a series of snapshots, covering a period of 15 years, of a young woman posing with different men, including her father. In the final shot, she is standing alone on the deck of a shop. The copy reads: 35, SINGLE, AND PSYCHONEUROTIC. THE PURSER ON HER CRUISE SHIP TOOK THE LAST SNAPSHOT OF JAN. YOU PROBABLY SEE MANY SUCH JANS IN YOUR PRACTICE. THE UNMARRIEDS WITH LOW SELF-ESTEEM. JAN NEVER FOUND A MAN TO MEASURE UP TO HER FATHER. NOW SHE REALIZES SHE'S IN A LOSING PATTERN AND THAT SHE MAY NEVER MARRY. The solution? The company's unique antidepressant for this "tense, overanxious patient who has a neurotic sense of failure, guilt, or loss."

Such ads, a growing number of concerned psychiatrists point out, deceive doctors into prescribing powerful, dangerous drugs for persons who are not mentally or emotionally in need of them.

Queen's people spend government money this summer

By Paul Barron

Close to 400 Queen's students found jobs this summer in projects financed by the federal government's Opportunities for Youth programme. The largest single grant in the Kingston area went to the Student Volunteer Bureau, which received $75,000 and employed 73 students in a variety of projects in and around the city.

About 20 Queen's students worked on the Rideau Trail linking Kingston to Ottawa, while almost 30 others were part of The Warehouse, a youth drop-in centre in an Ontario Street warehouse provided by waterfront developer William Teron.

Of all the Queen's projects, Charles Kelly and the SVB were the first to respond to secretary of state Gerard Pellettier's "challenge to Canada's youth". The day the programme was announced, the SVB had a detailed proposal on the desk at Ottawa. The SVB originally asked for $250,000 to provide jobs for 200 students, but had their budget cut to $75,000 and eight projects.

The summer SVB projects were basically an extension of existing winter programmes, using the same community agencies as contacts. Kelly said that what the SVB did was present to Ottawa "the whole concept of students working in community agencies, which they really hadn't considered before." Their brief pointed out that SVB operates primarily as a placement agency. "The SVB does not become directly involved in the initiation and administration of social service programmes, but rather works through existing structures."

The bureau had a string of successes, although certain projects, such as the community centre drop-in programmes, were not up to the general standards. Some of the problems included a lack of discipline, confusion over responsibilities, and a very loose structure, Kelly said.

But he contracted these weak programmes with the great success of such activities as Camp Ongwanada and the Portsmouth Court project.

Thirteen Queen's students worked with retarded children at the Rockwood unit of the Kingston Psychiatric Hospital (Ongwanada). Progress reports were kept on 63 children; of these 48 showed "visible improvement" over the summer and 23 more showed "small improvement". Students could give individual attention to children when overworked staff did not have the time. One mother wrote to express gratitude for the programme: "I only hope that next year you will all be able to come back to our children."was that they did not leave "a negative thing", that constructive ideas were presented and "we didn't screw it up".

At the Warehouse, Queen's students were busy teaching children the basics of art, drama, films, photography, sculpture and music. A touring drama group visited old people's homes and hospitals in the area. The project was run by Al Stephen and Brad Johns, as an extension of the Aquarius drop-in centre run the previous summer in Clark Hall.

Golden Gaels players Carl Leesti and Mike Lambros ran a free atheltic and recreation programme for young people at Loyalist Collegiate and Vocational Institute in Kingston. The programme ran from early July to mid-August, giving Kingston teenagers a chance to play and gain experience in a variety of sports.

Four students of the School of Urban and Regional Planning did an economic study of Kingston to be used by the city planning board. It was intended to define the major weaknesses and strengths of the city's economy, providing background information to help the Kingston Planning Board set its policies in future.

Geography student David Walker carried on a free school for Kingston children, offering unusual kinds of instruction for primary school children.

Other projects under which Queen's students received Opportunities for Youth grants included the community information service; Pollution Probe's study of oil spillage from ships on Lake Ontario; Theatre Five's programme of children's theatre; a study of present and possible future methods of garbage disposal in Kingston; and the Queen's Wind Ensemble, which presented noon-hour concerts each Thursday on the lawn by Agnes, and played at other times for those on campus.

When, in the fall of '69, a tenacious Queen's defence held the winners of the traditionally stronger western conference scoreless on their home ground in London, while a victorious attack drove home three goals to win the Blackwood Trophy as OQAA champions, it was the first time in living memory, or at least since the war, that Queen's, or, for that matter, any other eastern conference team, had returned triumphant from the play-off game. Two previous Queen's teams, both undefeated in the east, those of '65 and '67, had gone to that game only to be trounced by Toronto. (The '66 and '68 teams were edged out of the playoff by McGill and Montreal respectively.) Not content with this, the heroes of '69 went on to assume the title of "Champions of Central Canada" by defeating Loyola, and Laurentian, on the same day! Unfortunately, there was no national championship organized in that year.

Last year, with the first ever National Soccer Championship to aim at, and inspired by the spirit of Johnny Walker, the Golden Soccer Gaels marched undefeated to the play-off game, despite two difficult encounters with Carleton. At that point, however, they had to bow out gracefully to a superior McMaster combination, which was only held from the national championship by a net of steady Newfoundlanders.

Coach Johnny Walker is back for the coming season with a handful of veterans, but the old league is gone. So too it seems is the National Soccer Championship, immured by Memorial on their island out of the financial reach of the rest of Canada's colleges.

Although the "East" division of the new OQAA, lacking the Quebec teams, is considerably weaker than its counterpart in the defunct OQAA, Queen's still faces strong opposition in Carleton. Nor can Ottawa be forgotten. After all, they were the only team to beat Queen's in '69, though admittedly through an oversight. Trent is an unknown quantity.

The play-off structure for the OQAA pits the winner of the East against the winner of the Central division, which consists of York, Ryerson, Brock, and Laurentian; and the winner of that duel to challenge the winner of the strong West division of Toronto, McMaster, Western, Waterloo, Guelph. Since the first of these play-offs is at the East winner's home ground, Queen's fans may well be having the pleaure of seeing the game that might send their team to that fatal battle somewhere west of Yonge St.

It is still too early to judge the strength of this year's soccer Gaels, but certainly there will need to be a lot of new talent. Half of last year's team have graduated out of the league, and serious injury has cost three more players their places. Em. Richardson, who broke a leg for the sake of three cartilage operations, Ian Jones, and Max Pirribauer will each have to share the action from the sidelines this year. (If the Department of Physical Plant could arrange to provide some seating at the games, it would be much appreciated.) Nevertheless, there are some very impressive players going through their paces.

Here We Go Again

BY DAVE CAMERON

On Saturday afternoon at 2 p.m. at George Richardson Memorial Stadium (West Campus version) the Queen's Golden Gaels will once again try their luck as they play the University of Waterloo Warriors. Last year, in the good old OQAA, the Gales defeated Waterloo 20-6. This year, however there is a slightly revised look for both teams as the Gaels have managed to obtain the entire Warrior offence in the person of one Gord McLellan, one of the league's premier halfbacks. In fact, if it hadn't been for the efforts of McLellan and Brian Warrender, last week's game with Ottawa would have been the worst massacre since Little Big Horn.

At this time we don't know too much about this year's edition of the Warriors. Considering their loss last Saturday to the Western Mustangs, 23-7, it can be assumed that they have not hit any more startling heights than last year, especially with the loss of McLellan.

This means that the Gaels should win this Saturday, even if they don't improve on their effort of last week. It is reasonable to expect, however, that the Gaels can tighten up both the offence and defense, and play as a team rather than as individuals who just happen to be wearing the same colour uniform.

We'll go out on a limb and predict that the Gales will win by a couple of touchdowns on Saturday, and if the anticipated improvement is displayed by the team, they could win by a bushel full of touchdowns.

Saturday's outcome: Gaels by two touchdowns.

Noteably

It would help the Gales a lot if they had a large crowd at the stadium to watch the game. It would also be nice if this same crowd could create enough noise that they won't be shouted down by a couple of hundred visiting students again.

The game is on Saturday. Make a point to be there.

The Gales will appreciate your support.

The leading pass receiver for the Bramalea Satellites of the ORFU is Tommy "Touchdown" Chown (remember him?) with 21 receptions for 395 yards. CFL material for next year?

Sports Skills

The Students of Physical and Health Education will offer the optional Sports Skill Instruction program in five week sessions, commencement dates being September 27, November 1, January 17, 1972, and February 21.

The program enables students to learn and or improve various sports, which range from indoor and outdoor court games to team, individual, and combatitive sports, along with skating, swimming, and other aquatic activities.

The program is supervised by qualified Physical Education staff. The classes emphasize instruction and practice in a specific sport skill and participants will then be encouraged to take part in regular intramural or recreational programs, or to play during free time as allocated by the department.

Registration takes place in advance for each course and some courses are restricted to a certain number. Classes will be filled on a first come basis during the announced registration period; the first being September 20-24 from 1 to 5 p.m. in the Physical Education Center.

It is up to you to take advantage of such a program so that you can learn new skills and make use of the facilities available in the Physical Education Center.

Further inquiries should be directed to Howard Pearce, the Recreational Co-ordinator. His office is located in the Phys. Ed Center and he may be reached at 547-6984.

Just Add Water and Stir

By JIM WRIGHT

In a recent comment upon the organization of the O.U.A.A. the suggestion that there was a mis-matching of teams brought some criticism. The point was not to suggest that the O.Q.A.A. should have been continued, but rather that there should have been a division according to talent. This could have been fashioned on the (are I say it) World Hockey Association where the top team of the 'B' division can move up to the 'A' Division while the bottome team of the 'A' Division drops into the 'B' Division. This would have eliminated the upcoming home series between the Ottawa Gees Gees and the York Yeomen and Laurentian voyagers, an almost certain four victories for the Ottawa team.

With the above clarification on the last article here also is the promised description of the way in which playoffs will be taking place.

The Northern Division (which we have mistakenly referred to as Eastern) winner shall meet the central Division winner at the home of the Central winner. On the same day the winner of the Capital Division shall play the winner of the Western Division on the Capital Division field. The final shall be played on the western-most field.

In the case of ties, the winner of a division will be determined by the point spread in games played between the two teams tied. If a tie should still exist it will be broken by overall point spread.

There is also a provision whereby the second place team in one division may replace the first place team of the other division within the same section if the second place team has beaten the first place team of the other division and has a better overall record. As the second place team of the Capital division is almost assured of three losses and there is virtually no chance of an upset by York or Laurentian it is safe to suggest that only the first place teams of the Capital and Northern divisions will be in the playoffs.

Six teachers at St. Lawrence College in Kingston are being let go because the college's grant has been cut by $300,000 from the expected amount.

The college moved to formula financing this year (the grant is based on enrollment) and enrollment so far is 1,023, about 92 less than expected by the college.

Enrollment last year was 885.

About 1,350 workers in General Motors plants throughout Ontario will be laid off by Nov. 1.

About 600 are expected to go in Oshawa, 525 in St. Catharines, 175 in Windsor and 55 in Scarborough. The company has already laid off 160 men in Oshawa and another 570 in Ste. Therese, Quebec.

A spokesman for the American-owned corporation said that Japanese competition was the reason for the reduction in the Canadian work force, but Dennis McDermott, head of the United Auto Workers criticized GM for callous disregard for Canadian workers because the company was simply moving to countries outside North America to produce cars and car parts with cheaper labour.

McDermott also blasted the international company by saying, "They have no national indentity and they couldn't care less whether the American or Canadian workers suffer."

Montreal Assistant Chief Attorney Normandin was getting garrulous in his hotel room at the Couchiching conference last August, as he talked with a few guests about the War Measures Act. Apparently assured that no one would quote him, he stated frankly what most "subversives" in Quebec have been saying for months:

The federal, provincial and municipal authorities "knew very well" that they couldn't make charges stick to the hundreds of people they arrested after Oct. 16. It was necessary, "in a situation of chaos" to "get the leaders off the streets" and decapitate the left and the nationalists, "in case they got tempted to violent action."

The authorities were so panic-stricken that, Normandin revealed, an armed attempt to take over Montreal's City Hall was expected, and troops surrounding the building had orders to shoot on any crowd trying to illegally "storm" the building.

The House of Commons debated Tuesday a Conservative motion to impeach three cabinet ministers for allegedly breaking the law.

Gerald Baldwin, Conservative House leader, accused Finance Minister Benson, Justice Minister Turner, and Manpower Minister Lang of breaking the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act by defaulting on payment of $90 million to the Canadian Wheat Board. However, Speaker Lucien Lamoreux, after 90 minutes of argument, ruled out the motion, saying impeachment never had any status in Canadian parliamentary rules and was even obsolete in Britain.

The new bill to replace the temporary act is in the report stage in the Commons, the step before third and final reading.

Tobacco manufacturers announced Tuesday that they will voluntarily end cigarette advertising on radio and television by Jan. 1.

The Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers Council also said that manufacturers will begin printing a warning on all cigarette packages, in both English and French, saying, "Warning: Excessive smoking may be hazardous to your health."

The Council also noted, however, that it still believes "that cigarette smoking has not been demonstrated to be the cause of any disease and that the present indictment is based essentially on statistical information."

Health Minister John Munro had introduced a bill in June to ban cigarette advertising by Jan. 1, but its enactment had been deferred.

Perhaps without knowing it, the federal government recently took a stand on an issue that has long divided English and French Canadians.

The $550,000, government-commissioned report of the Committee on Youth contains a province-by-province survey of what young Canadians want. The section is illustrated with a graphic of four young people, with a white-on-black outline map of Canada across their chests. The graphic is repeated on ten different pages, each time with the province under discussion being marked out in solid white.

The marked-out portion indicating Quebec includes the disputed territory of Labrador: the portio indicating Newfoundland (officially known as the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador) does not.

THE WORLD

CHINA - Sudden cancellation of China's massive October 1st parade has given rise to widespread speculation that Chairman Mao Tse Tung, the elderly leader of the Chinese Communist Party, has been the victim of a "major heart attack", perhaps fatal.

Observers in Hong Kong, while reporting they have no news of Mao's death, state "there are, nevertheless, some definite signs of a crisis-type situation". Mao, 77, has not been seen in public since August 7, when he met some visiting foreign officials.

Chinese Embassy Officials in Ottawa termed the rumors "nonsense, all nonsense" and added "we all know Chairman Mao is in very good health".

Although extensive preparations for the parade had been executed, the last-minute cancellation marks the first time in the Republic's 22-year history that there will be no celebration commemorating the Communist achievement in China.

USA - The United States Senate, by a vote of 55 to 30, passed a bill which will extend the military draft until June 30, 1973. President Nixon is expected to sign the bill into law immediately.

One of the consequences of the new bill will be the "right" of the selective service to induct university students into military servitude before the completion of their academic programs. The American Civil Liberties Union is expected to challenge the new law in a test case before the Supreme Court this fall.

BRITAIN - Britain and the six nations of the European Common Market agreed to one of the last remaining items in negotiations over British entry into the Market - interim policy making.

The plan is that any decision affecting the interests of Britain and its fellow candidats, Ireland, Denmark, and Norway, will be referred to an interim committee made up of permanent representatives and ambassadors to the market.

Medically-induced carbon-dioxide comas might kill drug addiction, according to doctors at Hahnemann Medical College in Philadelphia, who report the carbon-dioxide therapy appeared to eliminate the patients desire for drugs. By comparison, the drug substitute methadone while taking the place of more harmful drugs, is still addicting, enabling the individual being treated to function only at a lower than normal capacity.

British businessmen were again without their dailies on the morning train as a shutdown forced by inter-union disputes over pay differences stretches into the sixth day.

The publishers of the London and Manchester editions of the eight papers involved shut down presses Saturday night and warned technicians they would stay silent until the dispute was settled.

The only paper still being printed is the Communist paper, the Workers' Daily.

USA - The US House of Representatives accepted Wednesday a Senate-passed bill to ban the Amchitka Island underground nuclear test "unless the president gives his direct approval for such a test".

The Senate's restriction on use of funds for the test was written into a compromise $4.7 billion public works appropriation bill.

The House passed the compromise 376 to 0 and sent it to the Senate for final action.

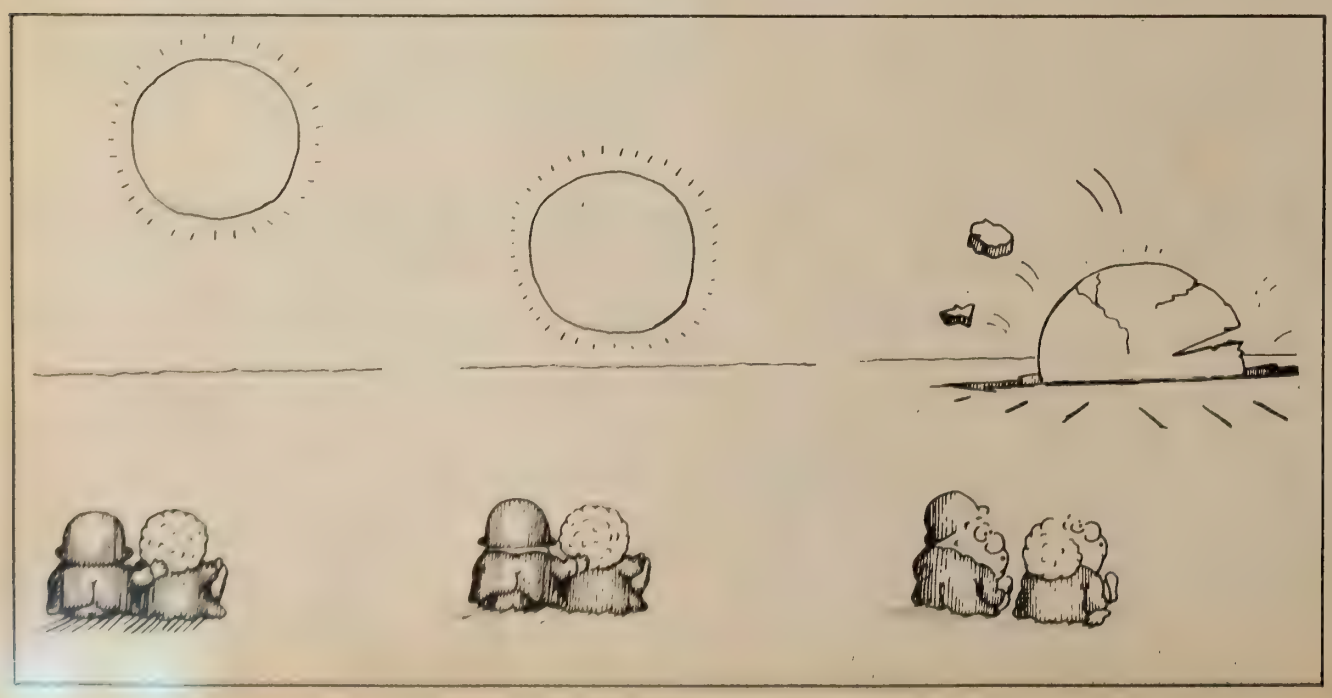
Final atuposy reports disclosed Tuesday that "Soledad" black revolutionary George Jackson was shot in the back, not in the head, at San Quentin Aug. 21.

A pathologist reported the bullet travelled through Jackson's body in a way that would have been "almost impossible" if Jackson were shot, as prison officials contended, from the 20-ft guard tower.

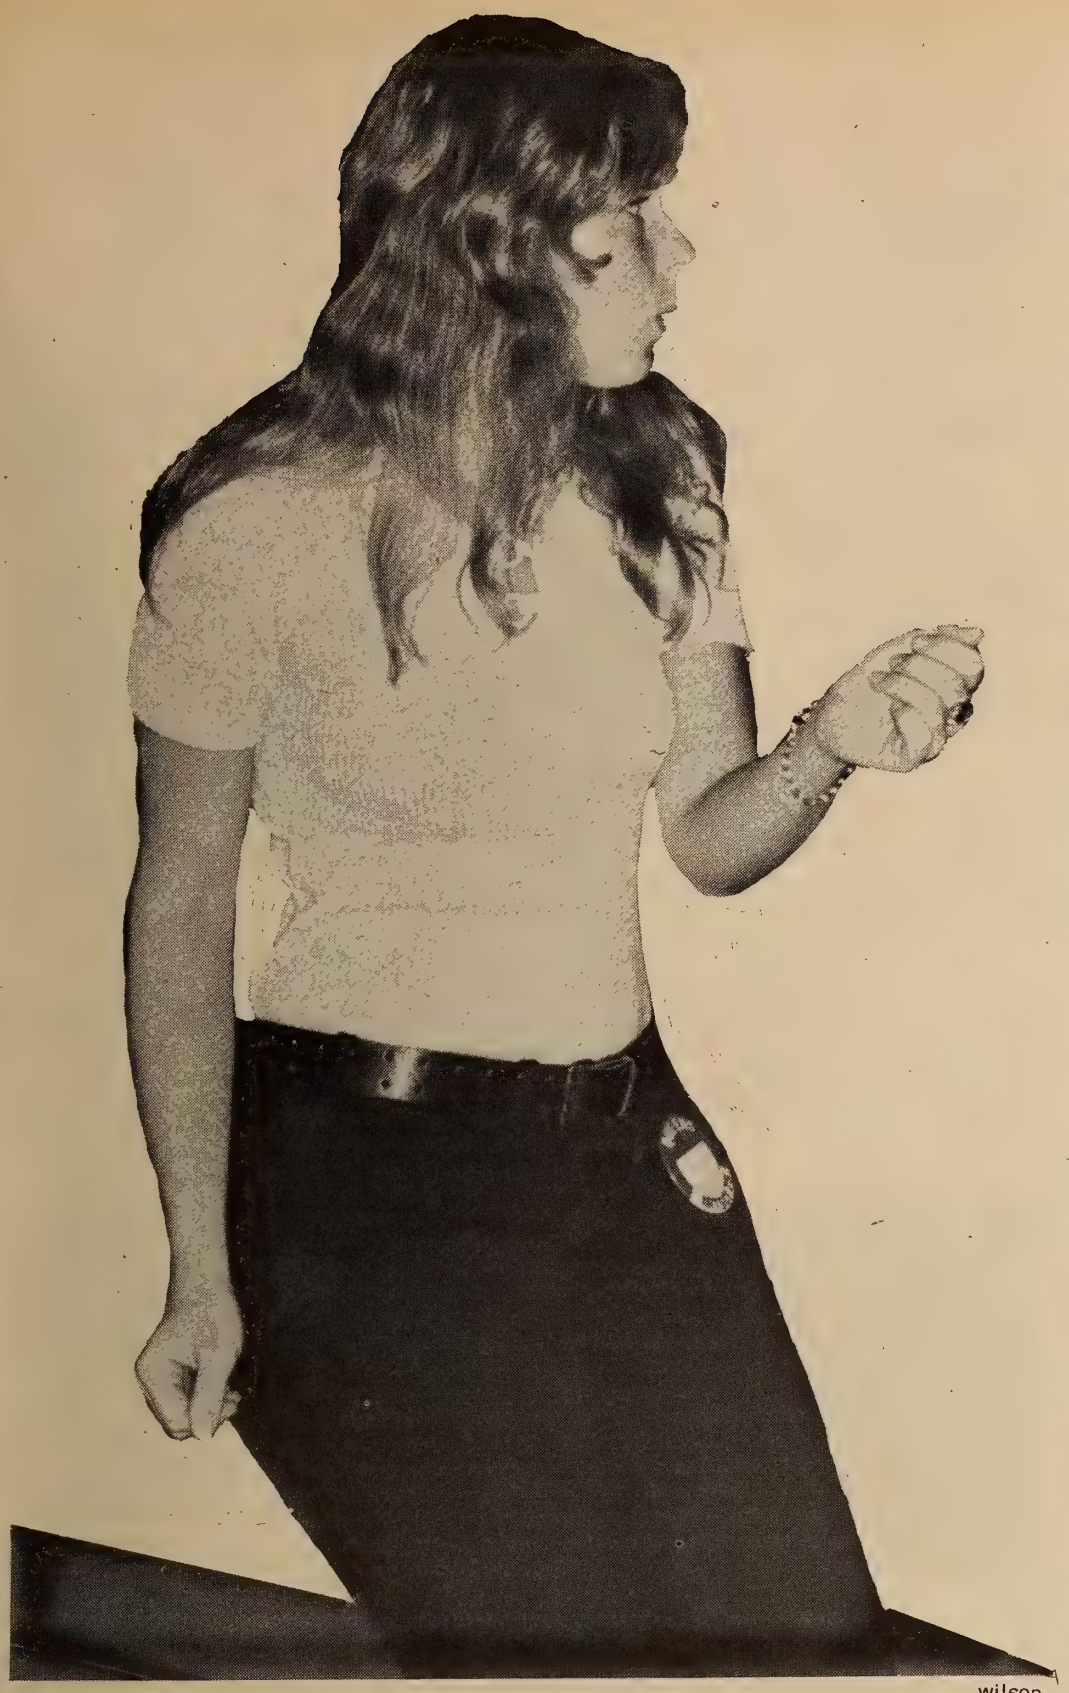
Jackson's relatives had consistently doubted the prison story, aruging that Jackson was "set up" to be killed because he was a national symbol of prison revolution.

VIETNAM - The South Vietnamese Senate has asked President Nguyen van Thieu to call off upcoming presidential elections, in which he is the only candidate, claiming the elections were "against the will of the people". It said that if the one-man vote goes through the government will be unable to lead the country and South Vietnam would not survive.

In a special session, the Senate passed a declaration stating that if Thieu ignores the request "it will bring a more critical situation...and the country will collapse". The vote has only the power of a recommendation, and it did not seem likely that Thieu would heed the plea.



Thieu became the only candidate when his opponents, Vice-president Ky and Gen. Duong van Minh dropped out, charging Theiu with rigging the elections.



RUSSIA - Women in the Soviet Union are too busy earning salaries and tending families to have much energy left over for a North American-style women's liberation movement. Millions of women in socialist countries bear the double burden of having a job eight hours a day and then being the homemaker, mother, wife, cook, shooper, and clothes washer.

It is little wonder that so many East European social studies these days focus on the falling birth rate, on divorce, fatigue,and the rising infertility of working women.

Since World War II, men's wages have been so low in Eastern Europe that married women have had to work to save for a first child, a home, or a car.

As standards a child meant absence from work and although maternity arrangements in Socialist countries are relatively generous, the sacrifice was too great to contemplate with a family budget geared to buying an apartment, a car, and vacations abroad.

Employers still welcome

The university senate agreed Thursday that it was strongly opposed to denying any company access to the Queen's campus for job recruiting.

Discussing the recommendations of the senate's special committee on grievance, discipline and related matters, senators engaged in a long debate on on-campus job recruiting, sparked by recommendation 17 of the report, which advocates giving the AMS (the student government) the responsibility for laying down rules about recruitment, and the power of "of denying or allowing access of recruiters in specific cases".

The purpose of the recommendations, according to Dr. Ronald L. Watts, dean of arts and science and also chairman of the committee which wrote the report, was to give students a way of voicing objections they might have to moral stands taken by some companies, without having to resort to violence or demonstrations as has happened elsewhere, especially when Dow Chemical Company recruiters appeared on campus.

Several senators insisted that no campus body should be allowed to keep any legal group from using campus facilities for any lawful purpose. They said that to deny access to a recruiting company would interfere with the rights of people who wanted to be recruited.

This view eventually won out, and a motion by student senator Paul Burke, to delete reference to "denying or allowing access", was passed by the senate, which is the chief governing body of Queen's.

Burke said he intended that the deletion would restrict the university to merely looking after the booking and timetabling necessary to arrange recruiting, without having the power to deny anyone access to the university.

Watts said he interpreted the motion differently, to mean that the senate opposed actually denying access to campus to anyone, but still thought someone should have the right to do so.

In another amendment to the recommendation, the power to set recruitment policy was given to the senate, rather than the AMS, on the grounds that such decisions are too important to be delegated.

Voting lists posted

Queen's residences and the rest of Ontario were enumerated last week in preparation for the provincial election October 21. Preliminary voters' lists are now posted in each voting district.

Enumeration in the residences was done in Leonard and Ban Righ meal lines late last week. Residences have never been enumerated before since until the recent lowering of the age of majority few students there were eligible to vote.

The AMS has announced a special arrangement for students who find their names still missing from the posted lists.

Such students can report their name, address and telephone number in the usual way to the chief electoral officer for the riding of Kingston and the Islands, whose office is at 80 Johnson Street downtown (phone 546-3223).

But they can also leave this information at a specially marked box in the AMS office in the basement of the Union. The AMS will forward such information to the chief electoral officer every day this week.

Enumerators will then contact the person to make sure he is an eligible voter.

Anyone who cannot find a posted voters' list can contact the electoral office to ask whether his name appears o it.

Chief electoral officer Mike McDonough, or his staff, is also the person to see if a student wants to vote by proxy in another riding which he considers to be his permanent residence (rather than Kingston). Proxy arrangements must be made well in advance of the election.

Polling places on or near campus have not yet been announced.

Interlibrary loans available

Undergraduate students can now borrow books from libraries at other universities in Ontario, through the interlibrary loan service of Douglas Library. Except for an experimental period last year, this service has only been available for graduates and faculty before now.

The service which the library calls UGILL (undergraduate interlibrary loan), was approved last week by the Ontario Council of University Librarians.

Books which are not available on the Queen's campus will be obtained, on request, by the Interlibrary loan office. The usual loan period is two weeks; another two weeks is usually needed to obtain the book.

During the four-month trial period last year, 163 Queen's undergraduates asked for interlibrary loans. Of these, almost half got their material purchased by the library or found alternatives; the rest were served by interlibrary loan.

Interlibrary loan information is available at the interlibrary loan office on the main floor of Douglas Library.

Student loan changes proposed

Student leaders of Ontario universities spent much of the summer discussing the Ontario Student Awards Programme and suggesting alternatives or improvements, particularly to make the programme more sensitive to individual students.

One suggestion was that government awards and scholarships, such as the Ontario Scholarships for high-ranking Grade XIII graduates, be brought under the control of the OSAP programme to improve efficiency.

Another possibility was that the procedure for appeals from students be decentralized. If application deadlines were put earlier in the year (the deadline is September 30 this year) appeals could be processed sooner as well. It was also proposed that regional boards consider appeals rather than a central body, to improve understanding of local problems and living costs.

Part-time and out of province students should be able to get loans more easily, the student leaders suggested.

Queen's was represented at the conference on awards by AMS president Patrick Riley. It was one of a series of summer conferences in which Ontario student presidents discussed common problems.

A major recommendation from the conference was that new interpretations be put on the summer earnings requirement which limits a student's OSAP grant.

A new formula would help students who could not find jobs at all or who spent the summer at social work such as Opportunities for Youth projects.

Representation on the OSAP board should be expanded to include a nursing student, a graduate student, as well as the students now on that board, the conference decided.

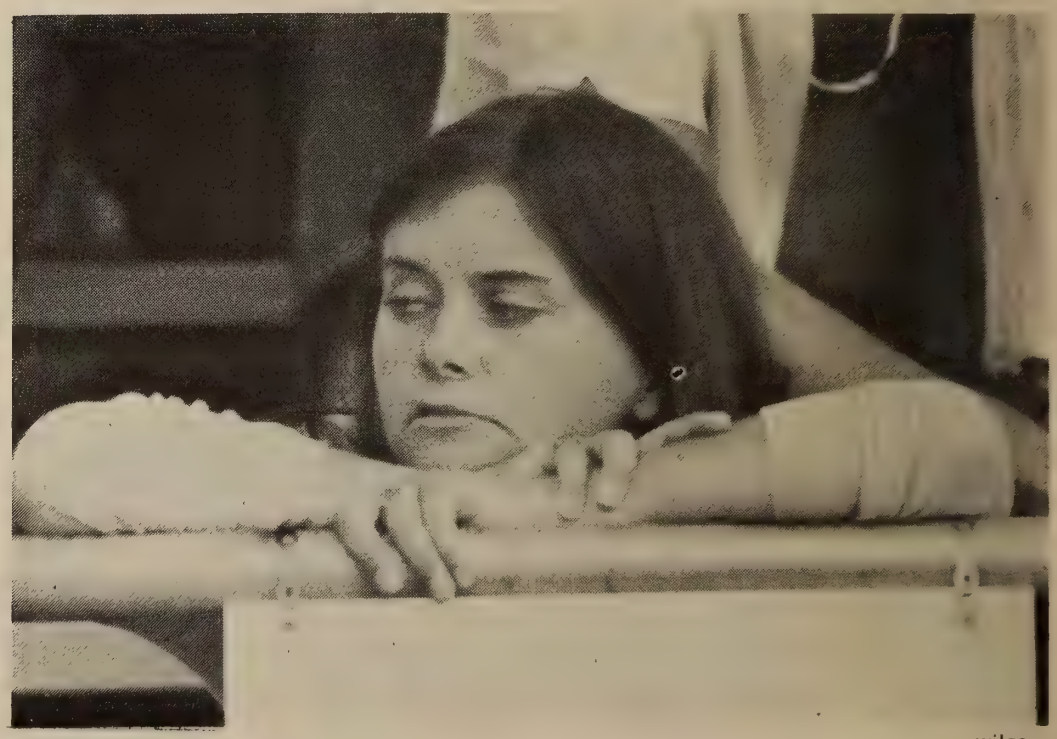
D. N. Ellis assistant registrar (student awards) at Queen's, said he agreed with many of the proposals. Part-time students definitely should be able to benefit more from OSAP, he said.

But Ellis said that expansion of student representation on the OSAP board which already has seventeen members, might make it unwieldy and slow.

The proposals will be considered October 5 by a meeting of the Ontario Student Awards Committee.

Elrond is getting closer

Elrond College, the student co-op being built at Princess and Division Streets, will be ready for tenants in the spring of 1971 unless something unexpected happens, according to project director John Blanchard.



The 400 students who move into the building will find more than just a place to live, Blanchard said. Elrond includes photo labs, a sauna bath, and workrooms of many kinds; it is intended to be more than just another example of typical Kingston living accommodation.

Prices in Elrond will vary. A two-bedroom apartment is likely to rent for about $170 a month, Blanchard said; a share in a twelve-man co-op unit would cost about $1100 for the year, comparable to residence and including food. (Elrond food services will be provided by a hired staff, not a caterer as is done in residence, he said.)

The emphasis will be on cooperative living. Students created Elrond, and students will run it once it opens, Blanchard commented. It will be he said, "a learning experience through actually doing".

About Christmas this year, the Elrond student promoters will start soliciting memberships and commitments from people who want live in Elrond. A temporary organization for living will be started then, using Queen's facilities, so that when people move into the building a functioning system will move in as well, Blanchard said.

The advance organization is intended to spare Elrond the confusion often suffered by newly-started communities. But, Blanchard pointed out, Elrond is definitely intended to be a community; the plans for internal operation and the very design of the building emphasize this.

Placement office has new home, new programmes

By Maureen New

The employment and placement services on campus have reorganized and found a new home. Under the title of Career Planning and Placement, the service is at 27 Queen's Crescent -- Goodwin House, across from Ban Righ Hall.

Dave Wroe, director of the

service, said the new operation represents a merger of the old Student Employment Service and the placement facilities of the still older Placement and Housing Service, which has left its housing and property management functions in Clark Hall.

The purpose of the service is to provide students with assistance in planning their careers. The office will help students formulate their ideas about possible careers, and then implement these plans. The information available covers many aspects of a career -- how to enter a certain area of interest, information on the occupations available, the advantages and disadvantages of certain kinds of jobs.

The library at the career service has descriptions of the careers related to certain fields of study, plus directories listing companies and government agencies which hire graduates from various programmes.

The service will also help students find "meaningful" summer employment -- that is, a summer job directed towards the career the student has chosen. When this is not possible, students are helped to find summer jobs which will round out their general interests and personalities.

The service is in contact with companies, government agencies and Queen's graduates who are looking for summer employees. Wroe emphasized that the service will not give a student a job, but merely help in finding one.

Two series of career seminars will be held by the service this year, in which representatives of various careers, including teachers, consulting engineers, chartered accountants, and a representative of the public service commission, will meet with interested students.

The seminars, intended for students in all faculties, will be open discussions with various points of view expressed. The fall series is aimed for graduating students, and the spring series for those who are not graduating in 1972 but would like to look ahead and plan.

The Journal will probably also carry a column on career placement, with information about interviews, job possibilities, and the seminar series.

On-campus recruitment by companies will be coordinated by Wroe's office as well. Though recruiting in person is becoming less common, some employers do send representatives to see students, who usually must fill out an interview application in advance.

Wroe emphasized that the Career Planning and Placement Service is not the only place to look in finding a job. And he stressed that students who find good permanent jobs are those who work hard at finding them.

New appointments made

The university has announced three new appointments:

Dr. Michael W. Partington, acting head of the department of paediatrics, becomes official department head. His particular specialty is development paediatrics and genetics.

Dr. R.D. Heyding becomes head of the department of chemistry. He has been a chemistry professor here since 1962 and was previously with the National Research Council.

Samuel S. Lazier, professor of civil engineering, becomes executive assistant to the vice-principal (administration), R.J. Kennedy. Lazier ("SSL") has been marshal of convocations since the installation of former principal Dr. J. Alex Corry in 1961. He is chairman of the curriculum committee of the faculty of applied science.

Freshman class chooses leaders

Artsci 75 elected its executive Wednesday night in Dunning Hall. President of the arts and science freshman year will be Christ Taylor of York Mills.

Taylor said he is concerned with the lack of communication he finds in Artsci 75, and hopes to improve it. He said he was disappointed that only about 200 members of the year came to the election meeting, but added that if everyone had come Dunning Hall auditorium would not have been able to hold the meeting (it has about 400 seats, and there are 1300 members of Artsci 75).

Vice-president Steve Ruddy, of Renfrew, said he wants to get involved in student government to help the freshmen enjoy being members of Artsci 75. Particularly, he said in his nomination speech, he wants to get involved in next year's orientation programme.

Ruddy said members of Artsci 75 felt "left out" in comparison to Science 75, who were cohesive by the end of frosh week. He said this was the result of hazing and that there should be more hazing and "more varied activities" in orientation next year.

The secretary will be Lizza Sherwin, of Baltimore, Ontario. She said she is tired of "going from party to party" and wants to get organized. Miss Sherwin blamed the low turnout for the election on poor publicity.

Treasurer will be Bill Warborton; social convenor is Vicky Wilgress; publicity coordinator is Janet Ritchie.

Admissions low across Ontario

The number of students who applied for admission, and finally were admitted, to Ontario universities this year was much lower than predicted last January, according to a report from the Council of Ontario Universities presented to the Queen's senate Thursday.

Dr. Michael Sayer, who with principal Dr. John J. Deutsch represents Queen's on the Council, said the Council's preliminary figures show that many high school graduates have chosen to spend a year travelling or working, rather than going directly on to university.

He also said a major cause of the shortfall below expected enrollment was that many second and third-year students have not come back to university to complete their degree programmes.

Graduate schools have been hit by the shortfall even more than undergraduate programmes. Few Ontario graduate schools, if any, have as many students this fall as they had expected.

Of the thirteen provincially-supported universities in Ontario, only six have as many students as had been predicted last winter.

Queen's is one of them, with a record enrollment of around 8700. The number of applications for first year at Queen's was also a record -- almost seven times the number of places available -- and, as a result, Queen's was the first university to fill virtually its whole first-year class for this fall.

Reply to Eric Mann

(In last Tuesday's Journal)

Perhaps the most irritating things about Eric Mann's address (in last Tuesday's Journal) is not so much the nature of his argument but the fact that he is bothering to argue it at all. The Help-the-system-is-crushing-me-and-it'll crush- you- too-if-you-don't-watch-out whine has been standard fare in every high school and college newspaper for the past six or seven years and, valid or not, Mann's arguments say nothing that hasn't been said many times before.

Aside from the fact that he, like so many of his colleagues in revolution, finds so much to criticize that he never quite gets around to offering any constructive suggestions or alternatives, his criticisms themselves seem rather unconvincing. After three columns of lamentations over the quality of life at university his basic conclusion is that college "is a pretty good place, but it just wasn't for me", which makes one wonder just what point Mann is trying to make in recounting his whole unhappy story. Any idiot could tell you that someone who "doesn't like to read and write too much" is not going to find college life very rewarding. And if his only motive for staying after his freshman year was to obtain "that piece of paper" it's little wonder he left bitter.

I was intrigued by his hypothetical situation of approaching the average person on the street with an offer to return to college life; for, taking the "average person on the street" as an accountant, public works employee, banker or housewife, it is known that, contrary to Mann's beliefs, many of these people would jump at this offer, were they able. Many do in fact, and in increasing numbers every year - despite the fact that it will involve many hours of reading and writing. What Mr. Mann plans to do in the coming years that will be so much more rewarding with so much less personal application I can't imagine. Being revolutionary may be fun, but it's hardly a living, and suffers a notoriously early retirement age.

Another interesting point was his rather sweeping statement of motive: "You went there . . . because you could say you went to Cornell". This apparently does not apply to Mann, however, for he tells us that he went to university with the highest ideals and intentions of "finding himself". In using the word "you" is he trying to tell me what my motives are, or is he simply referring to an attitude unique to Cornell? If the former is true, then he is lying and speaking of things of which he has no knowledge. If the latter is true, I sympathize with him, but I can't imagine of what significance it is to the frosh at University of Waterloo. I doubt many go there so that they might brag about it.

Mann is himself revealed as a man of strange motives. His only reason, it seems, for working to achieve academic success was to distinguish himself from the crowd ("with anyting below eighty you were then run of the mill"). Yet his desire for individuality was not so strong as to prevent him from joining a fraternity which was "against everything we stand for". Hmmm.

The last two columns of the article are devoted to a general denunciation of the entire educational and economic systems of the non-communist world, although it is aimed specifically at Canada. And what solution does Mann offer to this apparently hopeless situation? There are, he claims, two courses open to us; either we sell our souls to the Establishment, or become radicals.

I really feel that considering the number and gravity of the problems discussed by Mann, the overall solution of "become a radical" seems childishly simple, if not simply childish. Yet nowhere in his speech does he offer any more acceptable alternative to The Great Nasty System. Nowhere does he present a suggestion for constructive change or improvements.

In the final analysis all this appears a bit short-sighted, but let's not worry about that. Let's do what Mann says is expected of us – to help ourselves and become radials. Let's tear down the system wherever we find it, and when we're not doing that we can go to Waterloo and other places to persuade the frosh to join our cause. And when the system is finally and entirely destroyed and everyone's a radical, Mann will consider it a job well done and hopefully retire to find the long sought-after peace, to walk in the springtime, to enjoy life all the time, and maybe read a book or two.

Admissions down

Rethinking of universities needed

By Bill Johnston

Post-secondary education seems to be losing its hold on the minds of high school graduates and other post-secondary school people, and the result could be problems or opportunities for the universities of Ontario.

Without having exact figures on admissions yet, the Council of Universities of Ontario has found three major trends in university admissions this fall. First, the number of students going directly from high school to post-secondary education is less than had been predicted earlier this year. Second, large numbers of second and third year students have not returned to university this fall to complete their degree programmes. Third, admissions to graduate schools are well below predicted levels.

The result is that the total number of admissions is well below the predicted levels and only six of Ontario's 13 universities, including Queen's, have taken in their predicted number of students.

This, of course, has come as quite a surprise to university administrators, who had been anticipating that universities would be swamped with applicants this fall and that enrollment would continue to rise for at least the next decade.

The current unemployment situation and the difficulties faced by graduates in finding any work last spring, let alone work related to their education, is undoubtedly the major cause for this apparent disaffection with higher education. Throughout the sixties, the degree had been touted as essential to a good job, to the extent that the university appeared to have only one purpose, the supplying of job tickets for its graduates. It now cannot fill that function and people may well be reluctant to spend four years in acquiring a degree that would be useless.

The trends may also indicate that the university has become irrelevant to a number of people. Those who seek an education may have become turned off by the over-emphasis on job training at the universities and have sought other means than school to find what they seek.

Also, whereas the universities in the mid-sixites were centres of radical activism, in the past year or so it has become increasingly apparent that those seeking to change the world for the better have concentrated their efforts on working amongst the people of the community and have dismissed the university as irrelevant, too remote from the people and their problems and too tied into the system to play any meaningful role in changing society.

The reasons for not returning to university may be more simple and pragmatic, though. Many people may have simply decided to take a break from school before continuing, a praiseworthy decision since a person's outlook and understanding of the world can only be broadened by a year or more away from the narrow, artificial climate of the school system.

Many of the potential grad students who are not attending university this fall may also simply be responding to the attempts of the Ontario Department of University Affairs to discourage people from going to grad school by cutting the province's graduate fellowships from a total of $5 million to $3.5 million.

The decision of potential students not to become students, as well as the attitudes indicated by these decisions, will have important affects on the universities.

An immediate affect will be an upsetting of universities' budgets. Universities' revenue predictions, upon which budgets are based; are based on enrollment predictions, with about 17 per cent of revenues coming from tuition fees, and the majority of rest coming from weighted per capita grants from the government. For those seven universities with shortfalls in admissions, revenues will be less than planned for and some programmes or plans will have to be scrapped to make up for this.

Shortfalls in graduate schools will be the most serious, since grants per grad student are as much as six times as large as those for each undergraduate student. (Queen's, which has a slight shortfall in graduate admissions, took in 130 more undergraduates than planned for to make up for the loss in graduate grants.)

The trend towards a situation where university does not automatically follow high school, if it continues, may imply that a different type of student will appear on campus, which could change the character of the universities. As students recognize that university degrees are no guarantee of a job, perhaps fewer will attend with no real reason for being here, and those that do come will be more concerned with education, rather than training. This could imply a situation where classes and school work became important ends in themselves, rather than things which must be put up with, and where the social aspects and extra-curricular aspects of university life could decline, with unfortunate results in terms of the university producing well-rounded people.

Perhaps the most important consequence of the apparent changes in attitudes towards university could be the opportunity which this presents the universities to re-asses just what their purpose is, and how it should be fulfilled.

The people who set university policy could conclude that the universities should return to being institutions of learning, for its own sake, rather than trying to be job trainer and baby-sitter for the post-highschool persons. There is much to be said for this concept, although it has been frequently criticized by those who claim the university must meet the needs of society which supports it financially.

As an institution dedicated solely to learning and critical thought, the university could actually serve society in many ways better than it does now. No society can long grow and develop, or even survive, without the input from its intellectuals, who are allowed to stand off from society and pursue knowledge and who, from that vantage point, can see society in novel ways that those deeply involved in it cannot. Such institutions would also benefit society by preparing those who go through them for life in ways that the present job-training function being fulfilled cannot.

In any event, the trends indicated by this fall's admissions figures indicate that many of the assumptions upon which much of the comment about education has been made may not be valid, most particularly the assumption that enrollment in universities will continue to grow at the phenomenal rate that it has in the past decade. Thus, much rethinking about education will be necessary.

It is perhaps unfortunate that the one major attempt at assessing what higher education should be attempting and how it should be attempting it, the Department of University Affairs' Commission on Post-Secondary Education, is due to issue its report this fall and will most likely base much of its study on trends and information which existed before this summer and fall. Further self-evaluation may be required should this be the case.

White bread...

By John Leary, science Editor, Saturday Review

The shortcomings of bleached flour have been warned against repeatedly by students of human nutrition since the days when the late Dr. Harvey W. Wiley began crusading for adoption of federal food and drug laws early in this century. One of the latest cautions appears in the Nader's Raiders book The Chemical Feast, James S. Turner's study of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA). The book says:

President Nixon's French-born nutrition advisor, Dr. Jean Mayer, thinks that America's white bleached doughs would not even be called bread in his native land. Their food value is almost zero. White flour is preferred by food industry executives because it keeps on the shelf longer than the more nutritious whole wheat bread and because insects avoid it — it doesn't have enough food value to keep them alive.

Bakers and other defenders of flour bleaching speak of the enrichment process which follows the bleachings. But the Chemical Feast says, and Dr. Henry Schroeder (director of the Trace Elements Laboratory at Dartmouth Medical School) confirms, that of the approximately two dozen nutrients removed from wheat in the processing of white flour, only four are later restored. These are vitamins B1, B2, B3, and iron. The value of the iron is questionable because it is in the ferric form, which the body does not absorb well; it is ferrous iron that readily fits the chemistry of the human animal.

So much for the nutrients that are removed from the wheat in the milling of white flour. That is only part of the tragedy of white bread. What else is there to say? The Chemical Feast puts it in these words:

Currently, the FDA food standards for bakery products permit 93 different ingredients - few of them nutrients - to be added to bread products at the discretion of the processors.

None of these added chemicals (it should be emphasized that few of them have nutritional value) must be mentioned on the label the wary customers rely on for protection.

An ordinary pig in America eats better than he does flour has been milled for human consumption. It turns out that pigs get this much more of the vital nutrients in the whole wheat grain than the people get in white flour:

21 times the B1
14 times the B2
16 times the B3
14 times the B6
4 times the pantothenic acid
11 times the folic acid
17 times the Vitamin E
2 times the choline
7 times the calcium
9 times the phosphorus
12 times the magensium
12 times the potassium
3 times the sodium
2 times the chormium
14 times the manganese
6 times the iron
42 times the cobalt
7 times the copper
12 times the zinc
3 times the molybdenum

The chemical element cadmium has been reserved for special consideration. Cadmium competes with and displaces zinc in human metabolic processes. Excess cadmium provokes high blood pressure. In whole wheat flour, the ratio of cadmium to zinc is 1 to 120. In white bread flour, the ratio is 1 to 20 -- six times as great a threat.

Dr. Schroeder sums up the facts on white bread by saying that it may contain an adequate number of calories for a healthy diet and still lack the chemicals that would put these calories to work properly in the body.

A decade ago, Saturday Review published an expose of prescription drug abuses that demonstrated an urgent need for reform of the federal drug law. The late Senator Estes Kefauver of Tennessee used the power of subpoena to extend SR's documentation of the abuses charged. As a result, the law was revised to require that drugs, to be licensed for market in the country, had to be proved effective as well as safe. (Ed. note: with limited success, as last week's Journal indicated). With public attention now so sharply focused on environmental problems, the present would seem a propitious time for Congress to broaden the efficacy provisions of the law to cover food as well as drugs. Medicines play a relatively minor and intermittent role in shaping the internal aspect of the lives of most of us. But food is a daily necessity for us all. On it depends the quality of our survival, the degree of our happiness.

Samples of tissue taken from bodies of persons killed by heart attacks tend to be deficient in the chemical element chromium. And when experimental animals are deprived of chromium in their diet, the inner walls of their blood vessels pock with fatty deposits like those that generally clog the arteries and ultimately cause heart attacks in humans.

When the diet of experimental animals and chickens is deficient in manganese, nither the fowl nor the animals grow properly and both become sexually sterile.
deficient in manganese, neither the fowl nor the animals grow properly and both become sexually sterile.

Addition of zinc to the diet of wounded persons speeds the healing of the wounds. A sufficiently great lack of zinc in the diet has been known to produce dwarfs.

Yet 40 percent of the chromium, 86 percent of the manganese, 16 percent of the selenium, and 78 percent of the zinc in grains of wheat are removed during the processing of wheat into flour from which white bread is made here in America.

Iron is the principal carrier of life-bearing oxygen in all warm-blooded mammals, including humans. Cobalt is vital to the maturing of red blood cells that carry the iron.

Yet 76 percent of the iron and 89 percent of the cobalt in wheat grains are removed during the processing of the flour from which white bread is made here in America.

Calcium is necessary to the formation of bone. Without sodium to bath in, the cells of the body will either dry up or swell to the bursting point. Potassium within the cells is essential to balance the sodium outside them. Magnesium activates exchange of energy within cells. Phosphorus mediates all energy exchanges throughout the body that enables us to move and to think.

By Frank Okoh
And Jim Burnett

In an attempt to steal the thunder from the public outcry against foreign control of the Canadian economy, the Ontario government in May of this year organized a symposium to talk about foreign ownership. At this gathering such luminaries as Stanley Randall, former Ontario Cabinet member, and Claude Bissell, President of the University of Toronto, voiced the opinion that foreign ownership should not be attacked too loudly lest the foreigners get annoyed and leave. They left their listeners with the impression that it would be a tragedy for Canadian workers if such a thing happened. In short, they were saying, foreign ownership creates jobs (not to mention profits).

Brantford, Ontario is one of those small economic-satellite cities that surround Toronto in a belt of dull, flat industrial plants specializing in light manufacturing. As the one-storey, sprawling suburbs relate to the teeming core of a city, so Brantford is an economic suburb to that metropolis of the country based on Bay Street. It is cities like Brantford that make southern Ontario prosperous and sedate.

But light industrial cities like Brantford are also where much of the crisis in the Canadian economy, and consequently in Canadian labour, is beginning to take place. For in this industrial sector, rather than on Bay Street, the real effects of Americanization of the economy are felt. Here, it directly touches the Canadian worker.

Brantford is the home of Texpack Limited. Texpack was originally a Canadian firm, typical of the middle-range industrial prosperity of southern Ontario, owned by the Stern family of Brantford. Although small, it was financially sound and profitable, manufacturing industrial filter products, and dressings and bandages for hospitals. In 1964 Texpack became a Public Company. Two Federal government grants helped the company launch an expansion program which included a new one million dollar Brantford plant.

But this and other attempts at shoring up the homegrown Canadian entrepreneur came too little and too late. By the mid sixties indigenous Canadian capital enterprise was starting out on the road to extinction in southern Ontario, and Texpack joined the emerging pattern. The Stern family sold out in 1965 to the American Hospital Supply Corp. (AHSC) of Evanston, Illinois, which operates in 120 countries, and found a handsome money-maker in the bandage business in Southeast Asia.

For those who wonder why a successful company would sell out, it need only be pointed out that a Canadian capitalist does not give a hoot about Canadian ownership. Capitalism is by its very nature international; a capitalist, Canadian or otherwise, is interested in profits. If it pays him, he will sell out to the devil. It is the workers who suffer when they get laid off in the inevitable "world-wide rationalization" scheme. At Texpack, since the takeover production at the Brantford plant has been drastically altered...AHSC's plan, now largely in effect, has been to turn the plant into a warehouse and distribution operation for more and more imported hospital products--just as electronic plants now get the tubes from labor-cheap Formosa, the cabinet from Japan, glue one into the other and call it a Canadian TV, while phasing out component production in Canada, and laying off workers.

So AHSC began phasing out Canadian productio and began dumping American and Formosan goo through the Texpack plant. It reached the point, some workers claim, that "we were taking bandage out of a box from Formosa, putting them in anothe box marked Texpack, and claiming on the box that was Made in Canada."

As Canadian production began to be cut dow workers were laid off. Since March of this year, 126 o of 250 Texpack workers have been dismissed. Th layoffs are not a sign of dwindling prosperity, as th company tries to claim, since its sales tripled fro $3,000,000 in 1965 to $9,000,000 today. They are however, part of a trend reported in the Ontari legislature -- that in the past year, 7,500 jobs in On tarion alone have been phased out by America companies. This is what "rationalization" means in practice: greater profits for the corporation, layoffs for the workers.

"We are taking bandages out of a box from Formosa, putting them in another box marked Texpack, and claiming on the box that it was made in Canada."

The immediate cause of the present strike at Texpack was the refusal of the company to negotiate a new contract when the old one expired. The take-home pay for most of the workers – mostly women -- is less than $65 a week. The union is demanding a $14.00 a week increase over a period of two years; the company is offering $4.00 a week over the same period, not even enough to cover the projected rise in the cost of living. Again, there is no basis for arguing that the company cannot afford the union demand. In its salute to enterprising American companies Fortune magazine (May 1970) listed AHSC as the fourteenth fastest growing U.S. corporation with recorded sales of 450 million dollars and profits exceeding 25 million.

The union's demand, then, can scarcely be termed excessive. The crux of the matter is that the corporation feels it is big enough to smash a strike by a handful of women. Evidence for this attitude lies in a letter the company sent its employees even before the strike was called:

"We caution you that we will not roll over and play dead, as you may be led to believe. Our corporation has weathered strikes of up to nine months duration against such worthy foes as the Teamsters in Canada and the U.S. who have been defeated and decertified."

Texpack threatened the workers that should a strike be called it wuuld "immediately begin hiring permanent strike replacements", an illegal practice.

True to its wor d, the company proceeded to hire strike replacements as soon as the strike was called. The company advertised for strike breakers under the name "White Industry" (Hamilton Spectator, July 28). There is no such company in Brantford. When we asked a management spokesman about this he claimed it was all an unfortunate error on the part of the Spectator: "We told the girl at the ad office "light industry", not White Industry". Of course it is illegal to hire permanent replacements for striking workers during the first six months of a strike.

How does Texpack justify this action? So far they

Two recent events should shake the complacency of even the most credulous apologist for foreign ownership of Canadian industry.

Brunswick of Canada has announced that it will discontinue manufacture of such items as golf and billiard products and serve the Canadian market in future from its U.S. factories, a decision which will result in the firing of more than 200 Canadians. De Havilland of Canada has announced the laying off of 700 employees.

In the case of the Brunswick closing, 300 Canadians will lose their jobs and a comparable number of Americans will gain jobs. This is indicative of the operations of U.S.-owned manufacturing firms in Canada which undertake the minimum of manufacturing in Canada and serve often as little more than assembly operations for U.S.-made components.

Such firms are under strict orders from their U.S. parent firms to refrain from exporting in competition with the parent firms, and to serve as a market for the output of those parent firms.

This costs us many hundreds of millions ir 'ost exports and unnecessary imports which is immensely costly for Canadian jobs, the national balance of payments position, and growth.

When the Canadian affiliate encounters difficulties, it is simply closed and the production transferred to the U.S. head office.

De Havilland of Canada is the world leader in the production of STOL aircraft and has found a world market for these craft, but the British head office has not given the Canadian firm the resources to proceed with the diversification of its product line.

The Canadian breakthrough should have been exploited and aircraft ranging from 10-passenger to 50-passenger models and varied configurations should have been developed and put into production.

But de Havilland of Canada has not been allowed to sell shares to Canadians, and the British head office under British foreign exchange controls cannot inject British capital into its Canadian affiliate.

A nation cannot develop itself into a major power through foreign domination of its wealth.

Canadian industries are developed as a result of the efforts of Canadian workers, Canadian consumers and Canadian governments. The benefits of those industries should accrue to Canadians, the decisions about the future of those industries must be made by Canadians, and these objectives require that the ownership of such industries reside in Canadian hands.

ave hired some 80 workers. Management claims that advertises for, and truly offers, "permanent sitions". This, it is said, does not mean replacing the riking workers: as soon as the strike is settled rikers and strike breakers will all have permanent bs. This is hardly plausible considering that the mpany has been consistently laying off workers nce March, arguing that the plant is not profitable. The strike breakers come from as far away as icago. The driver of the bus which brings the scabs to work at the plant boasts that the company pays m $150 a day. Management denies this but will not y how much he is paid. With a little help from their ends, the police, the company strike breakers have pt the plant going. Asked how the bus gets into the ant Mr. Kenneth Roe, Production Superintendent s this to say: "The said bus was escorted out of amilton by Hamilton Police, through Ancaster by caster police, and on the Highway by the Ontario ovincial Police. When we arrived at the outskirts of antford, we were met by the Brantford Police who ked us to follow them into Brantford, which we did."

To make sure that no harm was done to the strike-eaking buses the company went to court to obtain an unction against the union. The Court obliged on gust 11. This injunction limits the number of pickets a token two at the main gate and one elsewhere. is renders picketing completely ineffective in pping scabs.

wo days after the Court's decision, nine members he Executive Board of Stelco Local 1005 of the elworkers in Hamilton went to Brantford, led by al president Harry Greenwood. They protested the unction and marched in front of the plant with cards reading "Not All Hamilton Workers Are bs." Immediately a squad of police arrived on the ne, and announced that if the protesters didn't r out in 30 seconds, they would be arrested. The mmittee held a quick meeting on the spot, and enwood told them that they'd never be able to stop h injunctions if they left. They stayed, and were led off to jail, charged with violating the injunction n offence carrying a penalty of up to two years in eanwhile, back at the bargaining table, Len ry, the man assigned to do Texpack's bargaining, flying in from Los Angeles to meet the union. In otiations he conveys the seriousness of the Cor-ation in seeking an equitable settlement by facing each discussion with the warning that he to catch the 5:30 flight out of Toronto. And ac-ding to the union reps all decisions in the otiations have to be referred to the American head e for approval.

the company has been getting tremendous sup-from the police and the courts, the union has also getting tremendous support from the people. al rank-and-file labour has contributed funds to the pack union strike fund. Here in Kingston people e generously contributed money as well. But ally as important as donating money to the cause he Texpack workers is understanding the im-ance of their struggle for Canadian economic pendence. At stake in Brantford is control of adian resources and economy. The Texpack kers' union, the Canadian Textile and Chemical n (CTCU), has publicly stated its support for adian economic independence. AHSC labels the n a troublemaker because it has resisted speed-job reclassification, layoffs, and plant conditions AHSC is using the occasion of this strike to crush union.

The union has also made things difficult for AHSC by exposing Texpack's practice of dumping surplus 2nd world war army bandages on the Canadian market. As a result of the union's demand for a government investigation it was discovered that Texpack had been selling 30-year-old U.S. Army bandages in packages marked "sterilized" and "Made in Canada". Government tests revealed that the bandages were contaminated. These bandages, incidentally, are for first-aid on industrial sites.

This practice is obviously illegal. But international corporations are not known for their respect of Canadian law. Texpack had even gone so far as to appoint itself judge and jury of some 15 of its workers in firing them for "misconduct" on the picket line. In its policy of hiring strikebreakers, the company violated the Ontario Labour Relations Act which forbids any such act during the first six months of a strike.

In the light of the above, support for the Texpack workers goes beyond supporting a small strike in a minor sector of Canadian light industry. The first sign of the importance of the strike for Canadian labour came from Fred Wilson of the Brantford local of the Plumbers and Steamfitters Union. In donating $100 on behalf of the union to the strike fund he pointed out that this was the very first time in 30 years that his local had supported anyone other than striking plumbers. He said to the CTCU, "it was the threat of American companies to Canadian workers which made it necessary to support you." Such has been the strength of general rank-and-file support that even the local arm of the reformist Canadian Labour Council (CLC), the Brantford District Labour Council, which had refused support of the Texpack workers. Traditionally the CLC and the CTCU have been at each others throats, the CLC seeing the CTCU as a disruptive force in Canadian labour and the CTCU seeing the CLC leadership as subservient to American union domination. These political differences have been temporarily buried in the formation of a united front against multi-national corporations such as the AHSC. They must be permanently resolved for the way to be made clear for the formation of a militant Canadian labour movement. This movement is vital in the struggle for Canadian economic independence.

The company began phasing out Canadian production and began dumping American and Formosan goods through the Texpack plant. As Canadian production began to be cut down, workers were laid off.

Anyone interested in helping the Texpack workers financially or otherwise should write or phone Canadian Textile and Chemical Union, 11 George St., Brantford, Ont. (519-753-7525). or get in touch with Frank Okoh (546-2914) or Jim Burnett, (542-4431).

A few minor, no major actions by the Trudeau government

The Trudeau cabinet has begun debating proposals for its future foreign ownership policy.

The Trudeau government passed legislation to establish the Canada Development Corp., dealt on an ad hoc basis with the aborted foreign takeover of Home Oil Ltd. and proposed tax reform measures which are intended to encourage greater investment by Canadians in domestic public companies.

In addition, although there is no formal, direct relationship between the two subjects, the draft Competition Act legislation introduced in July by Consumer and Corporate Affairs Minister Ron Basford proposed two important steps which in future could be extended to serve foreign ownership policy goals.

One is the proposed takeover registry, which in the case of foreign takeovers will require all proposed mergers to acquire the approval of a new Competitive Practices Tribunal.

The same tribunal will keep watch over and have power to negate the influence of foreign government decrees, orders, judgements, etc. which may affect Canadian firms (presumably subsidiaries of foreign firms), if the tribunal believes the foreign directives are contrary to the objectives of competition policy.

There can be little question that a foreign ownership policy will include some formal mechanism for keeping close watch on potential foreign takeovers.

Similarly, there is likely to be new ground rules for dealing with the difficult problem of extra-territorial application of foreign law in Canada.

The government, under Herb Gray, has also produced a major study of the extent and problems of foreign ownership, together with a full package of proposals of how the federal government should shape its promised. comprehensive foreign ownership policy.

The report and proposals, however, is not expected to be made public in its original form and instead, a censored version of the proposals will probably be tabled in the House of Commons.

However, the government will probably only announce its conclusions in the form of a general policy statement rather than introduce them as legislation for immediate presentation to Parliament. This being the case,it is unlikely that the government will take any sweeping. direct action towards curbing foreign, and particularly American, influence, within the near future.

Rugger Gaels Victorious

By Alan Broadbent

The Golden Gaels rugger team continued their winning ways on Saturday, defeating the York University first team 38-0.

The Gaels were carried to a rather easy victory by a strong scrum unit which opened the way for the backs to score consistantly against the weak York team. The forwards outclassed York in the set scrums and line-outs, and were particularly adept in sending their backs away quickly from loose play. Most Gael scores came from fast rucking by the forwards, catching the York backs out of position and allowing the Queen's backfield to gain seemingly free access to the York end-zone.

Fly-half Ron Easteal gave the Gaels a 6-0 lead at the 11 minute mark with a penalty goal from the ten yard line. Ten minutes later, wing-forward Lee Doni, replacing the injured Steve Shelley, scored a try after a clever 15 yard play with scrum-half Terry Graham from a set scrum. At this point the Gaels were well in command.

The remaining scores were counted in tries by Barron, winger Warren Smith with three, Graham, Peace, and Doni again, with Easteal providing four conversions.

At the eight minute mark in the game, the forwards sent the backs away from a loose ruck at the 25 yard line. Outside-centre Paul Barron, new at Queen's after playing for Trent University, scored after Winger Neil Peace set him free with some smart running.

The Gaels are again this year a well-balanced team. Full-back Alan Jeffrey is a steady performer, sure-handed and always in position. Wingers Smith and Peace are both fast and strong, giving the Gaels a powerful scoring potential. Outside-centre Barron gives the Gaels some needed speed and ball-handling ability.

Inside-centre Geoff Cooper plays intelligent rugger, manoeuvering opposing back-lines well. Fly-half Ron Easteal, despite a tendency to kick the ball too much, thus depriving his backs the chance to run, is quick and canny.

Scrum-half Graham, a tough leader, provides an able link between the backs and forwards. He is especially dangerous on the short side of the scrum, where he teams up well with his own blind-side players.

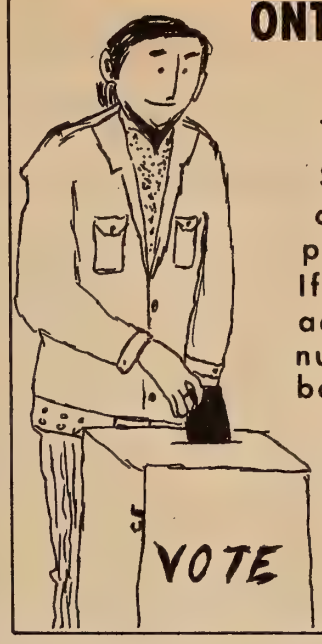
This summer's change in the age of majority in Ontario has sharply increased business at the campus pub - and brought new political activity onto campus as well.

More than half the Queen's population, aged between eighteen and twenty-one, was affected by the change.



That fraction of the population can now drink legally, and Greg LeBlanc, student manager of The House of Commons, the AMS pub in the Union, says they are doing so in spectacular numbers. It has been packed to overflowing every night since it opened during orientation week, LeBlanc said; he called the rise in business "drastic".

Partly because of the increased clientele, LeBlanc and the AMS are planning an expansion of the pub into the large second-floor common room in the Union. The extra room will be redecorated and opened by the end of October, according to AMS vice-president Victor Bradley.

Political activity on campus has increased over previous election seasons because of the thousands of newly-enfranchised students. Ontario premier William G. Davis visited Queen's briefly last week, and all parties are aiming publicity at students.

The Progressive Conservative Party has set up a student campaign headquarters in a Morris Hall residence room.

Kingston voters, including residence-dwellers, were enumerated for the election last week, and the AMS is carrying on a major campaign to have students vote in Kingston, not at their parents' homes. (See the separate story on page one).

Gaels guessing game continues

By Dave Cameron

In last week's "Journal" there appeared on the sports page a cartoon in which, with the score of the Ottawa game in the background, a figure stood holding a placard which read "Wait 'till next year". Well, the Queen's Golden Gaels showed on Saturday that perhaps next year has arrived sooner than expected as they demolished the Waterloo Warriors with all the efficiency of a well-oiled machine.

One of the only things that the Gaels left to be desired is their predictability. Saturday's game was a startling turnabout from their non-effort of the preceeding week. The chaos and confusion of the Ottawa game was simply not evident against Waterloo. With Brian Warrender's 124 yards rushing leading the way, the Gaels' offence rolled over, around, and through the Warriors, while the defense, playing as a tight, single unit, held the Waterloo offence to a total of 248 yards for the game.

This unpredictable nature which the Gaels have so far displayed may turn out to be a blessing in disguise as it could attract a great number of people to their games just to see how they will perform. It is like having three or four football teams playing for Queen's. No one will become bored.

Noting the on-off-on performance of the Gaels so far this season brings us to the intriguing problem of anticipating the upcoming game with Carleton. Will Brian Warrender score four touchdowns? Will the Gaels generally collect enough yardage in cheap penalties to build a collective cemetery? Or will the defense shut out the opposition and in the process supply any empty beds at KGH with opposing offensive players? Perhaps even Tom Taylor's passing will sharpen up from this week's 8 for 19 effort.

Since our prediction record is so far perfect (36 points constitutes a bushel full of touchdowns) we'll try it again for Wednesday night's game against Carleton. Since it is imperative that the Gaels win in Ottawa, they will. By ten points. Despite their slightly inconsistent play so far, this could be the team that goes all the way. The potential is there.

This fall, when you and Sally Torque go to the big game with Purvis U., take along a copy of the October issue of the National Lampoon. For the 75 cents you would have spent on a football program to find out that Billy Glefson, tight end for the Purveyors, hails from Mofongo, Indiana, and majors in port construction, you'll have something to do during half time when the Asher B. Durance High School Large Drum and Aimless Marching Corps slides into John Philip Sousa's "Bataan Death March" for the fourth time. You'll be reading a fifteen-page Mad parody; "125th Street," the educational TV show where those adorabe Muthas, Big Rat and the Cocaine Monster, teach ghetto children their place; "Magical Misery Tour," which records the Beatles' trip to a land where all you need is a lawyer; "The Final Seconds," a gridiron gripper starring those inseparable chums, Moose Nixon and Ruff Mitchell; and "Right On!", the same campus war game played for years in army think tanks and radical encounter groups. And much more. The Back to School issue of the National Lampoon is on sale at newsstands everywhere.

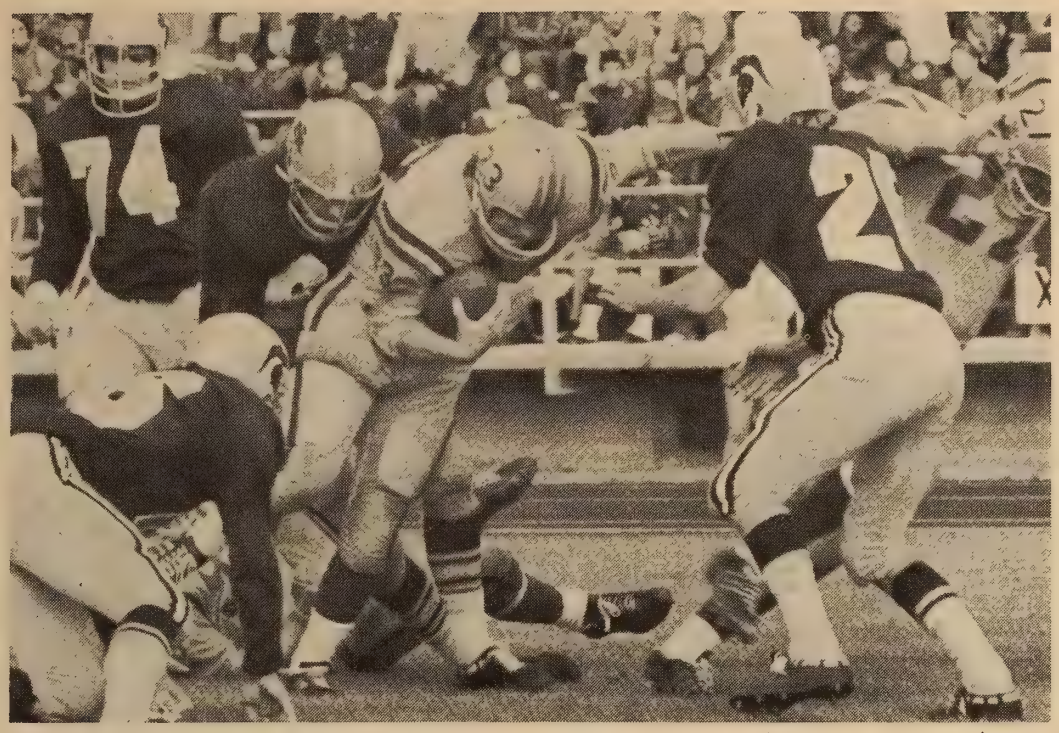
Warriors no match for victorious Gaels

By Jim Wright

It is difficult to determine just exactly moves the Gales to look as good as they did in their convincing romp over the Waterloo Warriors. Undoubtedly the fact that the Warriors are not a top contender contributed to the victory but other factors were also quite noticeable. Unlike the previous week there were only two obvious mixes in the offensive back field and considerably better co-ordinated line play by both defensive and offensive squads. Of equal importance was the fact that the Gaels took only half as many yards in penalties.

For a while it seemed that the Gaels would push the Warriors all over the field and never score. The Gaels twice marched down into the Waterloo zone first stalling on the 47 then the 36 yard line. Not only did they fail to get a single on the second attempt the Warriors missed a touchdown runback only because the runner fell after blowing by the entire Queen's team. Waterloo then managed a 76 yard quick kick, their last really impressive play of the game.

In the second quarter the Gaels began to role but not until they had missed a long field goal attempt and been held on a third down and feet play.



An interception by Jay Graydon set the Gaels up for a drive from the Warrior 40 where passes to Hollingsworth and Lang left Warrender with a five yard plung for the major. Cozac made the score Seven to nothing with the point after. The second touchdown was also arranged by a hungry defense as they blocked a Waterloo punt from the 30 and captured the ball on the nine yard line. Warrender carried to the one where Dave Hadden walked in for six more points. A convert by Cozac made the half-time score, Queen's 14 - Waterloo 0.

The Gaels were again kept off the scoreboard in the third as they experienced a series of incomplete passes, untimely penalties and one blocked field-goal attempt from the Warrior 22 yard line. Finally in the last three plays of the Quarter the Gaels began a drive which was to culminate in a touchdown.

The score came early in the fourth quarter as Taylor completed a pass to end John Waddell for 39 yards and the touchdown. Cozac's third point of the game made it 21 to 0.

After the Warriors had been forced back to their own 11 the Queen's defense again made a timely interception. This time it was defensive Mike Lambrose who snared the ball. Tom Taylor immediately pounced on the opportunity with a 17 yard pass completion to flanker Stu Lang. No conversion, and the score remained 27-0; but not for long. No sooner had Waterloo received the ball than the Gaels took it away again. This time it was Gord Squires who snagged the pass and ran it back to the 14. Three plays later back-up quarter-back Roald Serebrin ran the ball over himself to make it 33-0. A convert by Doug Cozac and two points on a safety touch resulting from a bad snap made the final score Queen's 36-Waterloo 0.

There can be no doubt about it; the Gaels have the ability to win any game, hopefully we will see this demonstrated again in the two upcoming Carleton games.

W.I.C. athletic night

The Women's Intramural Committee is holding an athletic night Tuesday, September 28 at 7 p.m. All women on campus are invited to the Bews gym for games skits, tours, fun and food. Volleyball and broomball will be played, so people should come dressed accordingly.

This is an opportunity to meet the W.I.C. executive and find out about the sports and competitions offered.

'Almost' shutout soccer wins

The soccer Gaels opened their season Thursday with an exhibition game against R.M.C. at the West Campus with an easy 4-1 victory. Beginning slowly, and battling against hurricane force winds, the Gaels finally clicked when an R.M.C. defensive error allowed Gord. Taylor to pound home the first goal of the season after thirteen minutes of play. Eight minutes later Taylor sent a perfectly placed lead pass to Dave Robertson, who made no mistake. At half time Queen's 2, R.M.C. 0.

With the wind against them in the second half, Queen's found ball control easier, and began to press consistently. When a penalty kick by Queen's was saved by the opposition, it sparked the only lively period of the game, apparently because R.M.C. could smell blood, (after Queen's had unfortunately scored for them in their own goal). Volatile goalie Jim Flood flared up when they finally did succeed in drawing blood, from his eye, but Queen's soon settled the business when Bruce Wormald pushed in another goal. From there on it was no contest, and Neven Marendic closed the book on the game with Queen's fifth goal.

In a second exhibition against Ryerson on Saturday, a slightly different team functioned well to come up with a 3-0 win. Goals by Robertson, Petrowski, and a penalty by G. Taylor made up the scoring.

Under experienced coach Johnny Walker, and new captain Gerry Birks, Queen's soccer team is looking very good this year.

Women's field hockey

Too early last Saturday morning, 34 women field hockey players plus the "Coach", made a jog 'a la belle province' to do their thing. The Seniors defeated: McGill 1-0, on a score by Karen Carson; St. Lamberts 0-0. The Intermediate team downed: Bishops 1-0, with Barb McDermott scoring the only goal; McGill 2-0, Gail Babiuk put in both goals for the win.

For the first play of this year's season, all of the girls put forth efforts which were match only by the brighteness of the sun, both of which lasted the entire day. The enthusiasm of the players, both on and off the pitch, was in part responsible for the victories. The other part is credited to the goal tenders, halves, fulls, and forwards, of both teams, who all shared in the infractions committed as well as the play which made them two victorious teams.

Next Saturday, the teams will travel to Guelph to meet the next opposition.

Track team

The Queen's Track Team was impressive at the McMaster Invitational Track Meet.

Canadian Junior Champion, Dave Jarvis, of Queen's, won the 400 m. hurdles (54.1) and also placed second in the 110 m. high hurdles (15.2). Don Price gained Queen's a third in the 110 m. hurdles (15.3). John Ongarato, from Perth High School broke the Queen's record as he threw the discus 127' 3", to place fourth in the event. Team Captain, Bob Lingwood, was second in shot put, and Keith Berriman placed second in both 200 and 400 m. events.

Rugger coach Gavin Reid, who doubles as as an assistant professor in the School of Physical and Health Education, has been a continuous booster of rugger on the Queen's campus. Each year he encourages anyone who is interested in playing the game whether veteran or novice, to practice with the team, and he arranges games for however many teams Queen's can field.

This coming weekend, the Gaels play in Montreal, Saturday against the McGill XV, and Sunday against Town of Mount-Royal. Reid hopes to take three teams on the overnight trip.

Those interested in rugger are encouraged to contact Reid. Rugger has always been a game where a club spirit predominates. Playing the game is important, winning is desirable, but comradeship and the proverbial pint are necessary ingredients.

CANADA

Canada's stagnating economy has frayed tempers within the Liberal caucus and has lead to open conflicts between backbenchers and Cabinet ministers.

Within the closed causus meetings some backbenchers have bitterly complained about the apparent lack of Government action aimed at stimulating the economy. Others want a re-evaluation of Canada's economic future.

The MPs are saying privately they are frustrated by the absence of Cabinet moves they could point to as proof that the Liberal GOvernment is competent to handle the unemployment problem.

The Cabinet has not even convinced Canadians it sincerely wants to overcome the high unemployment situation, some MPs have complained.

Bernard Lortie, looking tired but calm, at one point smiled Wednesday night when he was told he had been found guilty of kidnapping Pierre Laporte, Quebec labor minister strangled last October.

The unanimous guilty verdict was made at midnight after 3½ hours of deliberations by the jury.

The 19-year-old trade school dropout is to be sentenced Nov. 22. He faces a possible sentence of life imprisonment.

Canadian Government hopes of help in staving off protectionist moves by President Nixon received a boost from several U.S. senators here Friday.

Edward Kennedy (Dem., Mass.) said he hoped a new 10 per cent U.S. import surcharge will soon be lifted.

Another senator told Canadian MPs not to worry about proposed Nixon legislation to enable exporters to defer income taxes.

"The House of Representatives will emasculate it and we will finish it off," he promised.

Health and Welfare Minister John Munro declared that there are only a very few "bums on welfare". He stated that "only 13 percent of welfare recipients are employable." The remaining 87 percent were permanently disabled mothers with families, and the elderly or temporarily disabled. Mr. Munro talked of the growing trend toward poor people's groups and the self help attitude represented by these groups.

This winter, he said, the Government will have to cope with the effects of U.S. economic actions.

"Coping with this new situation means not only maintining the delicate balance between inflationary and recessive economy in the face of circumstances that have arisen without warning. It also means ensuring that, should the situation demand, we have full and adequate programs to provide assistance to those who are suffering from dislocations in our economic patterns."

The Roman Catholic Bishop of London, Ontario, offered Friday to contribute $1,000,000 from diocesan funds toward low-cost housing for the poor.

"I don't see why it couldn't be used for housing just as easily as it could for building churches", said the Most Reverend G. E. Carter. "It certainly would ease our social conscience. We might be able to do something on housing, where in some other fields we might just be beating our gums."

Premier William Davis said here today he is "quite optimistic" that Kingston's tax-exempt property situation will be much-relieved by the province before 1975.

He told an early morning press conference that he believes "personally, that the university and the community colleges should be paying 100 per cent taxes maybe".

Canadian athletes may end up playing Canada's national summer sport with American equipment following the announcement yesterday that the nation's largest manufacturer of lacrosse sticks is closing its doors.

The Chisholm Lacrosse Manufacturing Ltd. of Cornwall suspended its operations yesterday, putting 110 people out of work. The operation produced 96 per cent of all hickory lacrossse sticks made in Canada.

Stiff competition from U.S. manufacturers of plastic sticks and the lack of a large Canadian market were given as the reasons for its closing.

Twelve Canadian sailors and U.S. President Richard Nixon will all be in Alaska this Sunday and many people hope the result of both trips will be the cancellation of the world's largest underground nuclear explosion.

The sailors are aboard the Greenpeace, an 80-foot halibut boat chartered by the Vancouver-based Don't Made A Wave Committee.

They're now near Amchitka, where an atomic bomb with the power of 5,000,000 tons of TNT - 250 times more powerful than the bomb dropped on Hiroshima - is scheduled to be exploded on the Aleutian Island.

Their purpose is to force a cancellation of the test by being within the restricted zone for the explosion.

Nixon's purpose in flying to Anchorage, the largest city in Alaska, is to meet with Japanese Emperor Hirohito, who stops there briefly on his way to Europe for the first tour abroad of a ruling Japanese emperor.

But there is there is growing specualtion that Nixon will also use the meeting to announce the cancellation of the explosion, which is expected to take place sometime between Nixon's visit and Hirohito's return touch-down on his way back to Japan.

THE WORLD

Yugoslavia Soviet Communist leader Leonid Brezhnev Saturday was expected to guarantee Yugoslavia the right to run its own affairs — then fly off to explain to his East European allies why he blessed the independent communism of Josip Broz Tito.

In speeches during his three-day visit, Brezhnev said Yugoslavia was abiding by the "general laws" of communism and, while he did not necessarily like some of Yugoslavia's experiments with democracy, he would do nothing to stop them.

Such a communique, to be issued today, would be as important to the Yugoslavs as the 1955 agreement Tito signed with the late Nikita Khrushchov, conceding Yugoslav "equality." Tito has used that pact ever since to fend off Soviet attempts to limit his independence.

United Nations Secretary-General U Thant said Friday that he had received appeals to help about 800 Jews leave the Soviet Union and that more than 400 of them had been able to go to Israel.

In an address prepared for delivery at the annual dinner of UN, We Believe, an American group of UN supporters, Thant answered criticism that he and the world body had not helped Soviet Jews who wished to emigrate.

AUSTRALIA - A tattooed, topless go-go dancer was fired from a sideshow at the Royal Agricultural Show last week after officials discovered that "she" was a man.

"The great American six-footer" gets the pick of the jobs, according to Leland Deck, the director of labor relations at the University of Pittsburgh, who has completed a three-year study of recent college graduates. Workers who are six-feet-two or -three average more than 10 per cent higher salaries during the first year on the job than those under six feet.

He thinks that height prejudice may account for widespread discrimination against Orientals, Mexican-Americans, Indians, "and any other group which is ethnically shorter than the American male."

Deck points out that the jobs in his sampling had nothing to do with physical capacity; many of them were teaching positions at colleges. "Why is it" Deck wonders, "that a space for your height is in third or fourth position on every application blank in the world? What difference does it make in getting into medical school or going to work for a corporation?"

U.S.A. Capt. Ernest Medina, charged with being responsible for the My Lai massacre, was acquitted in a military court in Fort Macpherson, Ga. Medina stated that even though he is free to continue in any army career, he has decided to enter civilian life and become "a millionaire in ten years." Upon hearing his acquittal, he saluted the jury, paid tribute to military justice, and rushed off to a party in his honour. About 100 persons, including the military judge Col. K. A. Howard, attended.

Twenty-five officers were originally charged with participating in the My Lai massacre, and five were put on trial. Only Lt. William H. Calley Jr., a platoon leader, was convicted.

U.S.A. President Nixon bluntly told trading partners of the United States Thursday night that his 10-per-cent additional tax on duty-paying imports will remain in effect until there is an overhaul of international exchange rates.

Nixon faces re-election in November, 1972, and his present term of office doesn't end until January, 1973.

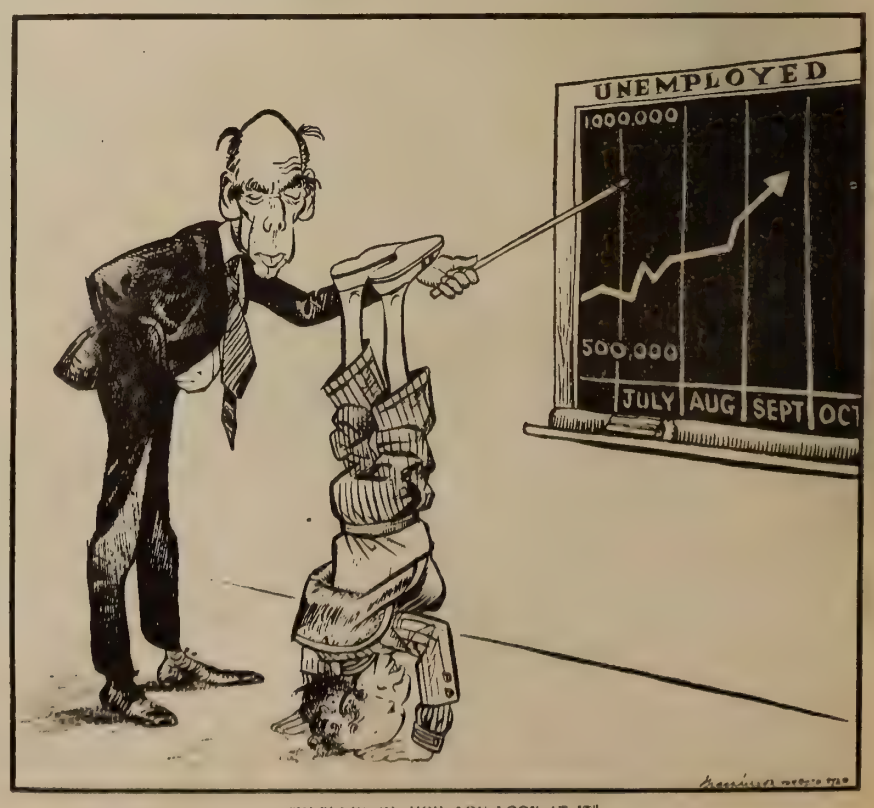
Employing the strongest language he has used so far, Nixon said the U.S. is not going to be belligerent or declare a trade war.

But it will not be satisfied until its manufacturers got a better deal in foreign markets, through fair rates of exchange and removal of trade impediments.

IRELAND - A British minister of state, Lord Windlesham, said in the House of Lords Friday that the British Army was tightening border security between Ulster and Irish Republic to prevent guerrillas slipping into the province from the republic. He said the search continues for a number of known IRA members who will be interned if they are caught. In the House of Commons former Home Secretary James Callaghan said the British Government had the power to take the initiative in Northern Ireland but had failed to do so.

PAKISTAN - A cholera epidemic in a giant East Pakistan refugee camp in northeastern India is killing hundreds of people every day, Indian newspaper reports said Wednesday.

Indian air force planes have started an emergency air drop of food supplies to the 200,000 refugees crowded into the Mailam camp in Assam.



The Press Trust of Indian news agency quoted officials as putting the death toll from cholera in the past month at 1,000.

The Amritsa Bazaar Patrika newspaper said up to 300 people were dying of the disease every day.

U.S.A. - Two psychologists who have tested 15,000 athletes, worked with 27 professional athletic teams and hundreds of high school and college teams, say they found nothing to support the traditional idea that sport builds character.

Whatever it takes to survive the high attrition rate associated with competition, the psychologists say, those qualities are not the result of the competition, they are there in the first place.

"Indeed," the researchers say, "There is evidence that athletic competition limits growth in some areas."

Things were really swinging at the WIC Athletic Night on Tuesday. See page 14 for details.

The student government spends your money

The Alma Mater Society, the chief student government on campus, set a record Tuesday night by adopting an annual budget in less than two hours' debate.

The budget provides for expenditures of about $150,000 in direct AMS operations.

In the budget debate the outer council was an unusually cosy and friendly group. There was little of the hostility and nit-picking which have marked AMS debates in the past.

In part this was the result of sparce attendance. It took half an hour of waiting for a quorum (nineteen members) to arrive at the meeting, and a bare quorum remained throughout the two-hour discussion.

The budget, largely prepared and presented by vice-president Victor Bradley, calls for the AMS itself to spend $59,850 in the current fiscal year, which ends April 30.

These expenses are financed mostly by the "AMS specific" fee and Who's Where fee, charge to every student, which comes to $6.05 per student or $54,850 across campus.

AMS expenditures from this fund include salaries, honoraria, miscellaneous administrative expenses, and the programmes of AMS commissions and committees.

Outside salaries and office expenses, the largest items are club grants ($6000), the Who's Where ($6000), and a grant to the Student Volunteer Bureau ($2250).

Bradley's operating budget includes proposals for the Queen's Journal ($44,269 for the year), Tricolor ($36,590), and the Queen's Bands ($9,269).

It also makes mention of the AMS capital funds, which total $92,200 and are largely invested in loans to Elrond College, the Science 44 Co-op, and long-term AMS projects.

There was some discussion of the fund which the AMS is maintaining to help build the new university centre. The AMS has pledged to contribute $500,000 to the centre by 1978.

At present the fund contains $84,100, and Bradley said it is not certain that the objective can be reached. Funds are raised annually from a $5 per student levy which is part of the non-academic fee.

He said he is looking into ways of raising the money. One possibility will be to add to the university centre fund the $31,138 which is now in the old Theatre Building Fund, built up by the AMS since the 1920's (the last spurt of interest was around 1964) in hopes of spurring the university to build a theatre.

The second phase of the university centre will probably include a theatre area.

Tuesday night's AMS meeting also agreet to hold a general meeting of all students on November 23 to consider what to do with the $3700 the AMS has in its "unassigned reserve".

By constitutional restriction, this money cannot be spent except by specific student consent.

Time and place of that general meeting will be announced later.

And the AMS agreed to lend $10,000 of its capital fund to the university to be used in giving short-term loans to students who need them.

The AMS contribution would be for a minimum of five years.

The following outer council members were present for the budget meeting:

Summer students may get more voice

By Anne Stalker

Summer school students are more closely part of the university, as a result of proposals adopted by the Queen's senate last spring. And details of their status are now being worked out.

One recommendation presented by a review committee last spring, which the senate subsequently approved, asked the faculty of arts and science and the senate to "consider extending student representation to students studying through the department of extension". This would include the approximately 2500 students in the summer school, many of whom are teachers or others who take only correspondence courses, or none at all, in the fall and winter months.

At present summer school students are represented through their own gvernment, the Queen's Summer School Association.

The QSSA was very interested in extending summer school students' representation, according to M. Ross Wardle, director of the department of edtension.

Summer school students do have problems on which they would like their voice to be heard, he said, such as the limited variety of courses which are offered in summer school.

But there are difficulties in summer school representation, Wardle added, particularly because such governing bodies as the faculty and board and the senate do not meet during the summer, and many summer school students are far from Queen's during the school year.

A summer school representative would have to live in or near Kingston to be able to attend meetings, but would also need to keep in contact with other QSSA leaders and members in order to be a valid representative, Wardle said.

But he said some sort of proposal for representation would be made before Christmas this year, because of the keen interest shown by QSSA.

QSSA has shown no interest in participating in other aspects of university government, such as the AMS, Wardle commented.

Participation in the AMS and the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society implies payment of non-academic fees, Wardle said, which are not paid by summer school students at present. The university does provide money to the Student Health Service and the physical education recreation programme to help finance programmes which correspond to what non-academic fees pay for in the winter.

But the Students' Memorial Union receives only a $500 grant, he said, rather than a subsidy proportional to the winter non-academic fee which supports it.

And summer school students are making no contribution toward the new university centre, to which each winter student contributes $5 in the nonacademic fee.

Summer school students are on campus about a quarter of the time spent here by winter intramural students, AMS vice-president Victor Bradley said. He said they should therefore pay nonacademic fees proportional to the winter fees - $2 or $2.50 for the Student Union, for example, rather than the 20c per head represented by the $500 university subsidy.

But, Bradley said, the only way to demonstrate this reasoning to summer school students would be to close down the Union for the summer.

Judy LaMarsh is coming

Judy LaMarsh, the former minister of health and welfare who required health warnings on cigarettes but couldn't stop smoking herself, will be guest speaker at the first annual dinner of the Commerce Society October 13.

The whole university is welcome at the dinner; tickets are $3.

The Commerce Society says the purpose of the dinner is to present a national figure to the Queen's community. This dinner is to be the first in what could become a fall tradition at Queen's, they said.

Commerce president Bill DeLucia said that small faculties, including commerce, are usually passive in relation to cross-campus activities. He said organization of this banquet could help make commerce "a more active, creative and constructive component of this university."

The dinner is at 7:30 p.m. October 13 in Wallace Hall in the Union.

What's your excuse?

You could have gone water skiing or swimming or to a dance at night. Instead you've spent the entire day moping around the house feeling sorry for yourself. And why? Just because it was one of those difficult times? How silly. A lot of girls are out there enjoying themselves under the same circumstances. They use Tampax tampons.

Tampax tampons are worn internally so you can swim or dance or do most anything you please. There are no bulky pads or telltale odor to give you away. Tampax tampons are so easy to use. Yes, even the first time. Just follow the instructions inside each package. So go on out and enjoy yourself. With Tampax tampons you have no excuse.

Tams popular

There was no great rush by freshmen to sell their tams back to the orientation committee.

Only five freshmen took advantage of the offer to buy tams back, according to Duncan Bull of the artsci-nursing-rehab orientation committee.

Three of these brought unused tams, which they had not wanted to wear, and got a $3.15 refund.

The other two got $1 for used tams; both said they wanted to use the money towards red arts jackets.

When the orientation leaders were being chosen last year, there was much discussion about making tams optional, voluntary or resaleable.

May and June session may be added to summer school

By Bob Mutrie

A May-June summer school session, sandwiched between the spring term and the traditional July-August summer school may be started at Queen's.

The proposal for a May-June session was made by a university senate task force headed by Dr. H. M. Love, who is associate dean (sciences) of the faculty of arts and science.

The task force was appointed in March to explore the possibility of putting university facilities to year-round use.

A questionnaire was distributed to summer school students in July asking for opinions on an extra session running from early May to mid-June. Of the answers, 587 students indicated interest in attending such a session.

At registration last month another questionnaire was given out, and 685 students, out of 2000 who turned in answers, said they were interested.

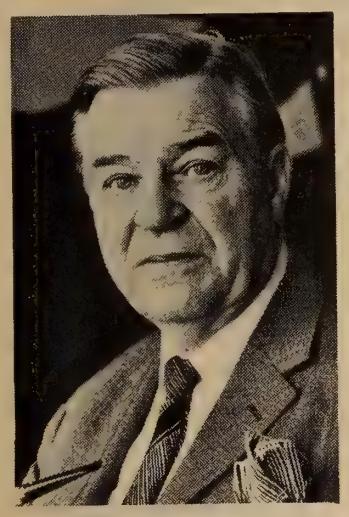
Only about 400 students would be necessary to make a special summer session feasible, according to student senator Paul Burke, who is a member of the task force.

Burke said that because of the favourable response, an experimental early session may be held in May and June 1972. Courses would be included in the experimental session based on the demand for them, he said.

Another questionnaire, to be issued in about a month, will try to find out what courses would be wanted, and how strong interest is then.

Adding an extra summer session, in which a student could take two courses (as in the present July-August session), would mean a student could complete requirements for a B.A. degree in two years plus summers, rather than the present three years.

A 16-storey student residence called Queen's IV is to be built on the west campus before fall 1972. It will include 124 one-bedroom apartments and is to be built of textured, pre-cast concrete on a concrete frame. The $1.5 million cost is being financed by the Ontario Student Housing Corporation.



Swedish economist to visit

Swedish economist Dr. Gunnar Myrdal will be Brockington Visitor to Queen's this year, and the committee in charge of his visit is looking for suggestions about what he should do while he is here.

The Brockington Visitor will be on campus November 8 to 12, and will deliver the formal Brockinton Lecture in Grant Hall on the evening of November 8.

But the committee would like him to meet with groups of students and others, and have asked that any invitations to discuss or speak to be sent to one of the committee.

Myrdal will be available on the afternoons and evenings of November 9 through 12, the committee's statement said.

GUNNAR MYRDAL

Proposals for use of his time should be turned in to the AMS office, with full details.

Information about arrangements is also available from Duncan McDowell at 544-7957 or Pam Reid at 544-6182.

Myrdal is author of The American Dilemma, a study of American race relations. He has been professor of public finance and international economics at European universities all his life.

From 1936 to 1938 and again from 1944 to 1947 he was a member of the Swedish senate. One of his books on population control and demographics had a major influence on the social policies of the Scandinavian countries in the 1930's.

In 1944 the Carnegie Corporation published his race relations study, in which Myrdal said the American dilemma was the conflict between the moral creed of "brotherhood, equality and freedom" and the actual individual prejudices produced by personal interest, desire for prestige, and economic, social and sexual jealousies.

Myrdal has held a number of public positions for Sweden and for the United Nations.

The precise topic of his formal lecture has not been announced.

The Brockington Visitorship, which is bringing Myrdal to Queen's, was established three years ago in memory of Dr. Leonard Brockington, rector of Queen's for more than twenty years.

Its official purpose is "to bring an articulate spokesman of our time, someone of international reputation, to meet in an informal way with members of the university to discuss his field of interest and expertise".

Previous Brockington Visitors have been Lester B. Pearson and Sir Bernard Lovell.

Group's aim is simple survival

A graduate student at Queen's is one of the organizers of "an international and interprofessional movement for the survival of humanity" which has established a chapter on campus.

Gordon Edwards, a graduate student in mathematics, is leader of the Kingston chapter of the organization, called simply Survival, and editor of the English edition of its magazine.

The group was founded by Dr. Alexandre Grothendieck, a French mathematician who was visiting lecturer at Queen's last spring.

Survival is intended to form an alliance between scientists and ordinary people to fight for the survival of humanity and all life. It was first organized in July 1970, at an international mathematics congress in Montreal, and includes both scientists and nonscientists.

Membership is concentrated in France but extends to other European countries and to North America.

The organization has a strict "code of ethics" outlined in its journal, also called Survival. The aim of the movement is preservation of natural resources and control of pollution.

Survival is a non-violent organization, which advocates noncollaboration with armed forces and arms industry, and urges refusal of military service. Birth control is a major part of Survival's platform, Edwards said.

In addition to the English edition of Survival, of which Edwards is editor, there is a French edition. The organization is circulating both as widely as possible. It will also be publishing a series of monographs by scientists.

ASUS will make room for DCS's

The arts and science student government has begun an overhaul of its structure to make room for departmental student councils.

Unless such a change is made, according to the vice-president of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society, Nancy Hoey, "there will ultimately be a conflict of interests "

When departmental student councils were created by an act of the arts and acience faculty board two years ago, no one expected that they would do more than represent the particular courses from which they were elected, Miss Hoey said.

But last year DSC's spent $8000 of ASUS money on the course evaluation guide. ASUS was enthusiastic about providing this service to arts and science students, Miss Hoey said, but feels it should have more control over projects which are spending its money.

The first draft of the new ASUS constitution proposes that the executive of ASUS consist of the chairman of each DSC, as well as a president and vice-president (plus non-voting secretary and treasurer).

Miss Hoey said, in the letter which accompanied the draft when it was sent to ASUS executive members, that problems might arise, both with the lines of authority in the new structure and with the size of the reconstituted executive. (There are 31 departmental student councils, which would give the governing body 35 members.)

Discussion of the plan over the next two months may iron out these difficulties, Miss Hoey said. A final draft should be ready by the end of November, according to ASUS president Marv Bloos. It could then be presented for approval by arts and science students as a whole.

SVB asks volunteers

The Student Volunteer Bureau has announced that it will hold a meeting next week at which potential volunteers can meet representatives of the Kingston social agencies for which they would work.

SVB is a referral agency which finds student volunteers willing to make a regular and responsible commitment to community work.

The SVB conference will be held Wednesday, October 6, at 7 p.m. in Stirling Hall.

Students fill voters lists

Student voters have increased the number of potential voters in one district of Kingston by a factor of five since the last election.

In the 1967 provincial election there were 235 registered voters in Sydenham 6, the district which includes the central academic campus, Leonard Field, the women's residences and some private homes.

As of Wednesday, 1047 people had been enumerated in that district.

Most of the increase represents inhabitants of the Queen's residences, who are eligible to vote because the voting age was lowered to 18 last summer.

Re-enumeration for voters who were missed in the first enumeration last week is being carried on steadily, and ends October 18 at 7 p.m.

Courts of revision for disputed names begin October 8.

Preliminary voters' lists were posted in each voting district on the weekend, and may also be seen at the election office at 80 Johnson Street.

A voter who finds his name missing may turn it in at that office of at the AMS office in the Union. In either case, an enumerator will visit him to see that he is eligible to vote.

The office manager of the election office for Kingston and the Islands riding told the Journal Wednesday that she had never seen a more confused or busier provincial election.

This was partly because of the great increase in the number of voters, produced by the change in voting age, she said.

Polling will be held October 21 across Ontario.

Queen's to help United Fund

Queen's University has a target of $45,000 in the Kingston and district United Fund drive this month.

The total target for the district is $275,000.

Last year Queen's raised much more than its target of $43,000, one of the few divisions of the Kingston drive to reach its target.

Everyone in the Queen's community, including faculty, support staff and students, is invited to contribute. The AMS will be participating in the fund drive, but details of such student participation have not been announced.

Chairman of the university's share in the United Fund drive is Tony Marshall of the department of classics.

Scientist to speak Tuesday

A leading British scientist will deliver this year's first Dunning Trust lecture Tuesday night.

Bertram Vivian Bowden, Lord Bowden of Chesterfield, is an authority on several technical fields and also on scientific higher education. involved in radar research for the British and United States governments. Later, in industry, he helped in the early development of digital (binary system) electronic computers.

In 1964 he became a minister for science in Harold Wilson's first government, and in 1963 was made a life peer. For six years he has been principal of the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology.

As a critic of British higher education, Bowden has said that universities are too isolated from the rest of society, and should carry on more research - and receive more support.

Bowden's address will be given at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday, October 5, in Dunning Hall auditorium.

ORIENTATION

Dear Editors:

In reply to Philip Miller's letter of Sept. 24: Certainly there were aspects of the Arts and Science orientation programme which proved, to some, more alienating than orienting. In explanation, we can only say that in trying to plan a week which would introduce and welcome almost 1,400 people to Queen's, we found it difficult (in fact, impossible) to meet everyone's demands and expectations. Some people were unfortunately but unavoidably left out and to those, we apologize.

However, for Millers comment "The Gaels, too, are still ego-tripping as much as ever (why else would they take the job?) ...", I have less sympathy. "Ego-tripping" is not enough to keep a group of people going from January to March as did the Gaels last year in preparation for orientation week. Of course, some of them used their positions improperly but the number is insignificant when compared to the many whose genuine interest in helping the new students showed all through the week.

Miller, perhaps if you had given expression to your brain, rather than your Pavlovian reflexes, you might have made some genuinely constructive criticisms. We need positive contributions, not the shallow negativism which scars your letter.

Ted Cape.

Dear Editors:

In reply to the letter of Philip Miller;

I was very peeved after reading his letter. I an a frosh and have seen and experienced orientation from a different viewpoint.

None of us were forced to wear our tams or sing arm in arm. We did these things because we wanted to. If we looked ridiculous, it shouldn't have bothered you for it sure didn't bother us.

The most memorable part of the week was the time I spent with my Gaels and the group. Coming to a university is a totally new experience which likely freshmen from previous years have forgotten. YOU CAN'T bring all your friends and relatives with you, and you are situated in a strange city. You need something to identify with. I really don't think our Gaels were "ego-tripping". With all the meetings, organizing and responsibilities undertaken, orientation certainly was not entirely fun for them. The Gael groups are still together, not as Gael groups, but rather as a group of friends. We are still planning to meet throughout the school year. They were our first friends and our Gaels are willing to be of service any time if we need help.

So what is the purpose of orientation? An aspect which was overlooked was course counselling. I can't think of another university in southern Ontario (maybe even northern Ontario, too) which offers counselling in this manner. This means a lot to many confused students.

Sure, you can't meet everyone in one week but organized activities help you start. Spirit can't be created in a week either, but in that short time you can build up a lot of pride in Queen's - what it is, what it has and what it stands for.

Debi Bodner

Dear Editors:

This drivel about selling tams back is unbelievable.

As far as I'm concerned, the orientation programme has been deteriorating in the name of progress in recent years. It was Arts '72 et al that decided to revolutionize frosh week. Now, what have we been doing?

What ever happened to the average unsuspecting frosh coming into Queen's from some high school, where he had been a giant among the mental midgets of grade nine? Upon arriving, he was given a hard thrust into a new, less compromising environment where there was to be no more spoonfeeding, new outlooks, and, yes, even a little humiliation.

Recently, though, something has happened.

The same frosh shows up, just as many of us did back in '68, inflated with a false sense of confidence . . . but, now we must not humble him. He must be treated with reverence and respect (just as he was by those grade niners!) and he no longer has to do anything he doesn't particularly feel like doing. I cannot believe that the components of Artsci '75 are that much superior to frosh previous years.

I am not really one for shoving school spirit down unwilling throats, but one wonders if it is worth the walk back to Kingston Hall to exchange the symbol of four years at Queen's for one measly dollar.

Dave Thomas
Arts '72

Dear Editors:

Yesterday I was approached by a member of the Arts Orientation Committee, frantically waving a copy of the Journal and shouting obscene comments about Marvin Bloos. I am, of course, referring to certain moronic and ill-founded statements made by Bloos in the Sept. 24 issue of the Journal. Having myself worked on or with a great number of committees and organizations on this campus, I can truthfully say, that by far the greatest breakdown in organizational stability comes from loud-mouthed idiots who chose to attack a programme which they know absolutely nothing about.

If we are, for example, to accept the statement that the Commerce and Applied Science Orientation programmes were "assinine", I am on these grounds, baffled as to why all of the Tri-Faculty events were so successful, and why there was such extreme and sincere co-operation from the Arts Committee.

In addition, I also question why the entire Arts Orientation Committee threatened to resign because of A.S.U.S. intervention in their programme. Perhaps Mr. Bloos and friends, your high-minded ideals are not as well respected as you might like to believe.

Merely as a point of information, I would like to mention the fact that the first year Commerce and Applied Science programmes are fixed and therefore, three days of "course counselling" in nothing would be of little value to these freshmen. In addition, the "minority faculty" freshman are also faced with obvious social "hang-ups" not evident in Arts. Under these circumstances, is it any wonder that different programmes of Orientation have been adopted.

I can only hope that if the students of this community want to see things happen, we start working together, and that the "golden-mouthed executives" of our various societies show a little more respect for the people who are actually doing their work.

Greg Weston,
Science Orientation
Committee Exec.

BANKING

Dear Editors:

I have never (thank God!) experienced the misfortune of having to make a living in the employ of one of our national banks; consequently, I have never been forced to suffer the deprivation and degradation to which corporations are wont to subject their staffs. I have, however, frequently become acquainted with a sufficient number of disgruntled and thoroughly miserable bank employees and their complaints to sympathize whole-heartedly with the sentiments expressed by a "Disenchanted Bank Teller" wirting in in last Friday's Journal. She (or he) certainly tells it as it is. And the story she tells is seldom better, it seems, and often is far worse,.

Undoubtedly, the labour injustices in this country are numerous and diverse. And it is the nature of any bureaucracy that those not in the upper echelons of its hierarchy are treated in a manner tending towards ever-increasing dehumanization and lack of concern for the individual. But usually the so-called minor cogs in such a system - the government civil service is, of course, the most immediate example which springs to mind - while being poorly paid in most cases, are not least burdened with duties, or rather responsibilities (undoubtedly an important distinction concommitant with remuneration. Our banks, however, expect their employees to undertake maximum duties and accept high degrees of responsibility for the lowest possible pay. And, as Friday's article pointed out, it is low!

Then too, the "minor" employees of this country's government bureaucracies do usually have a certain amount of job security. So that, to put it crudely, they are accorded the luxury, perhaps, of displaying reasonable chagrin and discontent when Joe Brass starts passing out crap to those in positions he once occupied but for whom, in his "superior" position, he of course has only bullying contempt or, at best, patronizing condescension. Bank employees, if they want to keep working, have no choice but to submit to being treated like dirt by (often) Simon Lagree, power-tripping (those of us not subjected to their ill-founded arrogance can appreciate the comicality of these pathetic beings) managers and accountants: admirable self-made men, you understand. For as our Disenchanted Bank Teller pointed out, they can easily be replaced by anyone who happens along. And, indeed, banks are only too happy to dismiss the rare employee of long and loyal service on the basis of some minor (usually trumped up) misdemeanour. After all, they are usually, due to some bureaucratic oversight, paying the employee of ten or more years service a whole five to ten dollars more per week.

What, of course, is sorely needed to protect the small man in the Canadian banking bureaucracy from the ravenous corporate pig which hogs enormous profits and passes none of them along to those it ruthlessly exploits, is a strong union. But for reasons which are self-evident, the organization of such a union by bank employees has always been and remains impossible.

In a society where wage increases are being demanded every other day (in some cases exorbitantly) and being met, it is appalling that the employees of "respectable" institutions with which we, the general public, do business every day, should be forced to subsist on salaries which almost literally constitute "starvation wages." This is blatant labour injustice going on under our very noses.

A warning about hard fought political campaigns

Only in America, and only at certain seasons, can you see such a sight: Down the highway the caravan comes, sirens wailing from the motorcycle escort, loudspeakers blaring from the sound trucks, banners flying from the long line of cars, and there, at the head of the procession, the center of everyone's attention, stands the candidate.

He is perched precariously on the hood of an open convertible, supported by two aides, leaning over, reaching out for the masses lining the route. Screams and hoarse shouts ring out as he is grasped, pawed mauled, and nearly pulled from his moving car.

The crowds thin out, the sound subsides, the caravan speeds off toward its next destination - and then abruptly stops. The candidate jumps from his convertible and races to a roadside ice cream stand. Before the startled proprietor has a chance to realize that, yes, the young man with the shock of long hair, the familiar face and accent, is indeed who he thinks, the candidate is back in his car ravenously wolfing down a double vanilla ice cream cone while his caravan moves on to its next stop and next group of citizens, still in pursuit of the same elusive goal - the presidency.

For Robert Kennedy, a man of seemingly boundless energy, spurred on by a demon of a dream, that scene was typical of his last, fruitless political campaign. It was a study in fatigue and frustration, long days and long nights of no rest (perhaps occasional catnaps while curled up on the floor of a plane), irregular meals of uncertain quality (or no meals at all), speeches, speeches - all of them weighed, analyzed, measured for flaws or evidence of strength.

By the end, the strain showed all too visibly. That young politician, a symbol of youth itself, appeared drawn, lined, haggard. In short, he underwent all the things that all his American political predecessors had experienced.

It is madness from every standpoint. Neither politician nor the general public profits from it. The American political campaign is a frantic, exhausting exercise in mass movement. Thoughtful discussion of issues is lost in the sound and fury of the campaign. Other important business is neglected, the physical toll is immense, the tangible rewards slim. But everyone does it, because everyone feels he must.

For some years, as a reporter, I've followed political candidates along the main streets and byways of America. During that time, I suppose I've been as guilty as any of my journalistic brethren in feeding the public myth about politicians, thus helping to perpetuate a system that mocks the best democratic processes.

"He doesn't eat, he doesn't sleep, he doesn't do anything to keep fit." his wife observed, "but he thrives on it."

Politicians are trapped by the myths that spring up around them. None is more pervasive than that of the indefatigable campaigner bringing his message to the people, and performing like a thoroughbred along the way. We expect of them - indeed, we demand of them - the impossible.

Like our sports heroes, they are not measured by the ordinary level of mankind. They are supposed to wear Superman's cloak and perform just as astoundingly. It is somehow characteristic of us, as it is of no other nation, that we invest our public figures with the mantle of invincibility. As our due for our cheers, we require monumental deeds from them.

Thus, John F. Kennedy, the youngest man to run for the presidency before his brother Robert entered the lists, set off to prove his vaunted vigor and win the respect of his fellow citizens by speaking eight or 10 times every day, sometimes in four or five states in 24 hours. In one week, campaigning 18 to 20 hours a day, he stormed through 27 states. During the first full weekend of his campaign, Kennedy stumped Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Maine, and Michigan. Then he threw in California and Alaska for extra measure.

Perhaps. But if so, he was the only one along that campaign trail who did. Everyone else, from campaign manager to secretaries and reporters, was exhausted.

As a matter of fact, Kennedy, too, became hoarse, his weight fluctuated greatly as he missed meals and sleep, and he reportedly found it increasingly difficult to rise at dawn to keep the schedule that he had set for himself.

Ted Sorensen, his alter ego, recalls that the pace took a heavy toll of everyone present. "I know that the search for a few moments of sleep - on the plane, on the bus, even during the speeches - began to dominate my own thoughts."

But the caravan wound on relentlessly, and at a brutal pace.

John Kennedy, however, accomplished one thing: He set a standard that other candidates attempted to match - or surpass. He was a winner.

Mythology notwithstanding, politicians are merely mortal. And they are not at their best on a campaign treadmill.

No one would expect a surgeon to enter an operating room spent, emotionally and physically. But we do expect that of the men who are going to lead our nation and whose life-and-death decisions affect us all.

Every politician suffers the same kind of ordeal. You could see it in the drawn, white face of George Wallace, or witness it in the illness of Abigail McCarthy while she was campaigning for her husband, Eugene, or note it in the telltale signs of anger and fatigue that afflict almost all politicians, major and minor.

The strain is cumulative and encompassing. And rather than diminishing in this jet age, it is increasing. The candidate is expected to arrive at each stop fresh, glowing with health and humor, ready to meet the crowds, tour the city, deliver the speech - and then expose himself to the pitiless eye of the television camera.

Some suggest television eventually will lessen the burden by removing the candidate from the public arena. It doesn't work that way. Today's candidate must do both. Television never will replace entirely the personal appearance. The American public wants to see the candidate in the flesh.

Since Franklin Roosevelt's death in office, health has become an issue in every major campaign. In the case of candidate Nixon two years ago, the health issue became more than one of physical condition. Psychiatric questions were raised, too.

Invariably, other points are made about American political campaigns. Among them is the enormous financial cost, an expense that virtually excludes any but the rich from competing.

Yet the system persists - partly out of apathy, partly because the public expects it and the press and politicians feed the desire, but partly for a more personal reason. To the politician, the seductive dream of glory dies hard. It's hard to believe that he will not prove stronger, wiser, wittier, that he will not survive the toughest test of all, that he will not bear the tempering of the campaign while his adversaries fall by the wayside.

Keeping the faith with him, ever ready to catch him if he falls, is the caretaker of his health, his doctor. Sometimes, he too, believes in the dream. His candidate is different.

Dr. Frederick Burke of Washington, D.C., is such caretaker. His political patient is a man by the name of Edmund S. Muskie of Maine.

"Senator Muskie is an ideal patient," Doctor Burke says. "His health is awfully good. During the '68 campaign I travelled with him for six to eight weeks. I've been with him since 1958, and he hasn't gained more than 10 pounds since then. He watches himself on a protein-type diet. It's his own diet, and he takes only one drink a day. He has no throat trouble, which was expected since he makes so many speeches, but he has a natural voice for public speaking.

"Mr. Muskie avoids pep pills. He's able to take five or 10-minute naps and wake up completely refreshed. I recall during the last campaign how during a 16-stop tour he could completely relax."

Then the doctor ventured a prediction: "Mr. Muskie should be in great shape when he runs in '72."

the Dormouse

Looking out the window today, I couldn't help but notice that fall is almost upon us. It was a most inescapable fact. Fall was out there.

Fall, course, takes its name from that motion that is so prevalent about this time of year, falling. We see it all around us; leaves, branches, the sun, the little kid down the street; they are all out there falling. While I was gazing out my window, I even saw my bicycle fall over.

Fall is something like a dog to us humans. It is subservient. We love to see nature prostrate itself before us. How many times have you noticed people walking through the park kicking the fallen leaves? How many times have you done it yourself? Is that any way for a dignified christian person to act?

Of course, good liberal instincts surface in all of us at this time of year. We go out and indulge ourselves in the fallen bits of natures mantle. We gaze at, fondle, even commune with all those little pieces of nature strewn about the ground, If we are particularly profound people, we even empathize with the season.

For some people, the fall is a time of year that has little to do with these more lighthearted aspect. For them it is a time of high employment. I speak, of course, of the Leaf Man whose duties I chronicled in this space last year, right about this time, I assume. He and his corps of dedicated men have the responsibility for leaf colouration and distribution. Their biggest job is to fit the colours of leaves in with the surroundings, and their goal is the awe of the Kodachrome set. During the other three seasons, they collect unemployment insurance.

Fall is also a big time for politicians, for there always seems to be an election campaign at this time of year. This is in keeping with the prevalent direction of the season, that is the previously mentioned falling, for it is not a good season for honesty and noble utterances.

Fall is a good season for the people who are involved in the nomadic industries, for one of the favourite occupations of people is to venture into the countryside and see all this falling. Gas companies, hiking boot companies, and bicycle fences all welcome the fall as a time of high prosperity.

As most veterans of the season will have noted, fall is not a season that engulfs us, as does summer. Neither is it like winter, which is quite apt to quarantine us. Spring, it has been said, lures us. Fall, for window dwellers, just appears out there.

This subtlety is quite welcome, for most of us find such moments hard to come by. Take your average winter, for instance; it quite simply is not very subtle. Fall just sort of comes along, stays for a while, and then moves south presumably to Florida where it can escape such things as snowblindness, frost-bite, and snowmobiles.

This points up quite well the cleverness of fall. In fact it may well be the cleverest of seasons. Spring nurtures all the time, summer blisters and boils, winter grinds on, but fall seems to have found the solution to this energy output thing. It just lies around, oblivious to anything but its impending departure for Florida.

So here we have it. Fall. It is with us now.

For those of you who are attracted by the season, and who may be envious of all things that fall is, there are several ways by which one may become a part of the season. Pehaps the most simple is to go out into a park and climb a tree. Go through some kind of movements typical of growing and waving in the tree, and then fall gently to the ground. (A small hint here; don't climb a tree that is too high.) Lie about for a few months, then go to Florida.

Variations on this process mostly involve the use of various bright body paints. The art education people can be helpful here.

Good luck to those of you who choose to follow fall, and send us a postcard from Florida.

On the average we're

By BILL JOHNSTON

"Concern has been expressed that the University appeared to be catering more and more to the elite of Canadian Society and that this was occurring to some extent as a result of its (Queen's) admissions policy.... Whatever the reasons for this charge, it was of concern to a university that was proud of its reputation as an 'everyman's university.'"

.Report of the Admissions Committee of the University Council

The irony, hopefull intended, in calling Queen's an "everyman's university" could not be more obvious than when that phrase was in the above quoted report, which proved that Queen's is probably the most elitist university in Ontario, if not Canada.

The Admissions Committee was set up in early 1970 to investigate the admissions policy at Queen's in relation to the future development of the university and its obligations to society. The committee presented its report to the Senate a week ago and the report has been referred to the various faculty boards, who will submit comments to the Senate Committee on Academic Development, who in turn will present final recommendations to the Senate.

In the course of its investigations, the committee gathered a good deal of information about the characteristics of Queen's students to determine whether or not they represented the elite of society. As indicated in the tables on this page, they found that they did.

More specifically, the typical Queen's student is a male whose parents are quite well off, work in professional occupations, possess a university degree, and who live in a city.

All the information on the characteristics of Queen's students came from a questionnaire distributed during registration in Sept., 1970. Over 87 percent of the students completed and returned the questionnaire. It should be noted that students were asked to fill out the information to the best of their knowledge, so that information about parental income, education and occupation may not be completely accurate, although it is comparable with information gathered in surveys done elsewhere.

Table 1 compares the family income (1970) of Queen's students with the distribution of family income in 1968 for all Ontario university students and the distribution of family income in 1967 for families whose head in the 45-54 age group (comparable to the age of students' parents.) While it is apparent that Queen's students are better off than university students in general and the general population, the committee noted that family income rose 17 percent between 1967 and 1969, so that the gap may not be as large as is shown in the table.

Table 2 indicates that Queen's students come from educationally advantaged homes, compared with other university students (in two studies) and the general population.

Table 3 indicates that Queen's shares with other Ontario universities the tendency to attract people mainly from urban areas, with Queen's slightly more likely to attract urban people. However, the figures for the Canadian population are based on the census figures from 1966 and there has been indications that migration to urban centres has continued during the past five ates that a high proportion of Queen's parents whose jobs could be classed as professional and a smaller proportion prietors or were involved in technical tern is similar to those found in all it is clear that university students do not pational distribution pattern of Canada. cates that, with the exceptions of the ts and Science and education, males Queen's. The column in the table in- rcentage of males and females who had s averaging above 75 per cent also in- e women admitted generally had to have get into the university than did men. e faculties of applied science, business mber of women enrolled is too small to tically accurate sample.

f this information, the committee found strong correlation between university social class, and that "there is a higher tudents from advantaged families at the rest of Ontario universities and the ecome more marked when comparisons he general population."

e felt that the explanation for this pattern one or both of the following: 1) Queen's tario universities select their students asis of Grade 13 marks. Students from omic groups are more likely to leave aching Grade 13, and thus, the univer- g their students from a grade which is portionately weighted to favour can- her socio-economic groups. 2) Most of attend Queen's leave home to do so, and that the extra expense involved will from lower socio-economic groups, who economical to attend a university near who have graduated from Grade 13, it here was no correlation between socio- and marks. This finding was important in terms of recommending changes in y at Queen's, since, over the past e minimum level of marks needed to get been rising as the number of applicants t was feared that perhaps this rising would tend to make the university even appears not to be the case.

, however, found itself unsatisfied with criterion for entrance to the university easons. For one thing, admissions based f that large segment of the population complete Grade 13 from university there are undoubtedly many people in uld benefit both themselves and society The committee also felt that other academic ability should be considered e for admission, including talents of an or athletic nature and community ership ability. The committee recom- present admissions policy, based on ed by a principle of a scale of weights nt these other talents and abilities, and unt of the specific characteristics and ants, so that no one is unfairly denied ould get it.

The committee also recommended some changes in present policies for admitting mature students which would make it easier for those who dropped out of high school to return to the educational system, if they have the requisite talents and abilities.

At present, Queen's admits mature students who are 23 years of age, who have not previously attended university and who have not passed Grade 13. The committee recommended that the age be lowered to 21, but that a person have been out of school for at least three years to qualify.

It was also recommended that greater efforts be made to attract North American Indians to Queen's. At present, while one per cent of the population of Canada attends university, only .06 per cent of the Indian population does so. Queen's, in 1970, had one Indian taking full time courses here, while Trent University, a much smaller school, had 14.

Perhaps the most ambitious recommendation of the committee was that Queen's establish special remedial programmes to involve specially selected groups of students who would otherwise not have the opportunity to attend university but who have demonstrated potential to benefit from such an opportunity. The University of Tornoto began such a programme in the fall of 1970. The students took two pre-university courses in English and History and three transition year courses, which were supplemented by special tutorials, attendance at regular university courses on an informal basis and special tutorials and classes as needed. Initial reaction to the programme has been good, and York University and McGill have started on such programmes.

The committee also felt that the university should undertake to inform women about the opportunities at Queen's for women, and noted that, although the number of women here in the professional faculties is still low, none of these faculties has a limit on the number of women they will admit. The committee did not feel that this was a problem which Queen's could do much to overcome, and felt that the major reason that so few women got into the professional faculties was that they were dissuaded from applying to these by high school guidance counsellors

Other recommendations of the committee were that the present policy of giving no special consideration to the children of alumni or to residents of Kingston be continued, with the practice being continued that when two candidates of equal merit are being considered, the child of an alumnus and the Kingston resident will be given preference. It was also recommended that Queen's continue to attempt to attract a significant number of students from outside of Ontario. At present, less than 80 per cent of the students come from Ontario, which is about 10 per cent fewer than at Western and University of Toronto.

Many of the recommendations are commendable and, if implemented, would greatly help many who cannot now get into university. However, if the university really has any intention of making its claim of being "everyman's university" anything other than a joke, a whole-hearted committment to de-emphasizing marks and considering the special merits of each applicant and to providing remedial courses for educationally disadvantaged people will be essential. Whether that is possible, given the large number of applications this university receives, and whether the university is really committed to such an end, will only become known when action is taken on these recommendations, most likely next spring.

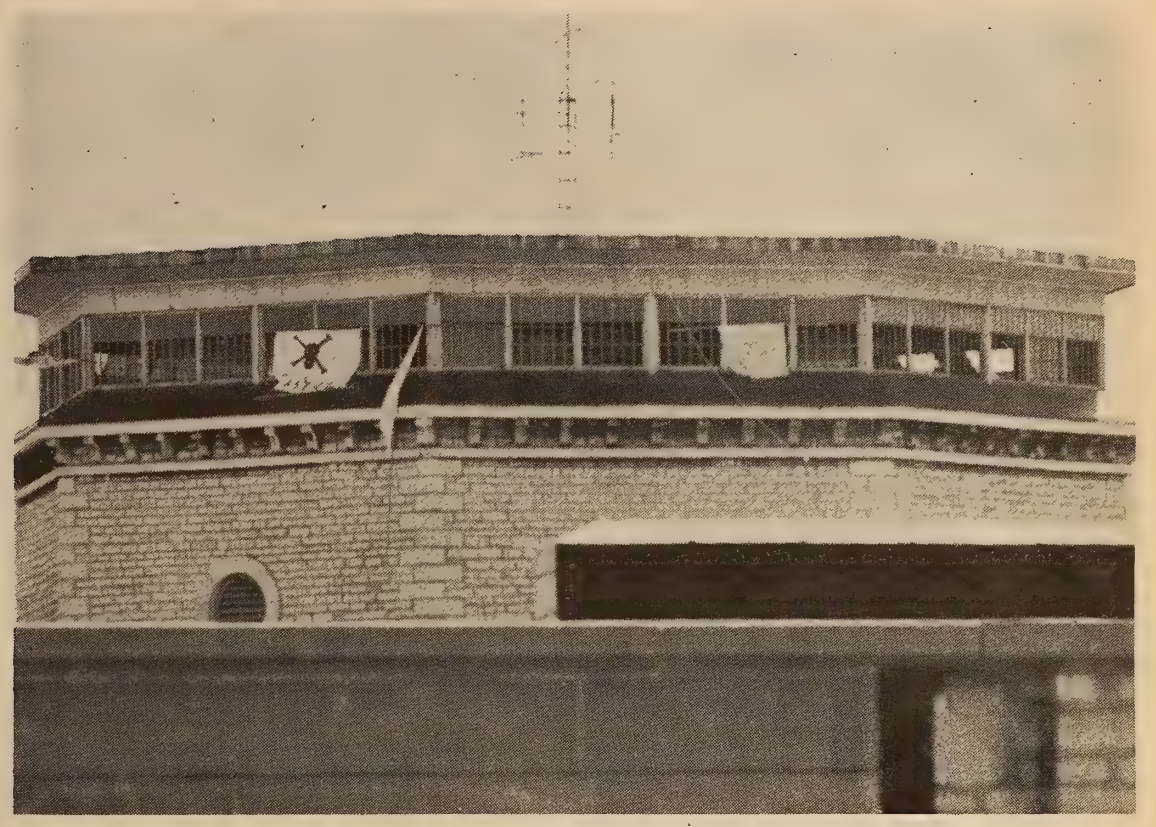
The prison system in Canada:



The following article is the first in a two part series dealing with the prison system in Canada. The first article is an interview with two people who had spent time in the maximum security prison in Kingston. Both people had committed "a crime against property." Next week the viewpoint will come from the academic community located outside the prison walls.

Canadian Infantry man outside prison.

INT: Why do you think that people are in jail?
TOM: Anyone who is doing any time knows the difference between right and wrong. As far as I'm concerned, they're playing a game.
KIP: It's not a matter of whap - he's a criminal, whap - you're not ... everyone's a criminal. There are four billion criminals on the face of the world. We're all fucking' deviants.
TOM: Well right.
KIP: W're all fucking' deviants, no matter on what level. The system is fuckin' around with people's lives, branding, labelling: "You're a criminal, you must pay". That's bullshit man. It's just politics, that's all.
TOM: Yea, but if you go out and pull a score, aren't you a criminal?
KIP: For me, I'm just a rip-off artists. But I know people who pull scores and they fuckin' well deserve the bread they got.
TOM: Well, sure, it depends who you rip off.
INT: Yea, there are cats who are doing it every day legally.
There are basically two kinds of crime -- crimes against people and crimes against property. What are most people in for?
KIP: Well, about 90 percent of your crime is against property. Prison is only the symptom of a problem anyway -- so why don't we get at the source. There should be no prisons at all -- or very few.
INT: Tom, when you were in Kingston Pen, you were only there to be classified, and then to be sent to Collins Bay. All convicted men are first sent to Kingston for a few months usually. Here they decide whether you're going to go to a minimum, medium, or maximum security institution. Do you want to tell us about Classification Kingston?
TOM: They have this C-block in K.P. -- a reception centre, where you're put for classification -- that's a good word for it.
INT: How big are the classification cells?
TOM: Well, I stood up in the cells, and if you put your bed up and put your table up -- like they come up from the wall -- you can walk up and down and you can turn around. Now with your bed down you can't walk, or with your desk down you can't walk up and down. And you can't put your arms out like this (outstretched). And you're in the reception cells in C-Block 23 hours a day -- that's including ½hour I'm counting for the three meals. Because you go down, pick up your meal, come back and eat in your cell. Now can you imagine, no matter how clean you are -- still looking at a shitter (toilet) that's sittin' right there in front of you -- and at night -- I was down in the bottom tier there, and we used to put our trays on top of the shitters, and put books -- like we used to go to the library -- the books are no good, but they're heavy, you know and put them on top, and we still used to hear those rats coming up just bangin' and bangin' and bangin', and I just used to sit there and shiver at night. Oh man!
KIP: Yea, that's true.
INT: What's it like for regular inmates at Kingston?
KIP: The bell goes off -- well in K.P. the bell rings and you get out of your sack.
TOM: At 6:30.
KIP: Yea. You hustle off and pick up your tray when they call your range.
TOM: DING...DING!
KIP: Yea, you walk back to your cell. It's about 7:00 by the time you go down and get your breakfast. You eat in your cell.
TOM: By the fourth tier it gets awful cold -- that's four flights up. You gotta walk it.
KIP: Then you trip off to work at about 8:00.
TOM: With the bell.
KIP: Yea. By the time you get to work it's about 8:30. I worked in the tailor shop for the first while at K.P. I did fuck-all. I was just supposed to sit around and look like a worm.
You get back from work at eleven and get your noon-day meal. And you sit in your cell until about 1:00 or 1:30. Then you scoot off to work again. And about 3:30 or 4:00 you go in and get your final meal. Then you go back to your cell and you sit there till about seven. Then if it's your night out in the gym -- like you have every other night -- you go out to the gym or sit in your cell. Weekends are routine breaks. You get out in the yard. You can watch a movie and that sort of bullshit. In K.P. you get your choice of movie or yard. In Collins Bay you get your choice of movie or cell.
That's about it for daily routine. It doesn't sound like much -- that's prison.
TOM: By the way, it's only since 1952 that the shackles went off your feet.
KIP : And the silence system only went out about in '58.
INT: Any system for dealing with grievances?
TOM: I was on the Inmate Recreation Committee at Collins Bay. The idea out there is that it's a liaison between the administration and the inmates. If you have a beef or a suggestion for something new to come into the institution or not to come in or a better way of living -- say a common beef, like PLEASE leave our pictures on the wall when you fan (search) the joint. If the population comes up with any real good beefs, you know, not stupid beefs.
KIP: Yea, well the only thing that the committee got us while I was at Collins Bay, and I was there for three years, was fuckin' cell cups. They were out there diggin' mind you.
TOM: Yea, but you see they were shot down by the Administration. Anything that was brought in while I was on the committee -- we would suggest it and they would go into conference like for a fuckin' month. And they'd come out ..
KIP: Well if you did it in such a way that they thought they came up with the idea, then that's cool.
TOM: Yea, if you think it's your idea, they fuck ..
INT: What's the routine of prison life like: What does it do to you?
KIP: It's a negative thing. You've got this routine. It takes you about ten days to get used to it. You're doing the same thing no matter if you're in for 4 or 5 years. That's what you're doing for 4 or 5 years, day in, day out. It's pretty frustrating -- you gotta blow your cork.
TOM: It's either one of two things that tells you a view from the inside

Signs hung by prisoners on dome, stating "Justice" (left) and "Thanks for your support" (right).

what to do. It's either a fuckin' bell or a fuckin' screw. You get sick and tired of it. One thing about it, I don't mind the bell so much because I mouth off at it all day and nothing happens.
KIP: There's no really meaningful work in jail at all. The work in jail is fuck-all.
TOM: Fixing mail bags!
KIP: About one hour a day you're not really paid. There isn't enough to do. The labour unions are down on you so you can't mass produce. You get to work on the odd mail boxes.
TOM: That's the routine in there. But there's a time in everybody's life, when they want to be by themselves and just be themselves. but there is no fuckin' place you can go in there. It's like out to recreation, out to work, or sit in your drum, and those cells start to close in after a few months, a few years and it gets really boring, man. I would say that it would really blow a person's mind to sit there, to hear continually, taking away what the screws say, the bell says, but just listening to ex'convicts rehashing scores that they were pinched on. How could anybody listen to this?
Everyone on the fuckin' penitentiary drives a brand new fuckin' Cadillac, has a million in the bank, and is going with Gina Lolabrigida. And you know there's only one Gina Lolabrigida.
TOM: At the bottom of the dome there's a bell, and a screw standing there CLANG, CLANG!!
INT: How many times does it go off, four?
TOM: No, they figured it our -- 32 times a block, four times a day, 128 times a day plus the ones for silence at nine. But how the fuck can a man live by that -- people do it -- a guy's who's doing a lot of time in there is adapting to the situation because he knows he must.
KIP: Yeah, I got used to it. I got used to saying Fuck Yourself.
TOM: Of all the sounds I've heard, there's nothing deadlier than that sound of the North Gate closing behind you as you come in that door. Like that's an empty feeling and I've never felt that before in my life.
KIP: The entire prison structure represents an affirmation of a police state. It's political punishment no matter whether you're stealing milk bottles or state secrets, it's all the same bag.
Whatever goes down inside a prison is definitely not for the little guy -- they're into putting you down, there's no way they're going to put you back together again, or trying to help you when you get out, or try to piece your life together -- they'd sooner kill you. I had a screw tell me that if he had his way with people like me, he'd line them up against a wall and shoot them. The Administration, that's a really trippy thing -- the Administration doesn't really do anything. They just shuffle papers. around.
TOM: Yeah, and sign em.
KIP: An example of bureaucratic fuck-up is the commissioner issuing a police directive. So he sends it down to the regional director. He reinterprets it and send it on down to the warden. The warden sends it down to the deputy warden. He reinterprets it and sends it down to the assistant deputy warden who reinterprets it and lays it on the fuckin's screw, and the head keeper reinterprets that and sends it to the guard and the guard reinterprets it and lays in on the con. And it's all fucked up and distorted by the time it gets to you.
TOM: It's like the big fuckin's fish story.
KIP: When I was working over in regional warehouse, outside the wall, I went downstairs. We were taking inventory. I found eight fuckin pool tables that had been there in that fuckin' joint since 1961. Eight fuckin' tables. Ottawa says "Give'em eight fuckin' pool tables -- they need recreation.
TOM: And you know where they are now? In the administration building for guards during lunch hours. Same for the colour T.V. It's sitting in the warehouse for the guards' pleasure.
KIP: Most of the screws are bucking for gradings and everything else and the only way to do that is to nail guys, and make the top brass think they're doing a fuckin' good job. The top brass are bucking for regional positions and those cats are buckin for Ottawa positions. It's a game and a source of income to them -- a game they really get into.
TOM: I look at it this way. Being an inmate myself one person I cannot stand is an informer and I support any inmate or anybody that does one in. I'm behind them 100 percent. And if I had the opportunity and I knew the guy was a legitimate informer I'd do it myself.
KIP: Yeah, over the rail.
INT Who were those eleven guys who were injured?
TOM: I would say they were either informers or diddlers -- diddlers are the type of persons who's a sex offender. I don't mean a rapist. It's some guy who would take a two year old girl and try to seduce her, fuck her and you know -- obscene fucking -- these guys shouldn't be in jail. They should be in a hospital.
INT: What happens to a diddler when he gets in?
TOM: They're in trouble. They've got the old standing rule -- off the fourth range and that's four tiers up. (The penitentiary at Kingston is arranged so that the cell ranges are on top of each other. Being pushed over the rail on the fourth range is to be in for a four-floor-fall.-- Ed.)
TOM: You can only treat a human like an animal for so long and then he's going to retaliate and I think it's about time they did.
KIP: Well it seems to me that this thing was just a last stand to show the world what this fuckin' joint is all about. I can really dig their point of view, too.
The point is that if these guys (the prisoners -- Ed.) had any clues at all when they started organizing they'd know that they couldn't win, they're losers. So the grievances didn't really mean a fucking thing. They know that if they've got any brains at all. No matter what goes down in there they've got to lose cause the government can't afford to let their fucking authority be challenged.

The Checkovian Farces

By NIP AND TUCK

If the crowds that turned out for the three performances of Chekov's Three Farces is any indication of theatre response at Queen's for the coming year, it should be a good one for all concerned (or was it the magic word "FREE" that brought all those people out to stand in line for many, many minutes!)

The instructors of the drama department are back in fine form in the wake of two very high calibre productions last year The Hollow Crown and Dial M for Murder). In fact, they pleased audiences to such an extent last Thursday and Friday nights, that they held over until Saturday night in order to accommodate all who wished to see the farces.

Chekov, a Russian dramatist and short story writer of the late 19th and early 20th century, is often slightly misinterpreted in translations of his works and it is helpful to keep this in mind whenever examining his writing in English. His fine sense of humour was amply put across in the three farces; they were hilariously funny, but the productions were presented in such a way that the basic irony of the characters was easily grasped. The humour, typical of low comedy types like the farce, was rather savage at times, but that did not prevent the audience from laughing.

None of the farces concluded tragically, yet, in spite of the humour, one of the predominant moods was melancholy. All of Chekov's works seem to be on a rather pessimistic tone, perhaps due to his burdened personal life, and even as we smile at the characters in the farces, they strike us as being rather pathetic, and above all, very much like people we've seen somewhere before. Chekov had a number of favourite themes with which he often dealt, and a goodly number of these were present either in The Evils of Tobacco, The Marriage Proposal, or The Celebration; such as the lack of human communication, the hopelessness of man's isolation, a general conflict posed between beauty and banality and the missed opportunities of life.

For those culture buffs who missed the first "fine evening at the theatre", you'll have a chance to redeem yourselves at the upcoming Chronicles productions.

A pleasant evening with Billy Liar

By SOL FINKELSTEIN

This week and next, Billy Liar is being performed at the Domino Theatre at the foot of Princess St. The attic-like, but casual setting of this amateur theatre provides a most comfortable atmosphere to this family drama. The play concerns the problems of Billy in relation to family, friends and fiances. Consistently lying in order to delay or avoid facing up to problems, he only succeeds in causing more trouble. His manner of behaviour is contrasted against constantly bickering parents and an old philosophical grandmother. The humourous episodes of the play are well brought out by the cast: Rita McGratten as lovable cigarette-puffing grandma; Norina Galley and Dennis Muncey as the familiar shouting English parents; Sandra Fletcher as the loudmouthed bitchy fiance who only wants the symbolic engagement ring; and the other naive fiance, continually peeling oranges, who has it, played by Barbara Edwards. For their small roles, Rob McAllister as friend and Jennifer Hodges as Billy's true love, provide good support. The only real weak point I found in the production was Bill Martin as Billy Liar. He did not believably succeed in being the energetically imaginative and convincing li ar as required by the role. As performed, Billy is just a bit too silly to be capable of causing a situation of two fiances as well as family and occupation problems. Generally, however, the whole production was quite entertaining and well worth spending an evening at.

London Philharmonic scores hat-trick in arena

John Pritchard, who conducted the London Philharmonic on Sunday night

By FERGUS MACDOWALL

What would it have sounded like if Bertrand Russell had given a talk on what the philosopher Nietzsche meant to him, personally? Or I'll put it a better way: what sort of impression would you have carried away from such a talk, if Nietzsche meant something to you, personally? An impression, I submit, that would be remarkably close, if not identical, to your impression, as a Brahms fanatic, of the interpretation given by the London Philharmonic Orchestra to his Second Symphony in the arena Sunday night. In both cases you would have thought something was missing. And the reason for this is that Brahms and Nietzsche, like you and me, were pretty mixed-up people, while the British defiantly are not, or if they are, do a first-rate job of covering their mixed-upedness up. You should be able to find more about this subject later on in the article, but for the moment take a look at this: it's a real conversation between real persons (who shall remain anonymous), music lovers like yourselves, immediately following the concert.

"If," begins the first, a medsman, "it hadn't started with Britten (Four Sea Interludes from the opera Peter Grimes), I wouldn't have stayed. That piece captured my interest right at the beginning." The girl across from him, a brunette in third year eco., agrees. "You could really feel the sea," she says, "the gulls, the landscape, and everything." The thread is taken up, anxiously, by her friend, an amply proportioned, blue-eyed strawberry blonde: "Maybe that's got something to do with it. I didn't expect something like that: I expected a more traditional kind of piece..." All right: stop the action right there. Let's go back to the actual performance, back, in fact, to the moment, a little after 8 o'clock, when John Pritchard, the conductor, began to raise his baton.

If you are lucky, you are comfortably seated in the orchestra section, off to one side of the area unless you arrived forty minutes early; if you are not so lucky, you are up in the bleachers, fidgeting on the hard wooden seats ("more like concrete blocks," observed the medsman) without any support for your back; and if your luck has run out entirely, you are one of quite a few standees. The baton descends: the audience rises: you are listening to O Canada, but it is O Canada infused with a mellifluousness you never thought to associate with the national anthem: and a few moments later you are listening to an equally impressive ("Oh wow!" as a certain psychology major has put it) rendition of God Save the Queen.

Then begins the first work, Four Sea Interludes. The program notes, not bad except when the writer lapses into expressions like "the weeping introduction", and after Brahms "launched" his Second Symphony "the floodgates opened..." (you might at first gather from this that Brahms, like his mentor Schumann, suddenly went off the deep end, but you're reassured when you find that the flood - which, we are told, lasted ten years - was merely a tide of inspiration), are here excellent if, like the eco major, you like to associate musical happenings with pictures or memories.

But the first work begins. And ends, much to your surprise and dismay, a lot sooner than you'd hoped it would: and to your greater surprise, when you try to put together in your mind exactly what went on in the piece, you can think of nothing but strings rising in pure arcs of sound, almost as one instrument, against a backdrop of shimmering harp-tones and muted brass.

To get back, for a moment, to that conversation. One of the girls, an English major, has just mentioned that she found the Britten a lot livelier and more exciting than the second work, a Mozart divertimento (no. 15,K. 287, for those who take note of such things). The Medsman isn't so sure about this: "Oh I don't know. Mozart was so cool." "Yeah," trenchantly puts in the person beside him, a history major, "that solo violin part was fantastic." He is greeted, for the most part, by loud voices of assent, ("Yeah," "Wow," "Righton,", etc.)

Actually, thought, it was in spite of the violin solo (a cadenza near the end of the piece) - for it was a bit out of character with the rest of the work - that the interpretation of Mozart achieved excellence. A miracle of rightness, with an insurpassable transparency of texture and sweetness of tone, the divertimento was in every way a hedonist's Mozart, music's answer to candy floss.

It looks like the Britten and the Mozart, then were well within the capabilities of the orchestra. But to get back to the point I raised at the beginning of the article: the Brahms symphony (which was the final work on the program) decidedly exposed the artistic limitations, first, of this otherwise superbly disciplined, subtly imaginative ensemble, and second (though I hestitate to say this), of what you could vaguely refer to as the British musical temperament.

The clean bold expansiveness of Purcell, ebullient and extroverted, and the subtle introspection, the pastel-coloured musings of Delius: these, perhaps, are at the two extreme ends of the British musical spectrum. And, generally speaking, wherever on this spectrum a British composer or musician may be placed, whether in the ultra-violet or infrared of artistic expression, his art will invariably be governed by a constant restraint, a cautious holding back, a reluctance to submit to the rule of the more violent, primitive passions. I mean in particular, the dark "sturm und drang" Germanic passions.

Take the typically Teutonic tendency towards the proudly, massively heroical: think of Wagner's Valhalla, or of Stauss' introduction to Thus Spake Zarathustra (the "2001 Theme".) That same heroic quality is very much in evidence in Brahms' Second Symphony, most noticeably in the last movement, and it's a quality that an orchestra like the London Philharmonic can't quite get across. Can you imagine J. Alfred Prufrock posing as Zarathustra, beating his chest in ecstasy among the mountaintops?

Let me, by way of summing up, toss in a caveat. Reservations about parts of the concert I had, yes; but don't get the impression I'm being more captious than commendatory. If you went, you paid your money, and, standing or sitting, in comfort or discomfort, you got more than you deserved. Because one critic happens to like his Brahms to sound like Brahms, don't think the concert wasn't one of the best, if not the best, that Queen's has been privileged to have in recent years.

Grant Hall sells-out

Due to an unprecendented demand for tickets this year, the Grant Hall Series has been sold out. Current subscribers will be the only ones able to hear the Orchestra Michelangelo di Firenzi, Jacques Ioussier Tiro, Robert De Gaetano, pianist, and the Berlin Philharmonic Octet. Grant Hall subscribers who are unable to attend any of the concerts are asked to return the ticket or tickets to the Division of Concerts, or else telephone (547-6194) to make these tickets available so that the many people requesting single tickets can be accommodated.

Musical Theatre

Queen's Musical Theatre has announced that it has chosen Cabaret as its annual production. The musical, based on stories by Christopher Isherwood, depicts the final days of pre-Nazi Berlin and how the various characters react to their uncertain futures. Throughout the play, life at the cabaret ---the focal point of the story ---- goes on, oblivious to the political turmoil surrounding it.

Auditions for Cabaret will be held Oct. 6 and 7, in Kingston Hall on the Queen's campus, in the Red Room and Room 101 from 7-11p.m., and are open to all members of the University, Last year, Queen's presented The Pyjama Game, and organizers expect an even greater turnout for auditions this year.

Cabaret will be presented 4 nights, running from Feb. 9 to 12.

As A Matter Of Interest

World Hockey

Hockey fans will be pleased to know that John (Bunny) Ahearne is still alive and interested in Canada. Although he can no longer employ his position to promote Canadian dissatisfaction with the W.H.A. he has managed to find time to make a few constructive suggestions about Canadian amature hockey. Suggestions such paying our amatures. Of course, the pay cannot be their stable income. Army work is accepted as a good full time job on the side) But remember, none of those dirty pros!

Mr. Ahearne also took time out of his busy schedule to flaunt the Russian passing game in front of the bloodthirsty Canadian fans. There is no argueing, the Russians do pass extremely well. But those who remember their reaction to the bullying actions of Carl Brewer or his famous slap shot (the one that dribbled into the goal) must be quite content to let Mr. Ahearne continue to enjoy Russian hockey. Perhaps Mr. Ahearne would do the same for us.

Team Ratings

Recently the Globe and Mail published the national college football ratings as determined by the sports writers. Not to suggest that some of these people are not the most competent, (every afternoon paper except the Whig had the Queen's-Waterloo score wrong) but, in making the games, the Whig writer does considerably better than most. Of course, guessing the calibre of college teams is not a particularly certain occupation for anyone, so it can hardly matter how much (or how little) you know. But it seems odd that U. of Toronto, unrated due to an early loss to Carleton, could beat fourth rated Western 29-9 or that Sir George William should be rated at all.

Did you notice that the Calgary Dinosaurs are No. 1? They beat the University of Manitoba who have lost large number of regulars including Kraemer their all-star quarterback. (now a flanker with the Blue Bombers). Interestingly undefeated U. of Alberta, who finished a not too far distant second last year, are unrated. (behind Sir George?)

We'll be glad to go along with the predictions of Bishops in the Q.U.A.A., St. Mary's in the Bluenose, Ottawa, Queen's, Western and Lutheran in the O.U.A.A. but out west (it's only a guess anyway) University of Alberta looks good. Don't be surprised if they find their way to Toronto at the end of the season.

Need Women Writers

Why do women's sports always occupy such a small proportion of the JOURNAL sports page? The women have nearly as many teams playing nearly as many games as the men, so there is no shortage of material. There are a large number of women on campus involved in athletics, so the interest is there. Pictures can help take up space, but what is needed is written material.

The men's program has a number of non-team members writing game reports, team standings, interest stories and forecasts.

The women's sports program has no writers.

The coaches have been asked to appoint publicity officers. Due to the heavy work load already carried by team members and managers, it would be preferable if these officers were not team members. It is difficult to believe that there are no women on campus interested in and able to write interesting and readable stories for publication in the JOURNAL.

Women cannot expect coverage to equal the men's for some time to come, but NOW is the time to start to build a staff at least large enough to handle minimal coverage, if not more. Interested people should leave their names at the JOURNAL office in the Union.

Bews

By R. FELDMAN and G. SMITH

The 33rd season of competition for the James G. Bews trophy, emlematic of supremacy in the men's intramural system was formally inaugurated with the opening election meeting of the men's intramural athletic council.

The year's executive of: Chairman - George Smith, vice-chairman Ross Feldman and University Council rep - Denney Fitzpatrick will be directing the programme under the guidance of Bob Carnagie. Twenty-seven units will be vying for 31 team and individual titles in a spectrum of sports only slightly under intercollegiate calibre.

Phys, Ed. and the engineers dominated in 70-71, a year of transition and reorganization for the Bews, but this year promises more competition with the upsurge of Commerce and Law and the re-emergence of Arts.

There will also be an expanded interfaculty series in a number of sports -- football and hockey most prominently. This year interfaculty games will be scheduled along with the regular Bews games for each particular sport alllowing a longer season for the faculty teams.

The Bews schedule actually started last Thursday with the first event - the golf tournament. D. Charlebois of Phys. Ed. carried away single honours and the team championship went jointly to Commerce '73 and M.B.A. giving them the co-lead for the first week of Bews.

Coming up next is the tug-of-war, the massive yearly encounter of the real campus "heavies". Football, rugger and soccer starts Monday giving ample opportunity for venting of early frustrations.

Finally, the first Jock of the Week Award goes to the boys of the Law III football team who seem to have been practising since August 1 and have lured several ex-Gaels out

W.I.C. Athletic Night

On Tuesday, the Women's Intramural Committee held its athletic night to provide an opportunity for girls to become acquainted with W.I.C. The evening included volleyball and broomball games, skits, tours and lots of fun.

The W.I.C. invites all women on campus to get involved. The essence of an intramural program is participation – experience should not be considered a prerequisite for involvement.

If you wish to participate in any sport, contact your faculty representative or sign up on the Intramural Board in the women's Locker Room. If no list is posted for the sport in which you are interested, place your name, faculty, year, and the sport you wish to enter in the green box in the Locker Room.

The faculty reps are: For Arts '72 - Arlene MacIntyre, Arts '73 - Claire St. Arnaud, Arts '74 - Pam Parke, Arts '75 - Devane Smith, Commerce - Laurie Vanderburgh, Law - Kathy Ford, Meds - Barb Thompson, Nursing - Sandy Johnston, P.H.E. - Gail Bagiuk, Rehab - Bonnie McNab. There is no athletic stick for Education as yet – any volunteers?

The reps are responsible for getting in touch with those who have signed up and for publicizing their events. W.I.C. calendars, outlinging the activities for the year, are available in the Locker Room. These also explain the organization and award systems of the W.I.C. If you don't have one yet, why not pick one up? Also, watch the JOURNAL for news of future events.

As a reminder, entries close for basketball on Friday, Oct. land for badminton on Monday, Oct. 4 at 5 p.m. The W.I.C. Tennis Tournament takes place Sunday from 12 to 6 p.m.

Watch for the W.I.C. symbol for further news and results, and remember – Intramurals are for fun...

COME OUT AND SUPPORT YOUR FACULTY.

Offence 36 — Defence 12 — Carleton 25

By DAVE CAMERON

After an incredibly boring game between the Ottawa Gee-Gees and the Laurentian Voyageurs (won, surprisingly enough, by the Gee-Gees, 34-0) fans at Landsdowne Park in Ottawa were jolted into complete consciousness by the sudden collision of the Queen's Golden Gaels and the Carleton Ravens. It didn't take long, 54 seconds to be exact, for things to happen. Don Gormley (No. 4; watch him on Saturday) hauled in a 49 yard pass for a Raven touchdown after they gained possession of their own on-side kick-off. For the next ten minutes or so, however, there was only one team on the field. Carleton kicked off and three plays later, Gord McLellan ran 43 yards for the Gael's first of many touchdowns. After that things settled into an awesome routine.

4:26: McLellan again ran 43 yards for the Queen's major. 5:31: Carleton quarterback threw a perfect strike to Jay Craydon, Gael defensive halfback, who went 57 yards for the touchdown. 6:54: again a perfect strike to another defensive back, Bill McNeill, who walked 39 yards to the Carleton end zone. 7:45: Brian Warrender burst over from the Raven 3 yard line for another major. 11:21: still another score by McLellan from the Carleton 2. Score after one quarter: Queen's 41, Carleton 6.

The Ravens scored at the start of the second quarter and the score at the half was 41-13. The game was all but over, and by this time Coach Tindall decided that it was as good a time as any to test his second string players. It resulted in a generally lacklustre game for the remaining 45 minutes.

At the start of the second half the Gaels arose and once again asserted their superiority as Taylor threw to Stu Lang who went 74 yards for the touchdown. Queen's scoring was complete. The remainder of the game saw the Gaels return to hibernation as the Ravens kept plugging away, scoring two more touchdowns in the final quarter to make the final score 48-25.

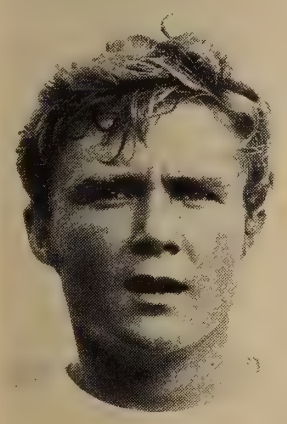
Soccer Opens With Crucial Game

By WALTER SPUNDE

Saturday, 2 p.m., Queen's soccer team kicks off its first league game at Carleton. The result of this game should be a strong indication of Queen's play-off prospects.



Although Carleton has only won one of its six encounters with Queen's, and that in '68, it has always been a troublesome team to beat. Last year, Queen's won two hard fought victories 4-3, and 2-1. If Carleton is up to the standard of last year, Queen's, who have not been in training for as long as their opponents, will have their hands full on Saturday.

In the variation of the 4-2-4 coached by Johnny Walker, the role of the 'sweeper' is critical. Besides determining off-sides, (like a moving blue-line in hockey), he must also gauge the weak point of the defensive line, and fill it. Thus if one of the two full-backs (or the centre-half) moves up in attack, the sweeper must fill the defensive hole that results. Captain Gerry Birks, or Joe Gillini, who played with OQAA champions McMaster last year, appear to be the two players capable of filling this spot. The two full-back positions vacated by Em. Richardson, and Barry Armstrong, both strong attacking players, seem to be more difficult to fill. MacMurray plays in the spirit of the system, but occasionally is a little shakey. Dave Young, and Alfred Korman are solid, but tend to play conservatively. Stan Taylor, a Queen's stalwart for several years past, should fill the centre-half spot, but faces a strong challenge from Dominic Zeffiro, an accomplished new-comer from Mohawk College.

A vital role is played by the two 'link' men, who, like a pair of locomotive pistons, must provide the links between backs and forwards. On them depends the formation of the attack, and the solidity of the defence, and, like the sweeper, they must have a keen positional sense. Here Birks, or Gillini, Zeffiro, and Frank Jackson are the leading contenders.

On the forward line Queen's plays a flexible system in which the strikers change their positions with the flow of the game, although two usually prefer the outside, and two the inside. This may make it difficult for the opposing defence, but it also demands very good understanding between the players. In the early stages of the exhibition games this understanding left something to be desired, but improved promisingly as the games progressed. Gord Taylor seems a certain choice for one of these spots. Last year's forwards Davie Robertson and Bruce Wormald face strong competition from Nick Drysdale, Neven Marendic, Andy Potrowski, Tony Lohman, and veteran Andy Pipe for the remaining three spots. Several other players are staking claims for places, and it seems a pity that, for financial reasons, Queen's no longer has a second team.

The final squad will not be known until Friday night, and whether the daily efforts of Johnny Walker and a keen bunch of players to knit together Queen's fluid style of football have been successful, will not be known until Saturday afternoon.

VIETNAM — President Nguyen Van Thieu's Administration last week launched his low-keyed campaign of parade and pro-government meetings, urging the South Vietnamese to give President Thieu a mandate in the October 3 one-man elections.

In a television address to the nation, Thieu claimed that the three major promises of his 1967 election campaign - an end to the war, a strengthened democracy, and an assured social justice - had been fulfilled, and that he has brought to South Vietnam its "most democratic period".

Thieu's former opponents in the race, Vice-president Ky and Gen. Duong Van Minh, who dropped out because they felt Thieu had effectively rigged the elections, are formulating their last minute plan for a boycott of the elections, forcing Thieu to step down.

Meanwhile, American and South Vietnamese forces have been put on a special alert to meet the threat of increasing Communist attacks aimed at disrupting the elections.

A team of scientists has found evidence that women taking birth control pills appear more likely than non-users to suffer gene damage. But researchers caution that the project is not over, and its implications for human health are not yet clear.

Similar damage can also be caused by some drugs and other substances which are commonly consumed, like coffee.

USA — the number of preschool children has declined sharply in the United States during the 1960's, making zero population growth within this century a distinct possibility, a research team has concluded.

Children under age five decreased from more than 20 million in 1960 to about 17 million in 1970, a drop of 15.5 percent.

USA — United States President Nixon and Japanese Emperor Hirohito met briefly in Anchorage, Alaska as the Emperor and his party made a stop-over on their way to a tour of Western Europe. This marks the first time a ruling Japanese monarch has left Japan.

During short discussions with the Emperor, Nixon made no reference to the planned nuclear test on Amchitka, which has caused a straining of relations with Japan, as well as with Canada and a large portion of the U.S.

President Nixon has said he personally will decide whether the test goes ahead. He gave no indication during the weekend that he may cancel the blast, which has already cost the U.S. Treasury more than $250 million.

Senate accepts final report from discipline committee

By Bill Johnston

The Queen's senate has accepted and put into effect the bulk of the report presented by its special committee on grievance, discipline and related matters.

A few of the recommendations have been referred to various bodies for further consideration, and minor changes have been made in several others, but on the whole the senate accepted the committee's work as produced.

The committee was appointed in January 1970 to make a thorough study of grievance and discipline procedures which existed at Queen's at that time and to recommend necessary changes. The immediate spur to appointment of the committee was the complaint by graduate student Charles Edwards that his thesis advisor was applying political pressure to him. No adequate procedure seemed to exist to settle the grievance, and the university had to set up a special committee to resolve it.

Then the discipline study committee began its work. It examined a great number of documents and procedures from Queen's and other universities, and decided that discipline cases should basically be handled through existing informal channels.

But it said there should also exist an explicit statement of rights and duties for members of the university, and that there should be created "more and visible formal procedures with clear channels of appeal".

The key to the formal procedures is the Ultimate Tribunal, which will consist of an independent outside arbitrator assisted by two nominees, appointed by the two parties to a case, who will advise the arbitrator but not assist him in making his decision. The Ultimate Tribunal will have final authority to decide upon the merits of all adjudicative matters of grievance.

On the same day the senate accepted the proposals of its study committee on discipline, a rent-a-cops were seen on the Queen's campus for the first time. bers of the Senate, will exist and have jurisdiction to determine if a case should go on to the Ultimate Tribunal.

Most cases of grievance will continue to be handled by existing bodies, such as residence boards, AMS court, faculty boards and so on, which now examine them. In future, however, these bodies will be required to produce written documents outlining under what circumstances a person's actions violate their rules and stating how such violations will be dealt with. All such bodies must also spell out what appeal procedures are available.

The committee spent a great deal of time considering the role of police and the RCMP on campus. Although the Senate has no power over police, the committee made it clear that they felt that no RCMP surveillance should be allowed on campus and recommended that machinery be set up so that any member of the university who suspects that police surveillance is being performed on the campus may appeal to a special government authority who can handle such appeals. Such a body would have to be established by the government, of course.

The committee also recommended that a Faculty-Student Advisor be appointed who would work with members of the university community whenever police investigations were being carried on, to protect the freedom of the university and to prevent "the misunderstanding that arises from clandestine investigations". All investigations by police would be carried out in the presence of the Faculty-Student Advisor and minutes of such inquiries would be kept by the Advisor. When a person wishes a formal security clearance, he will authorize the Faculty-Student Advisor in writing to release the private information requested by police.

The committee also examined the problem of public and private information to determine what information should be released by the university and to whom. The committees recommendation on this subject was rejected by the Senate and an ad hoc committee will study this problem further.

The committee also examined the problem of large-scale violence and destruction on campus. In general, any disturbance is to be handled by the AMS constables if it involves students or faculty members, and by the police if non-members of the university are involved.

Student killed in crash after Carleton game

A first-year arts and science student was killed early Thursday on her way home from the Queen's-Carleton football game.

Orianne Jeanne Laver, 18, died in Hotel Dieu Hospital, Kingston, from injuries suffered when the Volkswagen in which she was riding turned over on Highway 15 north of Kingston.

With two male Queen's students, one of whom was injured slightly, she was returning to Ottawa about two a.m.

Miss Laver came to Queen's from Woodroffe High School in Ottawa. She was entering a B.A. programme with a concentration in biology, and lived in Victoria Hall.

The funeral was held in Ottawa.

Friday and Saturday the flag over Theological Hall flew at half-staff in her memory. The flags over Richardson Stadium flew at the official mourning position, just below the top of the staff, for Saturday's game, and a moment of silence was observed before the game began.

Miss Laver's brother Kenneth is a member of Science 73.

Government won't accept Senate urgings on RCMP

A year and a half of comprehensive effort by the Senate Committee on Grievance, Discipline and Related Matters came to an end at last Thursday's Senate meeting when the majority of the 57 recommendations made by the committee were adopted as Senate policy.

The committee did a fantastic amount of work in examining the methods adopted at Queen's and other universities to deal with grievance and discipline matters and produced a report which seems to provide a maximum of clarity and fairness in an area which can often become very confusing in the emotional height of any given incident.

The committee has produced a comprehensive set of guidelines for handling a very wide number of possible problems which could occur at this university, and it is difficult to determine the effect of some of the recommendations until such time as a problem arises. A number of the recommendations, for instance, dealt with problems which Queen's has not as yet had to face.

One of their recommendations, which appears to be a highly praiseworthy one, appears quite unlikely to ever be carried out. This is the recommendation that the federal government be urged that "there should be no general continuous, permanently authorized RCMP surveillance on campus . . . and that machinery be set up and publicly announced whereby the university or any member of its staff or student body who finds reason to believe that police surveillance is being performed on the university campus may appeal to a special government authority named and known as being responsible for dealing with such appeals."

This recommendation is unlikely to be carried out because of the nature of the present federal government. For ten years, sharp restrictions have been imposed on RCMP campus investigations, but Solicitor-General Jean-Pierre Goyer, who is responsible for the RCMP, indicated early in the summer that this policy is no longer firm.

Prime Minister Trudeau, in a May TV interview, had this to say when asked about changing times requiring a change of police tactics even on college campuses: "It's apparent that if the revolution and the revolts are going to begin on campuses, if the instigators of violent dissent are going to find their natural milieu there, there can be no more exception for the intellectual part of the community in the name of academic freedom than there can be for you and me in the name of any other freedoms."

The federal government thus seems very unlikely to respond positively to any request from a university of the type recommended by the Senate committee, and, in fact, it is not at all unlikely that the federal government might even encourage a little more campus investigating to provide information for Goyer's new intelligence group.

It is hoped, however, that regardless of the attitude of the federal government, the university will continue to hold the attitude displayed by the committee in being very antipathetic toward RCMP fishing expeditions on campus.

Speak louder, I can't hear!

The other day, I had occasion to reflect on the phenomenom of noise. I had to. I couldn't hear what a lecturer was saying because of the noise from the construction currently taking place around Watson Hall.

Noise, it occurred to me, has become a central part of my life. Not only is my classroom concentration broken by construction noises, but also my sleep is often rudely disturbed by the sounds of the construction of Elrond College, since I live near the college at the corner of Division St. and Princess. At night, the sounds of squealing tires and the roar of over-built engines in cars driven by under-brained Kingstonians keeps me from falling too easily into sleep and the same motor-maniacs prevent me from doing much studying.

The Kingston police seem determined not to enforce either the noise by-laws or the speeding laws along any of the streets of Kingston, so the car noises will likely continue. And construction seems to have become a central fact of university life, so that noise will undoubtedly not let up either, at least soon.

Only one thing keeps me going in the face of such loud opposition, which has recently been graced with the name noise pollution. It is the fact that some scientists have found a direct correlation between sensitivity to noise and intelligence. So reacting adversely to noise is merely an indication that you have brains and the more upset you get, the smarter you are.

Such information allows me to face my impending deafness a little more calmly. But you'll have to speak up when you try to talk to me.

letters to the editors

To The Editors,

Who is this idiot Broadbent that writer the Dormouse in your September 24 issue? To put it plainly, is he cracked or something? Frankly, the urine he spreads in his article should have been preserved for the washroom. Someone should take Broadbent's hand and lead him around Queen's, showing him the location of the various washrooms in case he has to go again, in the manner in which he did in his — I'm tempted to say pants — "article." Besides, a good pee in place of writing would likely make Broadbent feel better.

More frankly yet, I've heard more logical squawks of protest come from the mouths of camels, ducks, and chickens about to be beheaded. Broadbent's squawk is vacuous and trivial. But I assume that this is in some way related to a malfunction in his personality. After all, his name gives some indication of what is his trouble — he is broadly bent. In a Freudian sense, if you like.

But as I was pointing to above, I have seen mucous run from the noses of impoverished children, mucous which tells a greater tale than anything Broadbent has to say. I suppose, however, that Broadbent thinks what he wrote is "chic", the "in" thing, what impressionable first year students want to read — after all, never let it be said that Queen's doesn't have its quasi-radical element! Maybe he thinks he's got an axe to grind. But his axe has no head and he's mistakingly grinding the handle. He's spreading nothing rather than the solid wooden chips one expects to find in a university rag. Or are my expectations too high?

Anyway, I was once given some good advice: its better to remain silent and be thought a fool than to open your mouth and prove it. Dig, Alan&

The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act

Law profs ask: Must Edgar Benson obey law?

By David Mullan
and John D. Whyte

(Ed. Note: We asked David Mullan and John Whyte two assistant professors of law at Queen's, to amplify a letter they recently wrote to the Globe and Mail. The letter expressed their concern over the failure of the Minister of Finance to perform the obligations imposed on him by the Federal Temporary Wheat Reserve Act of 1956 to pay out subsidies to the Wheat Board.)

The substance of our complaint is that the Minister of Finance (and also, because they have the ability to correct the illegality and have chosen not to do so, Mr. Turner the Minister of Justice and Mr. Laing the Minister responsible to Parliament for the Wheat Board) are acting illegally and unconstitutionally. To understand why this is so one must first understand that the constitution of Canada is not limited to the provisions of the British North America Act. The B.C.A. Act creates a federal state and contemplates that the legislative branches of the two levels of government will take the form of a parliamentary democracy. As a result the constitution of the country includes all those fundamental rules which operate in any parliamentary democracy under the rule of law. In particular it is constitutionally permissible for members of the executive branch, regardless of status, whether welfare administrator or a cabinet minister, to act only according to the authority vested in them by legislation passed by Parliament.

In other words, when a cabinet member acting as a member of the executive acts in a lawful way it is only lawful because power has been transmitted to him by the legislative branch of government. Likewise if an Act of Parliament orders any member of the executive to act under certain circumstances then that person must as a matter of constitutional law perform the duty imposed upon him. A Minister of the Crown is not entitled to disobey an Act of Parliament.

This obligation on the executive is one aspect of what is known as the Rule of Law. The phrase "rule of law" simply describes a system of social ordering in which no person is above, or able to avoid, the obligations imposed upon him by properly enacted laws regardless of that person's status or position in life.

Mr. Benson is ordered by the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act to make payments to the Wheat Board whenever certain conditions exist. Those conditions do exist yet the Minister is refusing to make payments as directed by the legislation. Why? Because he and his colleagues say that they have a better scheme to provide subsidies for grain farmers and they hope to pass legislation putting the new "better"scheme into effect and repealing the old scheme. In the meantime they act as if there is no continuing obligation. They seem to believe that the legislative directions given to them by Parliament are only to be complied with if convenient and if those directions happen to correspond with the Cabinet's view of the way things ought to be. Where does this place Parliament in the scale of public ordering? Unfortunately what this action means is that the Trudeau cabinet does not see itself bound to obey the will of Parliament but rather the will of members of the executive. Canada cannot, for the time being, be said to be one of those countries enjoying government under the rule of law.

There are two analogies which help to illuminate what is happening. First young vandals will react to the frustrations they experience in their schooling by breaking into a school and destroying equipment. In doing so they ignore the constraints imposed upon them by the criminal law and we not only expect them to be punished for acting outside the law but we also fail to comprehend what could possibly motivate them to perform such acts. Similarly we have a cabinet minister frustrated by what he perceives to be the inefficiency of the parliamentary system in which he has to go through a tedious, time-consuming and possibly embarrassing procedure to get his policy made into law. He reacts to his frustration by taking the law into his own hands and, like the school child, does what he feels is appropriate ignoring all constraints imposed upon him by the law of the country.

Second the late Prime Minister of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, desiring to demonstrate to Jehovah's witnesses how displeased and disquieted he was by their presence in Quebec, chose to take the law into his own hands and revoked the liquor licence of a Jehovah's witness in a way which was entirely beyond the power of revocation contained in the legislation. The Supreme Court of Canada declared Mr. Duplessis' act to be illegal and made him pay for the damage he caused. Likewise it appears to us that Mr. Benson has chosen to ignore totally the limitation imposed on his power and ought to be made to obey the law.

When the matter first came to the notice of the House of of Commons it was suggested that the appropriate procedure was to impeach the Minister before the Bar of the House. However once the Speaker of the House raised doubts as to the availability of this ancient remedy in Canada, it became a matter of investigating the possibility of bringing the Minister before the ordinary courts of the land to answer the allegations made against him. It was at this point that we wrote to the Attorney-General of Canada suggesting that he personally take action against Mr. Benson or that he consent to our taking action. Historically, the Attorney-General has a duty to vindicate public rights in the courts and where a Minister is failing to perform a public duty imposed upon him by statutue, the Attorney-General has an obligation at law to intervene. The courses open to him in such a situation are fourfold. First, he could institute criminal proceedings against the Minister under Section 115 of the Criminal Code which makes it an offence punishable by a maximum of two years imprisonment to disobey an Act of Parliament for breach of which there is no other penalty. The other three alternatives all involve various proceedings in the Federal Court. Two of the remedies, mandamus and mandatory injunction, if awarded, consist in a direction by the Court that the Minister comply with the duties imposed upon him. Failure to obey the order of the Court could ultimately result in the Minister being imprisoned for contempt of court. The final possibility, a declaration, lacks the legally compelling force of the other two but amounts to the Court declaring the legal position of the Minister in such a manner as to impose upon him strong moral constraints not to disregard the terms of the declaration.

The Federal Attorney-General is, of course, in a most ambivalent position in the present situation. His duty to the public as a servant of the Crown involves legal action against a fellow Cabinet Minister. Given practical realities it is difficult therefore to envisage him instituting such proceedings, either civil or criminal. The alternative is for a member of the public to commence such proceedings, However here too difficultires are involved. The offence created by Section 115 of the Criminal Code is an indictable offence and it is not possible for a private citizen in Canada to prosecute an indictable offence to a conclusion. The Crown Attorney must be persuaded to take over the case. Similarily, with respect to the three possible civil remedies, a private citizen with no spcial interest cannot bring an action unless the Attorney-General agrees to sign the writ. For this reason we, as private citizens, would once again be confronted by the Attorney-General's discretion if we wished to take steps against the Minister.

There are, however, two possible alternatives to going through the Federal Attorney-General. The first is for a person with a special interest, such as the Wheat Board itself or, possibly, a wheat farmer to commence proceedings. The second alternative and the one that has in fact been adopted is to approach a Provincial Attorney-General to sign the writ initiating proceedings rather than the Federal Attorney-General. By virtuure of the British North America Act the provinces are given jurisdiction over the administration of justice and this probably means that provincial Attorney-General, as well as the Federal Attorney-General, can lend their support to this kind of action. On this basis a group of Saskatchewan farmers, with the approval of the Attorney-General of Saskatchewan, have now commenced mandamus proceedings against Mr. Benson of the Federal Court (see below). Possibly, the major obstacle to such proceedings is the enactment of the new legislation before the case can be heard. If this happens the Federal Court could hold that the issue has ceased to be relevant. Because of this and despite dependence on a Crown Attorney, criminal proceedings may be preferable for the passing of the new Act will not excuse the commission of offences in the past by the Minister.

The events of the last two weeks concerning the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act indicate that the Trudeau Government is merely paying lip service to fundamental principles. For this reason it is really irrelevant whether the new legislation is an improvement on the present situation, though obviously the amount of opposition that the Bill has generated serves to make the breach worse.

The Reserves Act and its proposed replacement

The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act requires the federal government to make payments to the Wheat Board amounting to 1-30th of a cent a day per bushel for stored wheat, applying only to stored wheat exceeding 178 million bushels. The farmers pay the cost of storage on wheat below that volume.

Although the government pays the money to the Wheat Board, that money does not reach the farmer until at least six or seven months after the close of a crop year. This means that any final payment for the 1970-71 crop year would not reach farmers until the spring of 1972.

When a farmer delivers grain to a country elevator, he is paid an initial price for it. The Wheat Board then sells this wheat to various customers and any margin between the initial price and the final selling price goes into making up the final payment to the farmer. Payments under the Wheat Reserves Act plus interest are also part of this final payment.

The government's Prairie Grain Stabilization Plan, now being debated in the Commons, would make an immediate payment of $100 million to farmers and would set up a fund from which farmers would get a subsidy in years of abnormally-low incomes.

The opposition parties have been waging a fierce battle in the Commons to force the government to withdraw this proposed legislation and to make payments under the Reserves Act. They claim that the government is flagrantly breaking the law by withholding payments.

Prime Minister Trudeau has not been influenced by charges that the government has been breaking the law, however. He has said that if payments under the Reserves Act are made or if the new legislation is held up much longer by the opposition parties, the proposed bill will be withdrawn. He commented, "Sorry, we're prepared to increase payments to the western grain farmer from $60 million to $100 million but we're not prepared to increase it to $160 million. So you must make your choice."

Justice Minister John Turner has also denied that the government is breaking the law. "We've not admitted we're breaking the law," he said. "We've admitted there is a debt to the farmers."

He added that a debt can legally be satisifed by an alternative payment and that the government's proposed legislation would do that.

Four Sask. farmers take action

Four Saskatchewan farmers have filed a court action, supported by the New Democratic provincial government, to force the federal government to make payments due to farmers under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

The application for a writ of mandamus was filed against Finance Minister Edgar Benson in the federal court in Regina Thursday under the names of Attorney,General Roy Romanow and the four farmers.

Such a writ, if granted, would force the government to make long-deferred payments to the Canadian Wheat Board under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, amounting to a sum which has been estimated as either $62 or $90 million.

The government has made no payments under the legislation since July, 1970, intending to replace them with larger payments under the new Prairie Grains Income Stabilization Act.

Romanow said the Saskatchewan government has, in effect, lent its name or support to the farmers' action in an attempt to insure the four have "standing in the court." Papers concerning the court action were served on Benson in Ottawa Thursday. They require the finance minister or his representative to appear in federal court in Regina Tuesday Oct. 5

If you feel that your life has been dull and you haven't been able to get everything together for yourself, I would recommend weekly visits to the prisons around Kingston to get involved with people who maybe haven't been as fortunate in their life as you have. It is is a very educational and rewarding experience if you have the courage to accept the challenge. You will not only be helping a man or a woman who is on the wrong side of law but you will be helping yourself understand many of the problems that face our society today.

There are several areas that you can work in, depending on your personality, so that you needn't fear getting involved in something you don't want to do. After your committment is made you should be prepared to stick by it because the inmates learn to look forward to a visit from an outsider. It is a bright spot in a dull week.

I have worked at the Calvary Drop-In for the last two years. At times it has been just about the most frustrating segment of my University career, yet at others it has been the most rewarding. One thing I have discovered is that being involved in social work does not involve the giving up of time and energy in the pursuit of dragging, semi-tangible ideals; it can be a great deal of fun.

The Calvary Drop-in is located north of Princess Street on Bagot in an area which is not as well off as that surrounding the University. Many of the kids who come are from one-parent families, often on welfare. They are quite tough, and, if given the opportunity, can become rather wild. Once, in a school gym we use, they started to throw Basketballs, volleyballs and various other odds and ends at each other. We were forced to chuck them out a bit early before windows or equipment were damaged.

There was one little guy I got to know quite well last year who was small compared to the others, and quite shy and passive. One evening in the gym he followed me around closely for about half an hour, just watching the other kids and talking to me. Then suddenly he started to tear around, chasing the others and generally having a ball. I think my presence, just talking and taking a bit of time with him, had given him the self-confidence to do this.

There is a very close sense of kinship within the volunteer group. We are all motivated by the same desire to get to know the kids and have an enjoyable time with them. As far as group interaction, helping each other out with problems and preparing an effective program is concerned, the drop-in has been great.

David Nawton.

VOLUNTEER You could make a difference

On any given night in Kingston, some kids are hanging around the street corners, others are vandalizing school buildings, others are shooting dope somewhere, some are tearing around the streets in their parents' cars, some are home, being bored with TV. A few are sitting out sentences in one of Kingston's prisons, a few others are in one of the local hospitals, trying to recover from a bad trip or overdose.

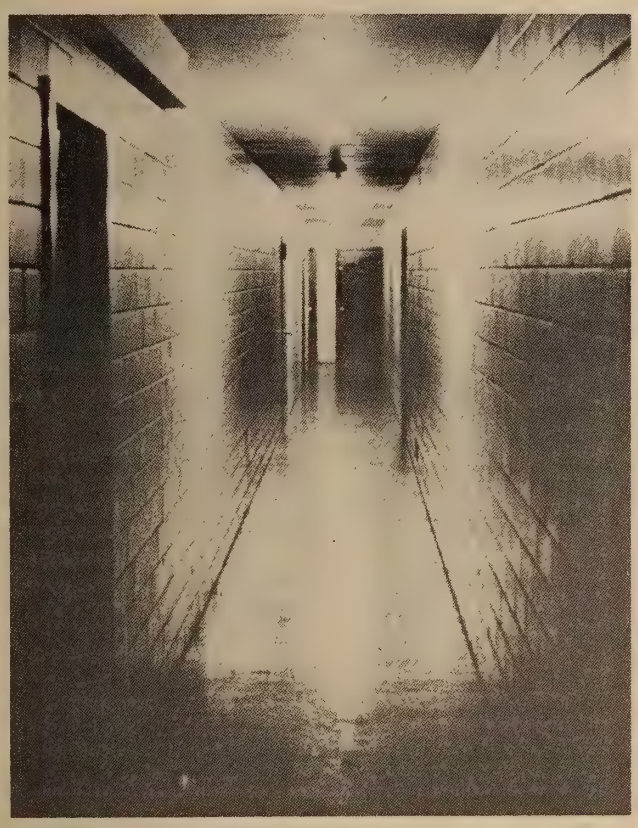
At the same time, other kids are playing basketball in a school gym, or are sitting around talking with some older students or their friends in a drop-in, or are discussing a book, or are playing with toys they never could afford, or are taking swimming lessons, or taking part in a sing-song.

Many of the second group of kids are doing what they are instead of what the others are because of the efforts of a lot of Queen's students who found that they were spending a lot of empty evenings, too, and could feel more useful and enjoy themselves more by giving other kids a chance to do something constructive.

There are in Kingston some forty social service organizations which attempt to provide services for many of Kingston's not-so-fortunate people. This often just means providing recreational outlets, like drop-ins or places to take part in sports.

These programmes depend for their success on having enough people to run them. Three years ago, an organization called the Student Volunteer Bureau was set up to attempt to make sure there were enough people.

The Bureau attempts to find enough Queen's students who are looking for something socially useful, as well as enjoyable, to do but who don't know where they would go to get involved. The Bureau is in contact with nearly all of the forty agencies and knows what type of programmes they are running and what type and how many people they need to keep running.



Last year, nearly 400 people got involved in this type of activity through the Volunteer Bureau, and, as indicated by the personal descriptions on this page, they found the work both enjoyable and interesting.

To describe the work of the Bureau is difficult and the personal comments below give a much better picture of what goes on than a general statement could.

Also, to introduce people to volunteer work and to the particular areas in which students could help out, the Bureau is holding a Volunteer Conference Wednesday night, Oct. 6, in Stirling Hall between 7 and 9.

Try it. You could find that Queen's is more than books and beer.

Last year, I was involved with the Tutorial program at the Sydenham Street United Church. Basically it involved being there from 6:30 to 7:30 every Monday night. The format was simple — free play time with games and toys supplied for ten to fifteen minutes, the actual tutoring session — each tutor had his own room — this lasted for about forty minutes, and five or ten minutes of play at the end until the drivers arrived to take the children home.

The object of the program is to develop a big-brother or big-sister relationship with a child generally from a poor economic background who has problems at school, and-or in the home. The boy I worked with was a victim of cerebral palsy and had to wear braces on his shoes to help him walk correctly. In spite of his handicap, he is one of the toughest, and fiercest competitors at eight years of age that I have known. Some of the tutoring session were very rewarding but because he borders on being hyper-active, we very often did not get a heck of a lot of work done. Sometimes we would do spelling or reading, other times we would just talk, and we developed a very close relationship through these meetings and other 'extracurricular' activities. We had him over for dinner several times and a friend of mine taught him how to play chess. We went to the Santa Claus parade together and he had me over to his home once or twice.

Wednesdays were invariably busy and Wednesday night seemed, week after week, the coldest of the year. It was a struggle to find the time to read the book, and it was even more of a struggle to wrench my way out of the warm apartment every Wednesday evening. There were so many other things I could and should be doing. But, as the car filled with the friendly chatter of the other three volunteers approached Joyceville, I always discovered that I was glad that I had found the energy to come.

Beyond the guard at the front gate and the signing in at the desk, beyond the two remote controlled doors and the long walk down the echoing corridors, there waited a group of men, some quiet and some talkative, who wanted to communicate with us. I don't know exactly what the two hours we spent with them each week meant to them. I do know that they looked forward to our coming and that no matter what book we had read, it never failed to spark discussion. Whether it was about Portnoy's Complaint by Philip Roth or Nausea by Jean-Paul Sartre, these men had a lot to say, either as a group or as individuals. It was as people with different backgrounds and philosophies that they became important; their status as convicts in an institutional environment seemed irrelevant except when they themselves had something to say about it.

Wednesday evenings were, for me, among the most stimulating and thought-provoking times of the year. I only hope that the members of the group in the prison found the time as well spent as I did.

Although the ownership status of CFRC "Queensradio" is dubious, its program for the fall sounds promising. The station will run Thursdays through Sundays at 91.9 FM and 1490 AM. Among the FM highlights will be weekly concerts by the Cleveland Orchestra.

Both AM and FM feature "Classics by Request" every Sunday from 12:00 to 3:30. On Saturdays both AM and FM programs include an hour of French music, plays and discussion followed by live broadcast of Golden Gael football. In the evening "Music Round the World" will feature music from varying cultures.

Those who prefer light music should listen to "Nocturne" which mixes light and heavy rock each night at 10 p.m. Saturday Sounds and Sunday Pops both offer "easy listening music" at 4:30 p.m. This year a BBC comedy with Peter Sellers - The Good Show, can be heard Thursdays at 7:30. If you would like to know what is going on at Queen's listen to Happenings at 6:55 p.m. Fridays and Saturdays. If you aren't totally insular, listen to Let's Discuss It, a public affairs program from Toronto's CFRC.

CFRC is completely student-operated and it encourages volunteers to come to the CFRC Student Radio Club meetings on Monday evenings. Those with any ideas for programming or with any desire to broadcast will have to wait till December, since programs are set up in two month periods.

But if you really want to hear your voice on the air, call the open line Campus Comment Thursday nights at 8:00.

Carleton Holds

or, How Queen's Failed to Score

Those with doubts about the soundness of Queen's soccer teeth, bared so ferociously against R.M.C. and Ryerson had them confirmed in Ottawa on Saturday. It would not be quite correct to say that Queen's lost. They simply failed to win. As the frustrating game struggled through its second half, it became more and more alarmingly clear that the suspect tooth was not being filled, but pulled. Carleton picked it up: 1-0 to them.

In contrast to their exhibition games, Queen's started well by drawing up the Carleton defence to send Davie Robertson down the left wing. A good cross from Robertson resulted in goal-mouth panic for Carleton, and a free kick for Queen's. A planned free kick combination didn't quite come off, but it was an excellent opening. Three minutes later Carleton returned the favour, driving their left wing deep into Queen's half. Queen' defence, however, showed ultra-cool in proceeding to short-pass the ball out of their end, and though they

Playoffs

October seems to be the one month of the year when practically everyone is aware of that extra sports excitement which accompanies playoff action. This is really no surprise when one considers that both the baseball season in the States and the professional and college football seasons in Canada are rapidly coming to a conclusion.

There is, however one question which always accompanies sports playoffs; what's the point. There can be no doubt about the answer; the point is to pick the champion...or is it? Look at the National baseball league. The first place team in the Western division had a record just slightly worse than the second place team in the East. This too could be academic, except that the eastern division proved in their interlocking games that they were stronger than the west and the second place team in the east had to play more games against the teams in its own stronger division. So what is a five-game playoff between the two first place teams really going to decide, after every team has already played a 162 game schedule? The fact is that playoffs make money, and as long as the public is satisfied that the two teams playing off are even close to being the best they will pay like mad to see the game. (N.F.L. Playoff is the best example). Another example of the lopsided division situation is found in the Eastern section of the O.U.A.A. Not to suggest that Ottawa does not deserve to be in the playoffs, (they ranked No. 1 in the nation) but they are in an exceptionally weak division. It is unrealistic to think that if Ottawa and Toronto were tied Ottawa would be an adequate representative in a playoff. After all, aside from the points generated within their own divisional play Northern Division Teams have captured only four points from interlocking play. The simple truth is that Laurentian and York are no competition and have supplied the Gee Gees with a handy training ground for second stringers and a rest for any injured players for four games of an eight game schedule. The teams in the Capitol division get no such picnic privileges and have almost no chance of unseating Ottawa for a playoff position unless all three teams in the Capitol division should someday be stronger than the Gee Gees. So it doesn't matter this year; what about next year when Queen's and Toronto begin to reap the benefits of a rebuilding program...one of them is going to be gyped out of a playoff birth.

Speaking of playoff action, it's about time to begin to examine who's where in the O.U.A.A..Believe it or not Laurention has finally won a game. For the fifth time in three years the Voyageurs defeated the York Yeomen to continue York's two year winning famine. Somehow it seems ludicrous that either of those teams should win a game, but since they play home and home it was just bound to happen. (wouldn't a 50-50 tie have been more satisfying?)

We seriously doubt that this sudden ressurgence by the Voyageurs will threaten Ottawa's playoff hopes. Unless Carleton wins all three of their remaining encounters and Ottawa loses all of their games Ottawa has wrapped up the Northern division. It may be premature, but we'll give it to the Gee Gees.

All other divisions are still up for grabs with Queen's having a slight edge in the Capitol and only needing one victory against Varsity to clinch a playoff birth. In the western section anything goes but we still expect to see Western and Lutheran in the playoffs.

Women's tennis 'smashing"

Teams from Queen's, York, McMaster, Trent and Guelph gathered October 1st and 2nd for Part A of the OWIAA competition at Guelph. The Queen's team consisted of Wende Youens (Arts 74) as First Singles (also first singles last year); Miriam Gordon (PHE 75) Second Singles; Cindy Riach (PHE 71) and Louise Raycroft (McMaster PHE 71) both at McArthur, as First Doubles. (Cindy played second doubles last year); Kathy Stewart (Arts 73) and Sarah Shannon (Arts 73) as second doubles; and Miriam Spence (Arts 75) as a spare player. A round robin was held in each event with a match as best two out of three sets. Ties were broken, and two points were awarded for each win. Queen's won all of their matches for 32 points, McMaster gained 24 points, Trent 10, York 10, and Guelph 4.

mine the competitors to go to the Ontario's Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association finals at Carleton on October 15 and 16. The top three in each event and the top two teams overall will go to these finals. From our division the entire teams of both Queen's and McMaster, Trent's second singles and first doubles and Guelph's second doubles will be going.

The other division, Part B, consists of Toronto, Western, Laurentian, Carleton andMcGill, of which the first three are probably the strongest.

The Queen's team showed well last year, and looks like championship material this year.

lost it once, persisted, and lost it again six yards from the posts. Carleton 1, Queen's 0, after four minutes.

For the next few minutes a stunned Queen's defence held back, allowing the Carleton forwards more room to move. Carleton became stocky in their play, pushing Queen's roughly off the ball. As a result Queen's received a good share of free kicks. A corner kick forced upon Carleton from the successful execution of one of these, saw a waist high header by Dominic Zeffiro just deflected past the post..

A period of play followed in which the action swung from one end to the other in an uncertain test of strength. With twenty minutes left in the final half, Queen's emerged stronger, and began to apply consistent pressure on the Carleton goal. Over the next ten minutes, Queen's had no less than three corner kicks, of which at least two were completely wasted. A harassed Carleton defence resorted to tougher tactics, and Queen's obliged by frittering away their free kicks. Apart from one good shot by Bruce Wormald, Queen's continued threatening to score without finding the right direction.

Then, with five minutes to the half, goalie Flood saved the team from an uncomfortable half time deficit, when Carleton finally broke free,and had a low shot from close range deflected out of the goal. In the last minute a Carleton player threw a punch at Nick Drysale, who had been playing an outstanding game for Queen's at link. Drysdale, unhurt, but emotionally upset by the incident, (and rightly so) fell to his knees, and was unable to regain his equilibrium until the offender was sent from the field. Carleton would have to play the entire second half with ten men. It seemed that it would only be a matter of time until Queen's would "clock", and score,and score again.

The second half opened with Carleton all out for that extra goal's insurance. Flood punched a curling corner kick at shoulder height off the very goal line. The ball, however, was regained by Carleton, and passed to two unmarked players on the other side of the goal. The striker was so surprised by this piece of luck, and perhaps too by Flood's reappearance from out of the net he'd become entangled in, that he tripped over his jockey-strap, and missed the goal completely.

By the 15th minute of play, the ation had settled into a pattern that was maintained to the final whistle. Carleton fell back into a tight defensive formation, and Queen's continued to penetrate without getting a shot on goal. Whenever Carleton got hold of the ball, they belted it down over the half-way mark.

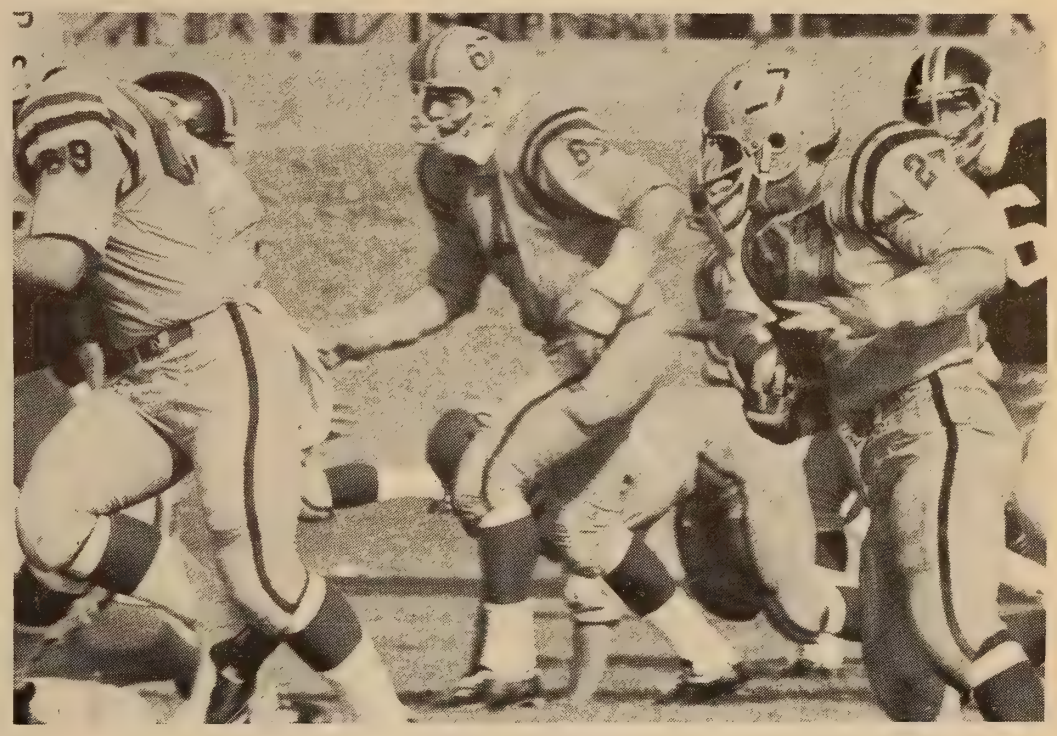
Gaels move to first: pluck Ravens 22-0

The heavily-bandaged Golden Gaels moved into sole possession of the Capitol Division lead Saturday with a satisfying 22-0 victory over the Carleton Ravens. Playing before some 9000 fans, the Gaels showed an impressive ground game which chewed up yards and the clock, especially late in the game, and produced three touchdowns. Brian Warrender led all rushers with 143 yards on 19 carries, while rookie Dave Hadden provided the real excitement, breaking off tackle to go 95 yards for the Gaels' opening score. Hadden later received a watch as the game's Most Valuable Player.

Except for this burst, the first half was marked by tough defensive play--surprisingly so, for teams with long injury lists. The Gaels established an early territorial advantage, and never relinquished this control, bad field position forced Carleton to concede a safety touch mid-way through the second quarter, in a vain effort to escape their own end of the field. Queen's defense was like the classical rubber band--it stretched a little, then snapped back hard.



The second half was a little more open, as the Ravens went to the air (they had to: net rushing in second half was a paltry 12 yards.) The Gaels' ground attack kept grinding meat, while Tom Taylor completed eight of 13 passes, six of them to starry flanker Stu Lang. Warrender scored his eighth TD of the season on a nine-yard plunge in the third quarter, after defensive end Bill Thompson recovered a Bird fumble on the Raven's 42. Taylor picked up the third Gold marker on a fourth-quarter sneak from the one-yard line.

Although Saturday did not match Wednesday's high-scoring spree, the Gaels' play was far more consistent, especially on offense. The offensive line began to look like the well-coordinated machine that usually graces a Tindall-coached team, pushing the Raven defenders all over the map, and giving Tom Taylor plenty of protection on passing plays. We had 394 yards total offense. 'Nuff said!

Defensively, the Gaels stopped the Ravens on several third down attempts, Raven fullback Ron Nutt was still groggy hours after getting stuffed by Brett Biggs (low, Don Smith (Middle) and Mike Lambros (high) on a desperate third-down plunge. The defense held onto their shutout by moving the Ravens from the Queen's three to the eight in three plays - not bad for the bandage squad.

The Gaels should get a bit of a rest next Saturday against York, in Toronto. Some of the walking wounded may not dress, which means the offense will be taking meany pills all week. Look for many points on the board. After the York game, the Gaels finish out the regular season by exchanging homecoming games with the Varsity Blues.

Because of Varisty's loss to the Ottawa Gee-Gees on Saturday. the Gaels have only to win against York and either tie or win one of the games against the Blues to clinch first place in the Capitol division. Don't make any plans to be out of town on October 30. There could be a football game at Richardson Stadium.

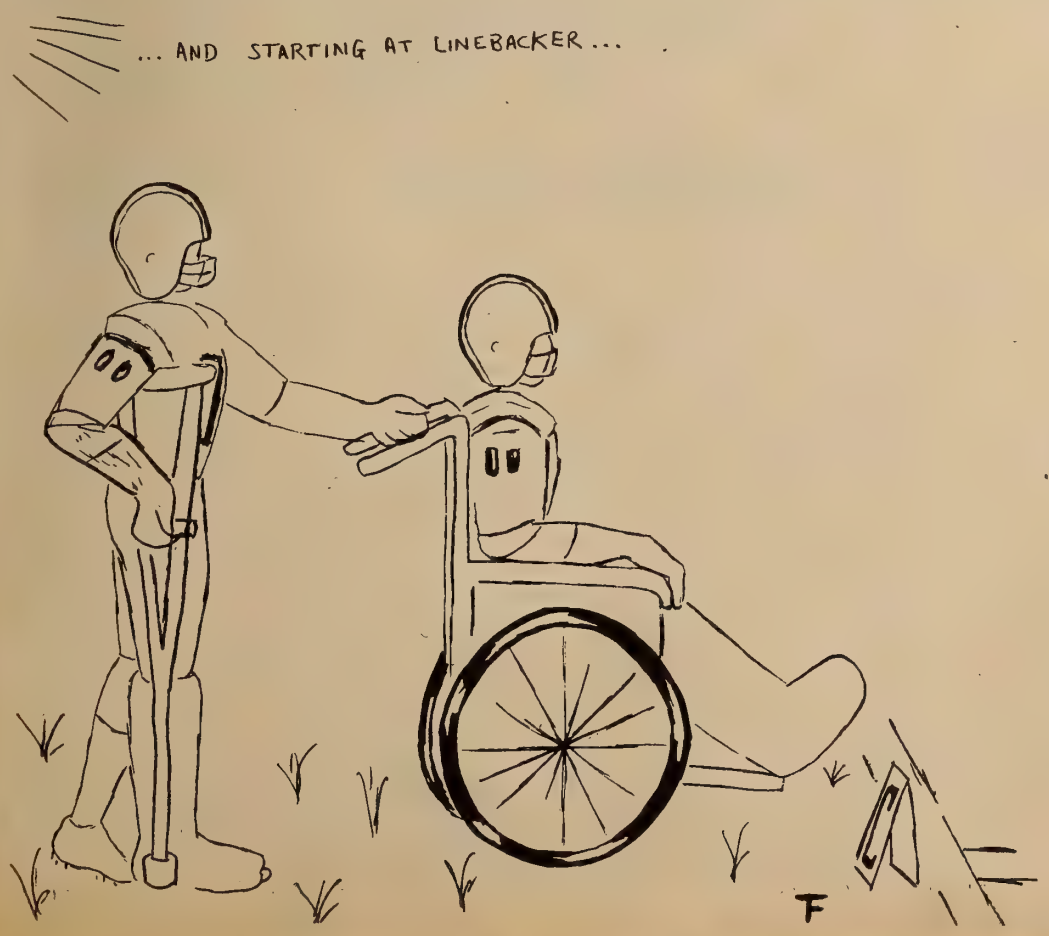
Women's archery

The Women's Archery team travelled to Guelph for an invitational meet this past weekend. Three members of the team have never shot archery before this year and they had not had any practice outdoors before the dayof the meet, as compared to two or three weeks outside by the opposing teams. However, they showed fairly well, and will improve markedly with practice and experience. McMaster lead with 1891 points, followed by Guelph 1830 and Queen's 1453. Janet Spence, the veteran member of the team, shot the only perfect end of the competition.

W.I.C. Tennis tournament



On Sundy afternoon, the W.I.C. schedule began with its first event - the tennis tournament.

Jarmila Smola, of P.H.E. '73, was the tournament winner, defeating Joan Ashlee by 7-5. Third place went to Chris Stewart, while Sue Murdock captured the Consolation award.

The one day tournament, organized by Betty Johnston, was a new idea in the W.I.C. this year. In previous years there has been a "ladder tournament" in which it was left up to the players to hold their play-offs. This did not work successfully, so it was decided to try a new, more organized system.

Only 10 girls participated this year, but tennis is a growing sport and its future on the intramural scene looks promising.

This week the W.I.C. schedule includes Track and Field, Basektball beginning on Tuesday, Oct. 5 and Badminton beginning on Thursday, Oct. 7.

CANADA

Former Communications minister Kierans and Separatist Rene Levesque teamed up temporarily during a McGill University debate to criticize government handouts to giant corporations in the United States.

Kierans said Canadians will have to choose between full integration with the U.S. economy or the development of a strong manufacturing industry at home. He said there must be an end to "tremendous tax concessions" and grants to resource firms that employ relatively few workers and pay little corporation taxes. He also said that the basic import-export goals of the United States run counter to Canadian interests.

Levesque and Kierans clashed briefly on the question of separatism. Said Kierans: "If we try two nationalisms in this country, we're dead. If we separate, there will be a complete economic and even a political takeover by the United States. But I agree that we haven't got federalism yet in Canada."

When a pretty information officer at Information Canada's headquarters in Ottawa opened a letter from an Ohio schoolgirl the other day, she was at first amused and then, after consideration, mildly upset.

The letter stated simply that each member of the girl's class had been asked to write an essay about one of the states of the Union.

"The one chosen for me was Canada," the girl wrote. "Please send me some information".

Toronto Star's weekend laurel went to McMaster University: for tightening things up at the college cafeteria, and ending a system under which students were getting Cornish hen and sirloin steak for less than $1. "Sounds as if one university, at least, is going to get back to plain living and high thinking".

The government brand of marijuana is three times as strong as the product being sold on the street, assistant deputy minister of health Dr. A.B. Morrison reported proudly Friday.

Joe Greene, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, is making good progress toward recovery in a Japanese hospital following what was ascertained as a mild stroke.

"He has made steady improvement in the last few days," an embassy spokesman said but could not disclose how much longer Greene would remain in the hospital.

The over 1,000 members of the Montreal Policeman's Brotherhood voted Thursday to approve a new wage settlement which will put their salaries on a par with Toronto policemen.

The contract calls for an increase of $805 for first-class constables, retro-active to Jan. 1, which would bring their salaries up to $10,620. Toronto salaries are currently $10,115, and an arbitration board is expected to announce the 1971 contract in Nov. It is expected to bring the two cities' salaries into line

USA Sources close to President Nixon disclosed that the Amchitka nuclear test definitely will go ahead this month, reports the Washington Post. The only apparent change in plans is a delay until the end of the month, probably due to the visit of Soviet Premier Alexi Kosygin to Vancouver, hotbed of Canadian dissent over the blast.

The five megaton weapon is apparently 300 feet down in the 6,200-foot hole where it will be exploded, suspended by a 230-foot derrick. The entire bomb and instrument package weighs somehwere in the order of 120 tons.

Sources gave two reasons why President Nixon did not consider cancelling Cannikin, which is the project's code name. They have to do with the fact tht the warhead for the Spartan ABM has not been tested, and that it must be tested to show the Soviet Union that the U.S. is serious in developing the ABM. The Soviets themselves tested a three megaton warhead for their own ABM last week.

Cannikin is the last scheduled atomic test for Amchitka, but the Pentagon and the AEC insist on the right to return to the island if disarmament talks go badly or if diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union or China should freeze up again.

MADRID - The only two candidates in Spain's general election who showed some opposition to the government were elected to parliament, according to almost complete election returns.

The election was held to fill 104 seats in the 558-seat parliament. The remaining deputies will be picked in the next four weeks either by government appointment or closed elections within trade unions, professional groups and among supporters of Spain's Chief of State General Franco.

PARIS - A wildcat strike of ground personnel at Paris' Orly airfield created chaos for thousands of passengers Friday, and helped to spotlight the mounting tensions on France's labour front.

The unexpected Orly walkout coincided with the second strike of high school teachers in the Paris area in 10 days, a threatened strike by some categories of police employees and a walkout of Paris subway employees set for Tuesday.

LONDON Several London newspapers have suggested that the KGB (secret police) agent who defected to Britain with a long list of Russian spies may have been a Communist plant. Other newspapers say that the Russians are out to discredit the agent and the foreign office's decision to expel several Soviet envoys named in the list.

USA - Richard Nixon could become the greatest U.S. President since World War II, former Canadian diplomat Chester A. Ronning said while addressing the fall convocation at the University of Guelph, where he was granted an honorary doctor of laws degree.

Ronning, best known for his diplomatic work in China, said Nixon could achieve greatness by ending the war in Vietnam and by taking steps to see that the Peoples' Republic of China is given a seat in the United Nations.

ZAMBIA - Zambia's president Juanda has attempted to solve a month-long challenge to his leadership by jailing 90 political opponents.

The challenge resulted from a rupture between Dr. Juanda and Simon Kapwepwe, a former Zambian vice-president who resigned from the government and formed an opposition grouping.

Two physicists take off around the world next week with an atomic clock to test Einstein's Theory of Relativity, which predicts that time varies according to the motion of the clocks measuring it.

If, when they return to the U.S. Naval Observatory in Washington, the clocks are 100 billionths of a second behind the master clock, his theory will have been proven true. If not, Eistein may have been wrong or else the experiment was not good enough to say one way or the other.

Experiments with atomic particles in the laboratory so far have supported the theory, but it was not possible until the utilization of atomic clocks and jet aircraft to test its validity.

If it turns out time does behave as Einstein stated, a round trip in space lasting 32 years at close to the speed of light (186,000 mps) would age the astronauts only four years, eight months, while their friends on Earth would be 32-years older.

China announces "two America" policy

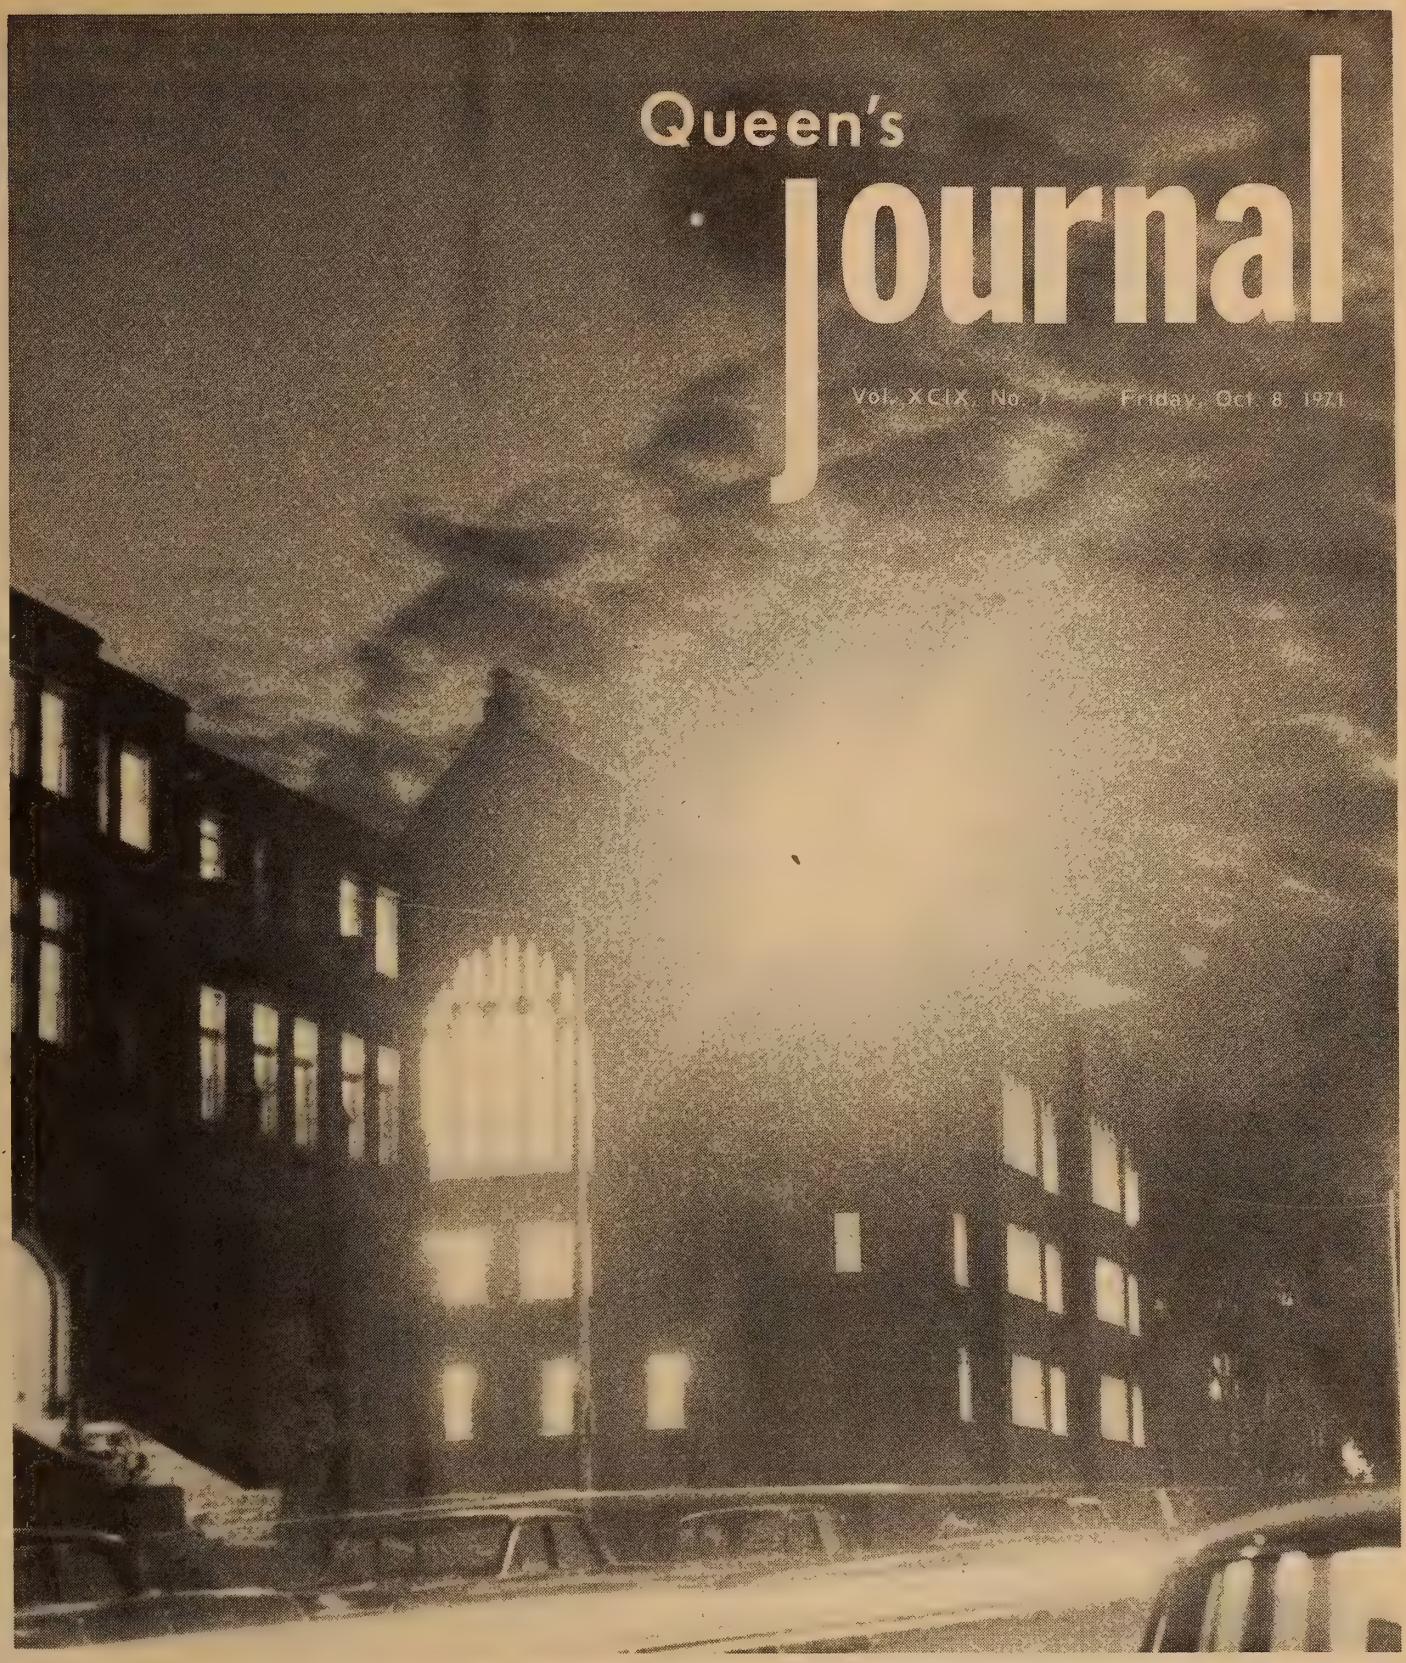
By Douglas Shane

WINDSONG - Official sources here have confirmed the announcement that Mainland China would not join the United Nations this autumn unless a "Two America" policy is adopted by the world body.

China's startling new strategy was made public several days after the Peking arrival of Black Panther Information Minister Huey P. Newton. Following lengthy high-level discussions with the Black politician, Premier Chou En-lai announced the Chinese decision.

In a prepared statement the premier noted that the Washington government does not legitimately represent all the people living within the boundaries of the United States. "Thus, The People's Republic of China demands that the United Nations adopt and enforce a resolution calling for the creation of two separate American nations. Only when this is done will the interests and aspirations of all American people be realized," Chou concluded.

When questioned if Peking's new American policy would preclude the scheduled visit of President Richard Nixon to China next spring, the Premier said, "If Mr. Nixon wants to come, I don't see why someone couldn't be persuaded to meet him briefly at the Hong Kong border. The Chinese people would certainly offer him a memorable visit."
memorable visit."



Asked what might be on the agenda if Nixon does come to Asia, Chou remarked, "He could have many opportunities to collect the precious and semi-precious stones of China. I understand that Mr. Nixon has a rather impressive South American rock collection." The Premier also hinted that a "Two Canada" policy is presently being scrutinized in Peking.

At the United Nations, Secretary-General U Thant said that China had notified him of its new position by private channels; he declined further comment, saying "My heart is now in my village." Sources close to U Thant say that he is giving close attention to an executive position offered him by Coca-Cola of Burma.

In an anonymous telephone conversation from her Washington apartment, a spokeswomen for the Nixon Administration was quoted as saying, "This is just another Red attempt to embarass the United States. Well, we're beyond embarassment. The very notion of two separate American nations is absurd."

AMS considers constable policy

By Jennifer Grass

The student government - the AMS outer council - talked Monday night about the discipline report which the university senate approved last week. Dr. R. L. Watts, dean of arts and science and chairman of the committee which wrote the report, was present to comment on the report and answer questions about it.

The Special Committee on Grievance, Discipline and Related Matters was set up in 1969-70 on the initiative of the AMS, which after beginning a review of its own judicial processes, such as the AMS court, decided it was time widespread attention was given to grievance and discipline procedures across the university.

The senate agreed and set up a special committee which included, besides Watts, five students and five members of faculty. An interim report was presented last January. After that, according to AMS internal affairs commissioner Jim Richardson, the ideas of various interest groups have been compiled into the final code."

At a meeting last Thursday the senate approved most of the committee's 57 recommendations; a few were referred to other bodies for study first. (A summary of the recommendations appears on pages 30 and 31 of Who's Where.)

The purpose of the proposed grievance system is to ensure that if satisfaction is not obtained through an informal settlement, there will be a clear and effective appeal procedure. A "filter tribunal" will decide whether an appeal has enough substance to be considered by a final tribunal - or, in the case of a policy question, will decide what body should handle a particular matter.

Arts and science president Marv Bloos asked Watts why the report opposes university subsidization of AMS constables since they provide a service to the university and to outsiders as well as to students. Watts admitted that the AMS had to bear a financial burden, but said he thought payments by the university would cast doubt on the constables' independence. But, he said, when the constables are agents of the university there should be arrangements to protect them from individual liability.

AMS president Patrick Riley said the primary responsibility of the constables is to keep order at student functions. When both students and non-students are involved, constables' authority is a matter of discretion, he said.

The AMS sends constables to meetings of the university senate, Riley said, because this was one of the terms under which the senate agreed to make its meetings open to students.

Watts told the outer council that most of what the committee has recommended had been accepted by senate. The major exception, he said, was a group of recommendations about policy regarding tenure for academic staff; these have been referred to the senate committee on appointment, promotion, tenure and leave to ensure that the two groups have a consistent policy.

The outer council agreed to establish a committee to coordinate the implementation of the parts of the report which affect the AMS.

Coed res popular

Two-thirds of men and two-fifths of women would be willing to live in a coed residence in their first year at Queen's, according to a poll taken in residence meal lines Tuesday by the coed residence study committee.

Results showed that 47 per cent of freshettes and 30 per cent of upperclass women, or an average of 40 per cent of all women who responded, answered "yes" to the question, "Prior to coming to Queen's in your first year, would you have chosen to live in an integrated residence?"

The figures for men were 62 per cent of freshmen, 71 per cent of upperclass men, 66 per cent average.

About 39 percent of women, but only 24 per cent of men, said their parents would have objected to their living in an integrated residence.

A much higher number of students were willing or eager to live in an integrated residence after first year. "Yes" was given as an answer to 77 per cent by women and 88 per cent by men.

The most popular form of integrated residence differed between the sexes. Just over half the men who answered (51 per cent) said they would prefer an integrated residence to be "sexes room and room about". "Sexes on separate floors" got 29 per cent of the vote and "sexes on opposite sides of hall" 18 per cent.

But 58 per cent of the women answering asked for "sexes on separate floors". "Sexes room and room about" got 22 per cent and "sexes on opposite sides of hall" 20 per cent.

The questionnaire was answered by 672 students at Ban Righ lunch line and 680 at Leonard. (Coed residence committee chairman Doug Romans said the percentages could be slightly in error because of a few male students who ate at Ban Righ and turned in their questionnaires there, and a few women who ate at Leonard that day.)

The respondents were mostly in first year (58 percent of the women, 63 per cent of the men).

A proposal for integrating some of the present central campus residences, based on the preferences revealed in the questionnaire, will be formulated in the next couple of weeks by the study committee, which represents the AMS and the residence student governments.

It will then be presented to the women's Residence Council, the Inter-Residence Council and finally the residence governing boards.

Career interviews announced

Graduating students looking for permanent employment after this year, or students who want summer employment for next year, will find campus recruiters already making visits to Queen's.

Dave Wroe, director of the Office of Career Planning and Placement, advises students that recruiting personnel from major Canadian employers are already appearing on campus.
on campus.

Immediate deadlines for interviews are as follows:

Oct. 8 Bell Canada, applications for permanent employment from all faculties. Oct. 12, Rio Algom, summer employment for engineering students, particularly in geology and metallurgy. Oct., 13, Canadian Kodak, permanent employment for chemical, electrical, and mechanical engineers.

Wroe said the deadlines are for applications for interviews with these companies. Application can be made through the Office of Career Planning and Placement, located at 27 Queen's Crescent, telephone 547-2992.

Most companies, including the three listed above, use a method of "pre-screening". By this method, students wishing employment with a particular company fill out an application form. The employer then decides which students he would like to interview on the basis of the information on the application, and contacts the student by mail. The student then arranges with the Office of Career Planning and Placement the time and place of the interview.

Wroe's office has put a limit of seven on the number of job interviews each student may have. This has been done, Wroe says, to make sure that every interested student will have the chance to get a good job interview. Previously, students were rushed through interviews, and recruiters had hectic days. Students were often "short-shifted" and passed over.

The seven-interview limit helps free the schedule of the employer, as does the pre-screening method, so that the student will get a better interview and the employer will get a better idea of who he is hiring.

Students who wish more than seven interviews may make arrangements through Wroe, or his assistant, John Harvey.

In other employment activities, Wroe points out that the Career Seminars are under way, a new feature under the education and preparation program of the placement office.

On October 6, J. L. Richards, owner of one of the largest consulting engineering firms in Ottawa, will conduct a seminar, "The Consulting Engineer", at 7:00 p.m. in the second floor common room of the Union. On October 13, in the same place at the same time, J. O. LaHaye will talk about "Careers with the Federal Government.".

Surgery professor is provincial candidate

One of the three Kingston candidates in the coming provincial election is an assistant professor of surgery at Queen's.

Dr. John Hazlett, the Liberal candidate, told the Journal he thought his decision to enter politics would have no effect on Queen's as a whole, but might have some effect on the faculty of medicine.

In regard to the university, he did say he would support the introduction of a trimester system, which would reduce the capital cost of the university and make better year-round use of Queen's facilities.

Such extended use is now being studied by a task force of the university senate.

Hazlett has been active in medical politics, as a member of the Kingston Academy of Medicine and former district director of the Ontario Medical Association. He said this involvement had made him conscious of the difficulties involved in government-sponsored health care service.

The government health plan has become too expensive, Hazlett said, because patients are turning to doctors more often and medical service costs are going up everywhere. Reducing expenses might make quality go down too, he said.

But these problems should be solved by doctors, Hazlett said. "Health care has become disassociated with doctors politically."

Hazlett said he has always been oriented towards the Liberal party. Kingston has not returned a Liberal to the Ontario legislature in 65 years, but Hazlett said he senses a feeling of change. "It is the time in the political climate, and in my life, to get elected against fantastic odds."

Learned societies coming

Queen's will be the host in 1973 to the annual meetings of Canada's academic and learned societies, which hold their 40 annual conventions at one university over a four-week period each summer.

This year the conferences were held at Memorial University of Newfoundland in St. John's.

The learned societies conferences will be part of the 300th anniversary celebrations of the city of Kingston, which was founded in 1673 by the Comte de Frontenac.

Committee members are wanted

The university senate has asked for nominations to several of its committees. All faculty members and students are eligible to make suggestions for committee members; these suggestions will then be considered by the senate's nominating committee.

Names suggested need not be those of people who are already on the senate, the announcement said, but should be of people who have worked, or are working, or have a special interest in particular problems relating to the responsibilities of the committee concerned.

The following vacancies exist:

Nominating committee, one student.

Campus planning committee, one student.

Library committee, two students.

Scholarships and student aid committee, one student.

Student affairs committee, two students.

Editorial committee of McGill-Queen's University Press, one member of faculty.

Advisory counsil on statistics, two students.

Only members of senate are eligible for the position on the nominating committee. All the vacancies are for one-year terms beginning at once, except those for the statistics council which are for two-year terms.

Nominations should be sent to the secretary of the senate 163 University Avenue. The sponsor should obtain the consent of the nominee.

Senators to be chosen

Elections for student senators from arts and science and from graduate studies will be held next Wednesday.

Two candidates are seeking the one-year term representing graduate studies. They are Ian F. Boag, of chemical engineering, and Mike Williams of geography.

There are three candidates for the arts and science position, which is a vacancy left when former Senator Peter Adams resigned and transferred from Queen's to the University of Windsor. They are Phil Brown, Rob MacKnight and Stew Searle.

Pictures and platforms of the candidates will appear in the Journal on Tuesday.

QUIG/LAW puts computers to work in law school

By Robin Nunn

Does Perry Mason use a CRT?

Probably not. But he might if he had studied law at Queen's.

Researchers in the faculty of law are using them in the Queen's University Institute for Computing and Law -- QUIC-LAW for short. The institute is conducting research in the field of information retrieval, with the aim of setting up a Canadian legal information system.

Storing information - and finding it again when it is wanted - is becoming increasingly complex as man buries himself in more and more information. It is difficult for a researcher in any field to keep aware of new papers, journals and books being published daily around the world. And so computer analysts are trying to use their machines to simplify and speed the sorting of information.

A lawyer must research every case carefully, struggling through a mass of documents, statutues, regulations, and precedents from local, provincial and worldwide sources, in order to find the comparatively small amount of information which is relevant to him.

Since 1961 Queen's has been involved in a "treaty project" aimed at collecting the text of all British Commonwealth treaties. Since 1967 computers have been used for text-editing in this project. Then, in 1968, Queen's began a joint study of a programme to put all rulings of the Supreme Court of Canada on computer memory.

Recently the project has expanded to include 25,000 abstracts of scientific works on pollution, the Revised Statutes of Canada (1970), and the Supreme Court rulings from 1923 to 1970.

The mechanics of the project are very simple. When a lawyer - or student or anyone else - wants to use the system, he goes to a remote terminal, which is basically a typewriter connected by a telephone line to the central computer. For QUIC-LAW this computer is in Ottawa; it has remote terminals in law schools from Ottawa to Vancouver.

The user simply types in words about a subject which interests him, and waits for the computer to answer.

For example, someone who wanted information about drug laws, he could simply type the names of several drugs and the computer would present a list of all articles on file which mention one or more of these drugs. The information could be typed, printed, or displayed on a television tube (technically known as a CRT, for cathode ray tube). No knowledge other than a command of English is needed to operate the system. And even that is not strictly true; QUIC-LAW also understands, and can answer in, French.

The study of law is particularly well suited to computer applications. In fact, one major problem with information storage and retrieval is that of legal rights to data and programmes. Copyright laws and contracts will have to be rewritten by lawyers to apply to computer use. And legal material is easier to define and study than more abstract or diverse writings. In addition, almost a fifth of Canadian legal documents are written in French, giving QUIC-LAW an opportunity to attack the particularly Canadian problem of bilingualism.

The cost of QUIC-LAW has been supported by the Canada Council, the federal department of justice, IBM Canada Ltd., and Queen's. But QUIC-LAW does save both money and time compared to present information retrieval methods. For example the justice department spent $39,000 on book purchase in 1968-69 - not including costs of staff, space, or overhead. A computer system could substantially reduce this cost, as well as making the information available to everyone who needs it, not just those who can afford the time to search in large, expensive libraries.

In the indefinite future, there are no limits to what might be done with the system. Some day in a computerized library, a student might be able to sit at a computer display unit, type in the key words, and sit back. "Tell me everything you know about the impact of computerized information on libraries . . . " and the information could pour out.

(So some day even Perry Mason may clue in).

Education students choose leaders

Ten of the twelve positions in the student government of the faculty of education have been filled by acclamation. Voting for the other two positions was to be held last night, but results were not available at press time.

Acclaimed president of the Education Students Society was Brian DuPlante, a Queen's graduate in political science and sociology, former departmental student council member and unsuccessful candidate for AMS vice-president in 1968.

External vice-president, and representative to the Alma Mater Society outer council, will be Anne Merrick, Queen's graduate in geography and history, former DSC executive member, and active member of the Queen's Entertainment Agency, of which her husband Dave is director.

There were two candidates for internal vice-president: Geoff McCleary, graduate of Trent University, and Robin Lerpiniere of Trent and Queen's.

The other contested position is senator of Queen's. the two candidates were Robert Warner, Queen's phys ed graduate and member of the planning committee for the new university centre, and Ed Devai, geography graduate of the University of Alberta, where he was chairman of the political science club.

Acclaimed secretary was Barbara Drew, former student president of Catherine Parr Traill College at Trent University. Treasurer is Joan Kirkpatrick, music graduate and former music student president of McGill University.

AMS representatives, besides Mrs. Merrick, will be Andy Rathwell, graduate of Carleton University, and Alan Olson from the University of Alberta.

Representatives to the education faculty board will be Pietro Sostegno, from Germany; Rosemary Hoey from Carleton University, Randy Hibbert from Waterloo Lutheran University; and David Stephenson, Queen's psychology graduate and psychology representative to the arts and science faculty board two years ago.

Why is it more women in the world choose Tampax tampons over all other brands of internal sanitary protection combined? First of all, Tampax tampons were developed by a doctor. So naturally you can trust them.

Worn internally, there's nothing to give away your secret. No pins, pads or belts. No odor or chafing. No discomfort.

Tampax tampons are so easy to use, right from the start. Each tampon comes in a hygienic container-applicator. This helps to place it in the proper, comfortable position.

Only Tampax tampons have a moisture-resistant withdrawal cord that is safety-stitched so it won't pull off.

Only Tampax tampons come in 3 absorbency-sizes: Regular, Super and Junior. Is it any wonder women in 118 countries choose Tampax tampons?

Pollution Probe looks at oil, water, garbage

By Dave Vickers

"You poisoned my sweet water,
You cut down my green trees,
The food you fed my children
Was the cause of their disease.
My world is slowly falling down
And the air is not good to breathe.
And those of us who care enough
Will have to do something."

- Jessie Oris Farrow

This summer the Queen's branch of Pollution Probe worked on four projects in and around the Kingston area: oil spillage, water cleanup, education, and recycling. Seven students were involved. Industrial backing provided the money for five of them; two received Opportunities for Youth grants from the federal government.

The Opportunities for Youth grants were used for a study of oil spillage in the great lakes. The report is not yet complete, but a number or recommendations have been made to the government.

For example, serious pollution results when a freighter dumps ballast in the great lakes. Simply, this means that a ship fills its hull with water and then dumps oily sewage into the lake. This procedure is economical for shippers, but in areas where it is common, such as Lake Ontario near Kingston, the water becomes seriously dirty.

Sewage from waterfront cottages and from cities shares in the blame.

The proposal made by Pollution Probe was that deballasting docks be installed throughout the inland waterway, where freighters could dump their loads of water without affecting the rest of the water system.

The second Probe project, the water cleanup, was run by three students who, at citizens' requests, removed weeds and garbage from the public beaches around Kingston. Bell Island, with which engineering freshmen are familiar, is a garbage-made peninsula (hardly an island); the city of Kingston has used garbage as landfill in the area. Elliot Avenue, next to Bell Island, reeks with the smell of the dump.

Probe said the city government was not very cooperative with the Probe cleanup. At a similar dump on Wolfe Island, the same work was done, again without government cooperation, Probe said; a dumptruck was promised which never arrived. Local citizens stood around staring and seemed more amused than concerned.

A 23-page handout including "Suggestions for Ecological Living" was developed from the summer project and is available at the Pollution Probe office in the Union.

Another student worked on the educational aspects of the environment. This involved writing to high school teachers and distributing "environmental process grab-bags". The purpose of the programme was to involve teachers in environmental and ecological studies which could be introduced into biology and geography classes. A booth was set up in Kingston where students talked with people, supplied information sheets, and sold books and posters. Speeches were delivered at camps throughout Ontario, to get youngsters involved and aware of ecology.

The recycling project began in June with a two-week paper collection throughout Kingston. Thirty-one tons of paper were gathered and sold for recycling.

In mid-summer, about sixteen students with Opportunities for Youth grants worked on the Clark-Brown proposals on the recycling of waste. A cross-sectional sample of garbage from Kingston households was made; students collected the garbage every week and separated it by wet or dry, by organic or inorganic, and by weight. The result was an analysis of the nature and quality of Kingston garbage. Highway litter was also collected and analyzed. And a study was made of food additives and preservatives and a Shoppers Guide was prepared.

This year Pollution Probe will be involved in a provincial recycling project, and is currently questioning cnadidates in the provincial election about their views on pollution control.

The recycling project is a caravan which will travel through Ontario collecting a ton of garbage from each of several cities. Finally the caravan will stop at Ottawa and visit the parliament buildings to stress their belief that the federal government wastes too much paper.

Pollution Probe has other suggestions for the federal government as well, including the reduction of freight tariffs on recycled materials; regulations on the minimum amount of recycled materials which must be used in production of such things as newsprint; and grants for research into ecology and the environment.

Within the next few weeks Probe will hold a joint meeting with the Kingston branches of Survival and Zero Population Growth to plan possible joint action. Pollution Probe welcomes interested people and new members; their office is in the basement of the Union and is open from 11:30 to 5:30 every day.

Water symposium

Canada's water supply will be the topic of a one-day symposium to be held at Queen's Wednesday.

The main speaker will be David Anderson, member of parliament and chairman of the special committee on environmental pollution. He will give an address at 8 p.m. in Grant Hall.

The address is to be followed by a panel discussion.

Another group of speakers will discuss water resources in an afternoon session. They include Dr. J. P. Bruce, director of the Canada Centre for Inland Waters; I. W. McCaig, vice-president of H. G. Acres, Ltd,; and Dr. B. Michel, professor of civil engineering at Laval University.

The symposium is jointly sponsored by the Engineering Society and the W. W. King Lecture Series Committee.

1001 things to do with garbage

. By David Parsons

In one year Canadians produce enough waste to make a four-lane highway three feet thick from Toronto to Vancouver.

Statistics like this have convinced Queen's professors Dr. Reg Clark (chemical engineering) and Dr. Jim Brown (mining engineering) that the era of waste must end soon. Their joint project, Kingston's new garbage recycling system, just might be the answer.

The $1.4 million project was approved last week by the Kingston city council and could be in operation by the end of 1972.

Clark and Brown said their project was submitted to city council in February under the sponsorhsip of the Glass Container Council of Canada. Since then, municipalities besides Kingston have shown interest in the system.

It will be the first of its kind in Canada, since it is more than simply a new and different garbage collection scheme. The system involves the sterilization and reselling of the treated waste.

The process will emphasize human employment, rather than complete automation.

In the Clark-Brown system, waste is delivered to the conversion plant and dumped onto conveyor belts. Resaleable material, such as scrap wood, is removed first. The garbage then goes through various stages where glass amd metal are separated for resale in various forms.

The remaining waste goes into a grinder where it mixes with wet sewage. The product is sterilized by "composting" or decaying, and emerges as a clean, peat-moss-like material with dozens of potential uses.

The product could be used as clean fill, or piled up and landscaped into hills. It also makes an excellent soil conditioner; there are places in the Kingston area where 200 tons per acre could be applied, Clark stated.

Profits from the sale of this material and of the reclaimed glass, metal and wood could turn the plant into a self-supporting operation. Many industries have expressed interest in using recycled materials; a major example is manufacturers of glass bottles, which make up a large part of litter and trash.

The Kingston disposal centre will be a focus for research into this very new field. Clark stressed that the project will need the combined efforts of economists, scientists and businessmen to derive full benefit.

Canada has neglected pollution and garbage disposal so much that there are no accurate statistics on waste production. Clark and Brown pointed out that this means the Kingston plant will be dealing with unknowns; but they are optimistic about the possibilities for research and cooperation.

"I see it as a very happy sign that the various governments and groups are responding jointly," Clark said. This is essential, he added, if the system is to expand into wider regional operations.

When the Clark-Brown system goes into effect, garbage can return to society for a second useful life.

But every system has its drawbacks. In a similar pilot plant in Houston, Texas, an employee had to be fired after repeated warnings - he had been eating pieces of garbage as they came past his station.

Follow Gaels to York

The Golden Gaels are among the thousands of Queen's students who will be in greater Toronto during the Thanksgiving weekend; they play the York University Yeomen at 2 p.m. Saturday. Since this is the first game Queen's has ever played at York, and the first Toronto weekend for many Queen'smen, the Journal will follow its well-established policy of explaining how to find the field.

This isn't easy because York plays its home games on its own campus and doesn't have a stadium or even stands. However, there is a bank about 50 feet back from the field where most students sit with bottles and picnic lunches to watch the game.

Hitchhikers need only get a ride to the Keele Street exit of highway 401 and take the bus north on Keele to the campus (it's much too far to walk). The Keele exit is one of the rare ones with a simple exit ramp.

Starting from elsewhere in Toronto, take the subway to Eglinton station, a bus west to Keele Street, and the Keele bus north to the campus. Or, faster, take the subway to Dundas West station (not Keele station!) and from there take the bus north to the campus. Oddly enough, the Keele bus starts from the Dundas West subway stop.

The bus goes right into the campus. Get off at the first stop and head left. Believe it or not, that is the field.

Since York is not really a major away weekend, Queen's cannot expect to get away with a pep rally in Yorkville, which would require a rather large number of students. But it could be enjoyable to gather at City Hall Square at midnight tonight -- or a Saturday night celebration at the Speak Easy could provide a temporary disturbance. It might even replace the famous evenings at Your Father's Moustache in Montreal.

Candles to burn Oct. 18

The Women's Residence Council has announced that the 1971 candle-lighting ceremony will be held October 18 in Grant Hall at 8:00 p.m.

The traditional ceremony symbolized the introduction of new women students to learning and the university. It was started by the old Levana Society and continued by the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society. Responsibility for Candle-lighting was taken over by the WRC last spring.

Freshettes outside residence as well as those living in the residences are invited to take part in the ceremony, according to committee chairman Pat Culm. Freshettes should assembly at 7:45 that evening in Kingston Hall.

There will be refreshments afterwards at Ban Righ.

Does the prison system work

The following article examines Canadian penitentiaries and attempts to show why they have failed. Next week the author will discuss the alternatives to confinement and if penitentiaries are really needed today. The article was written by Ken Johnston and originally appeared in the Montreal Star.

Today as people increasingly question the whole validity and effectiveness of locking other people up in cages behind stone walls as a means of "curing" them of crime and deterring other potential offenders, it seems ironic that little more than a century ago the penitentiary was hailed as the modern solution to crime.

Certainly, compared to other methods of treatment, it had its advantages. A major and final solution was hanging. British law, which offered the precedent for Canadian law, listed more than 100 offences for which the penalty was hanging. The stocks in Upper Canada and the pillory in Lower Canada were other popular punishments which offered the additional advantage to the public of providing unresisting targets for over-ripe fruit, vegetables, and eggs, not to mention jeers and epithets. They were usually located in the public market place, where the ammunition was handy. Branding, too, was popular punishment.

So, when Kingston Penitentiary opened for business in June, 1835, the event was hailed as a major step forward in penolgy. It is easy to understand that prisonment in a cell where a man could do penance for his crimes (hence the word, penitentiary) seemed to reformers a far more humane method of punishment than the alternatives then in vogue. Custody became the chief method of dealing with crime.

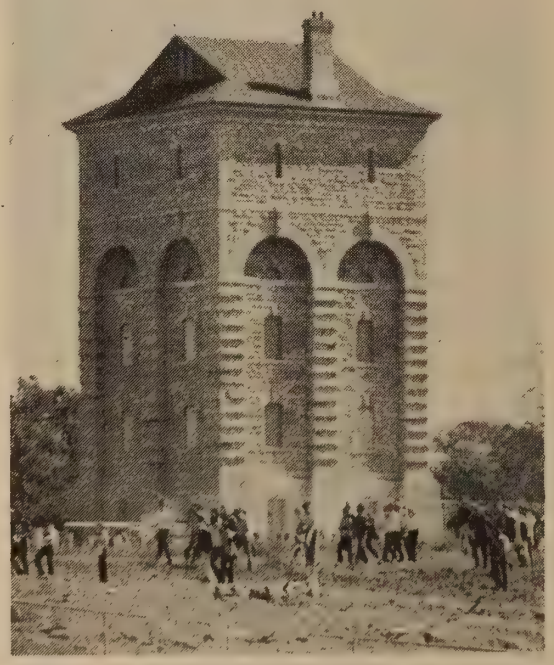
The pattern of construction faithfully followed in almost all penitentiaries until modern times consisted of a central dome, which formed a hub and control point for guards, with the cell-blocks radiating out from the dome like the spokes of a wheel. Four tiers of cells made up the cell-block, with 32 cells in each tier, the tiers linked by steel stairways and catwalks over which many a convict was pitched to his death or serious injury on the cement below in those sudden outbreaks of unexpected violence that mark the relationships of desperate men penned together for days and months unending.

Each cell had its iron cot and its sanitary basket to be emptied each morning at the first roll call. This was about seven feet in depth, with little more than a foot to spare between the cot and the opposite wall, and the only light derived from the heavily barred windows opening onto the corrider beyond the equally heavily barred door that locked the inmate in from the time he returned from his stone pile at night until the morning bell aroused him to another dreary day.

In essence, this was the penitentiary that we boasted for more than 100 years. The last "bucket cell" vanished from St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary only after the 1962 riot there.

The regime was equally oppressive. The inmates lived by bells: it awakened them in the morning, called them forth to breakfast, which at first they ate in common mess halls but later took back to their cells, then the bell called them to hard work, back to their cells for lunch, back to work after lunch, and back to the cells and evening meal after work. Inmates still live by the bell in Canadian penitentiaries.

Meanwhile, our Canadian law, which enjoys the dubious distinction of being considered one of the most oppressively administered in the western world, continued to send more and more people to prison for longer and longer terms. Long after both Britain and the United States had turned to probation and parole as more hopeful and promising alternatives to lengthy prison sentences, our judges clung to the Canadian precedent, and our penitentiaries were jammed to overflowing with long term offenders who could only realistically regard their sentences as post-graduate courses in crime.



From time to time over the years, sharp and penetrating criticisms have been leveled against the penitentiary system and numerous suggestions have been made for its improvement. Little was ever done to change anything. This was partly due to the inevitable inertia of bureauocracy, but mainly it was due to the massive indifference of the Canadian public which seemed to share the opinion that people who ended up in jail got what they deserved.

Today the Canadian penitentiary service is deep in the process of change. A whole new concept in the treatment of offenders is being implemented. But change does not come easily in government institutions, and the bad legacy of the past does not vanish overnight.

No established authority in penology could be found to defend the concept of crime and punishment as it was practiced in Canadian penitentiaries just a few decades ago. We no longer put men in prison simply to protect society from them or to punish them, though both factors are still important considerations in our judicial system.

Today, prison programs are intended to help a man find his way back into society or a functioning basis, train him in a trade, educate him to acceptable standards, give him the medical or psychiatric care he may need, and then establish links with the community which may aid his rehabilitation.

But, here, as in other countries, modern penology encounters its first roadblock in the very people who are charged with the responsibility of carrying out the programs which have been designed to give expression to the new philosophy.

Our penitentiary system inherited a bad tradition in the recruitment of staff, going back to the first warden of Kingston Penitentiary. Brutal, sadistic and incompetent people were hired as guards and keepers at the time; and political patronage was part of the process. Up until the last two decades there was no formal training for the job and the staff was usually recruited in the area and learned the routine on the job, frequently through the advice and assistance of inmates, who expected favors in return.

Schooling was no requirement until comparatively modern times and even then, grade eight was usually sufficient. Many guards were ex-army people, who knew how to handle a rifle, an important consideration in a regime where custody and security was the main objective, and the silence rule a rigidly enforced law which turned each penitentiary into a walled enclosure containing a population rigidly divided into two camps: the unarmed watched and the armed watchers, mutually hostile and mutually fearful.

Today new people entering the penitentiary service get a firm grounding in the principles that motivate the service and the basic characteristics and impulses that motivate inmates who will be in their charge. They also get training in physical fitness and the use of weapons. The program is realistic. They are introduced gradually and carefully to the routine of their jobs.

However, there is one serious weakness in the system and the remedy seems to lie in time rather than in staff colleges. The Ouimet report (the 1969 Report of the Canadian Committee on Corrections), dealing with correctional service personal states:

"Training of staff should start at senior levels of staff, not at the lower levels of staff. Unless the senior staff are devoted to a program of corrections, that program of corrections, that program and the training of staff to carry it out will have little success."

The brutal fact of life in the penitentiary service is that many of the people that started their careers as guards in the repressive old days of close confinement and strict silence, are in senior positions today, and they do not look on the new wave of reform and rehabilitation with the kindly eyes.

Meanwhile, the pressure of the demands of progressive new policy imposed by the penitentiary leadership in the solicitor general's department in Ottawa is constantly being reinforced both by knowledgeable new recruits being brought into the service by new staff colleges, and by increased contact with outside agencies in the community who are accepting greater responsibility in the rehabilitation process. The senior official toughing it out for his pension along the lod lines is not having an easy time of it.

It is generally recognized that the most formidable obstacle to an effective correction program is the inmate subculture. The Ouimet Report sums it up:

"One of the serious anomalities in the use of tradition prisons to re-educate people to live in the normal community arises from the development and nature of the prison inmate subculture. This grouping of inmates around their own system of loyalties and values places them in direct conflict with the loyalties and values of the outside community. As a result, instead of reformed citizens, society has been receiving from its prisons the human product of a form of anti-social organization which supports criminal behavior".

The inmate subculture centres around the special needs of prisoners, the first of which is reassurance. When a man is sentenced he knows in his heart that he was a failure in society. The proof is that society puts him behind bars. He is a failure.

When he arrives in prison he learns soon there is an other society waiting to welcome him, to reassure him in the lights of his society he is not a failure. In fact, his sentence is his admission fee to this new society, made up of people like himself who either could not or would not live by the norms of the outside world. Its existence comforts and reassures him and helps him get over the first trauma of imprisonment.

He is no longer an isolated misfit in society but has become part of his own society, the prison subculture, which in turn supports his resistance to the demands of conventional society. The subculture is rigidly structured, and like outside society, has its own set of values to which the newcomer is expected to conform. And he will be judged on his criminal record too.

One group which is rigidly rejected and which usually has to be carefully segregated are child molesters and the suspected stool pigeons. To this group can be added the occasional cop gone wrong. His life expectancey in the general would be, and has been, very short.

The subculture organizes the inmate world:.

It arranges for the smuggling in of contraband, and the smuggling out of messages. With an unerring sense it and sport those staff members susceptible to bribes. It controls the remarkable prison telegraph which frequently finds the inmate population more aware of forthcoming changes in staff than the staff members themselves.

It doles out inmate justice with a firm hand. If an inmate falls down a flight of stairs or bruises his face in the shower, or receives a knife in his back, nobody has seen a thing. Nobody dares "split" for fear of the same fate.

And, of course, it organizes the prison sex life, deciding who will sleep with whom and settling lover rivalries. The hierarchy likes to run a tight ship.

New institutions like Warkworth in Ontario have programs designed to setup inmate organizations which curbed the strength of the subculture. The programs are based on the living areas of small groups of inmates, and the restricted atmosphere of the typical prison is avoided by the use of names intead of numbers and an informal relationship between inmate and correctional officer.

Another method of turning prison community pressures to positive use is staff--inmate program planning. It involves the inmate directly in decisions on programs he will take part in.

Other means of undermining or nullifying the effect of the subculture lie in the maintenance of family and community ties, community involvement in prison activities -- a growing factor -- and minimizing custodial features.

The Ouimet Committee observes:

"The dangers of the inmate subculture constitute the strongest argument against large prisons, since there the inmate society becomes so massive and powerful it is almost impossible to reach individual inmates. It is the view of the committee that emphasis should be placed on small and well staffed institutions where this problem can be effectively handled."

Pollution Heather Bedard

Pollution, Pollution Every Where.
But No One Really Seems to Care.
They Walk Around In Distress
And Look At This Awful Mess.
Dirt Is Filling Up OUR Air
But Still People Do NOT Care.
Why It's Like This I Don't Know
But It's Piling Up Like Snow.
When You Try To Find Your Dog
All You See Is lots of Smog.
Garbage Dumps And Cars Exhaust.
Take A Heavy Toll On Our Health Cost
The Water, The Air, Where Ever You go.
You Have To look Through the Smog
To See Your Big Toe.
Garbage Is Dumped into Our lakes
Stop Pollution for our sakes

The poem "Pollution" was written by Heather Bedard, a thirteen year old, public school student from Kingston.

El Greco's "Saint Francis and Brother Leo Meditating on Death", ca 1605, from the National Gallery of Canada, will be on view in the Art Centre together with paintings from our own collection, that were donated by Dr. Alfred Bader. El Greco, the Greek from Toledo (Spain), 1541-1641, became famous as a painter of St. Francis of Assisi (1182-1266). St. Francis is presented with the Stigmata, symbolizing a new Christ in humility, piety and in service to the poor. The Saint is totally absorbed in prayer, and contemplation of death is symbolized by the skull, which is the focal point of the painting. From October 23 to November 9.

WHY VOTE?

WHY LIBERAL?

Report No. 1

In August the Liberal Party published a creditable alternative called "Blueprint for Government". It has no giveaway gimmicks — just a sound "grass roots" platform. Take these two excerpts as examples:

ENVIRONMENT

We have the technology, the financial resources and the public mandate to create a clean environment. Not more subcommittees or PR campaigns, but more rigid enforcement of existing legislation and new laws permitting "class actions" against polluters.

EDUCATION

The government's costliest concern at $1.55 billion it is ten times 1961. It is administratively topheavy and not people-orientated. A trimester system would divert money away from bricks and mortar and towards people, both students and faculty. Education is to receive top cabinet attention not only for economies of operation but with emphasis on halting the casual Americanization of our education system.

For change you can trust - vote

Women's track and field

The women's track and field team competed at the Waterloo Invitational meet as their initial competition of the year.

Although hampered by small numbers, the Queen's girls did extremely well, placing fourth in the standings.

Top individual performers were:
Marion Spence, third, 100 metre hurdles;
Marion Spence, fourth, 100 metre dash;
Aileen Kirby, fourth, 200 metre dash;
Barb Thompson, fourth heat, 100 m. dash;
Sue Foster, sixth; 400 metre dash;
Relay team, fourth, 4x100 m. delay;

The next women's meet will be the WITCA championship in Ottawa on October 23.

For the first time ever, Queen's women will be competing in an indoor schedule of meets. During the indoor season, the men's and women's team will combine to travel and compete as one team.

Anyone interested in competing in either indoor or outdoor track and field may contact coach Brenda Mackie at the Physical Education Centre, or come to the practise at the West Campus track, 4:30-6:30 every day.

Rugger takes two

Queen's Rugger Gaels invaded Montreal Oct. 2 and 3 for a pair of exhibition games against long-time rival McGill and the highly-rated Town of Mount Royal XV, and came away with the laurels of victory.

The Saturday contest, against the Redmen, called forth memories of past league battles, with the Queen's XV showing a fine blend of experience and spirit. The McGill side was considerably smaller than the Gaels, but boasted strong desire and good speed. In fact, they took an early lead, 5-0, on a converted try before Queen's had a chance to sort themselves out. Sobered by this defensive lapse, Queen's players settled down to steady rugby, pulling ahead on the hard running of Tony Williams, who scored two tries, and the crisp defensive play of Bill Steele. The final score was 11-5; McGill threatened briefly in the late minutes, but the issue never really seemed in serious doubt.

The second match, between Queen's and the T.M.R. First team, was quite a different matter from the start. T.M.R., undefeated through a fifteen-game league schedule, was rated by many as the best team in Quebec.

The game was a thriller from the opening whistle. Queen's took an early lead on a penalty kick by Easteal, but TMR started pressing and led 8-3 at the half. TMR, older and lighter, tried to slow the game down in the second half, but Gavin's well-conditioned charges kept on the pressure. With minutes left, Jim Henderson scored a try. Easteal converted, and the game was tied. An error on the part of TMR gave Easteal a penalty kick with seconds to go. No mistake was made, and the Gaels won 11-8.

Sawed-off hockey sticks

The W.I.C. will soon be introducing ringette. It's a new sport which is a lot of fun! A clinic to teach the game will be held on Oct. 20.

Ringette is played on ice, so skates are needed. It's more fun than ice hockey and being a non-contact sport, it's not as rough.

Sawed-off hockey sticks and a ring are used to play the game. These are supplied, so all you need to bring are your skates.

Since Queen's is the first university to try this sport intramurally, the W.I.C. would like to see it a big success. Why not pick up your skates while you are at home for Thanksgiving this weekend?

Gael's Soccer

Like the mighty waves of the Pacific, Queen's attacks rolled in against Carleton last weekend, one on top of the other, threatening to do something to the Carleton shore that never had been done before. Carleton just sat there, and, through no fault of their own, won the game (1-0). Ottawa will not find Queen's so much at sea this weekend. The frustrating experience at Carleton, and a week's solid training, have put new life and more understanding into dormant combinations.

It was the well-meaning insistence on persevering with an unripe teamwork, made more difficult by a cramping, narrow field, that cost the Gaels their opener. Probably, some hick methods, like sending Gord. Taylor off after a long pass, would have been quite sufficient to split the Carleton defence. (With Taylor's speed, incidently, that can be an amazingly effective play.) By Saturday, however, Johnny Walker and his men will have crystallized a combination which will not only have the confidence to pause, look, and vary its attack, but to throw in some pastoral variations as well, just for luck. For luck is a lady that must be courted, and daringly. Queen's sorely missed her last week.

Queen's has the players for exciting football, and we should see it this Saturday at 2 p.m. on the West Campus, non-stop for two forty-five minute periods from the most Gaelic of the Gael teams (just listen to their accents).

The Gaels trounced Ottawa last year, and they should beat them again, before going off to Peterborough on Wednesday to complete the first round of their competition against Trent.

Football, Fans, and Things

By Dave Cameron

As the regular season of the OUAA gradually plays itself out, it's worth taking a minute to reflect on some of the rookies who have contributed to the Gaels' success so far. Our mid-season Rookie-of-the-Year award goes to fullback Dave Hadden, who has added extra punch to the Gaels' offence with his special brand of hardnosed running. Honourable mentions go to John Booth, another running back who has shown well so far, and to defensive back Brian Casey who is doing an admirable job trying to play to the standards of the number he inherited (25)...We didn't have the space in the report of the Waterloo game to mention this, so we give a Posthumous Award of Excellence to the spectators of Section EE of the East Stands and their cheerleader. Never thought I'd see an air horn used as a baton. That same section stood out last week as well. I wonder if they go to the same warm-up party...Let's hope someone does something with the P.A. system at the stadium for homecoming. Like fix it, for example...Congratulations to the Laurentian Voyageurs for defeating York on Saturday. They should realize, however, that in defeating them, they have destroyed a legend of this year, and even worse, have rendered obsolete the favourite subject of article fillers for the Journal sports staff. For shame, for shame...

Turning for a moment to professional football, one of the success stories of the CFL is the coming to prominence of Don Jonas, quarterback of the Winnipeg Blue Bombers. He leads the Western Conference in points scored (100) and in passing (207 compls. of 398 attempts for 3,437 yds). Perhaps those high exalted members of the Don Jonas Fan Club should revise the original aims of the club...Speaking of Winnipeg, after the Western Bowl last year, a few people said that Bob Kraemer, who more-or-less single-handedly robbed Queen's of a College Bown berth, was too small to make the CFL. Well, he may have been too small for QB, but he managed to sneak in as flanker. He is only the 5th leading pass receiver in the Western Conference at this time. Pretty good for an undersized quarterback...

Saturday marks the beginning (finally) of the World Series. It would be that an infrequent phenomenon of sports playoffs will happen. The two best teams in baseball could get to the Series. At the time this article was written, Baltimore was in, and Pittsburgh was almost in. It would be interesting to see a series between these teams. Almost as interesting as next year when the Montreal Expos and the Cleveland Indians meet in the Series, or when the University of Saskatchewan Huskies meet the Laurentian, (whoops, can't mention them now) the York Yeomen in the College Bowl. Would you believe the Toilet Bowl?

Advance to Championships

Queen's sailors placed third (out of nine teams) in the district elimination meet, held at Oakville Oct. 2 and 3. This qualifies them to advance to the Canadian Championships this weekend at R.M.C.U. of T Trent, and York will round out the O.U.A.A. representation in the C.I.A.U. meet.

One to nothing....Yeechh

Thinclads Second Twice: Hosegood, Lingwood Star

Both the Track and Cross-country teams produced strong second-place showings in weekend competition. The track men, competing in the annual Waterloo Invitational meet, finished behind the host club. Veteran weight man Bob Lingwood placed first in the shotput, and the 4x100 meter relay teams finished 1,3 to lead Queen's. Soph Hugh Fraser took second in the 100 meter event, despite a leg injury; he looks like the best sprinter Queen's has seen since Bill Fritz left in 1936. Dave Jarvis and Bob Milne picked up seconds in the 110mm hurdles and 1500 m run respectively.

Meanwhile, Bill Hosegood was leading the Cross-country contingent to second behind the strong Toronto Olympic Club. Hosegood finished 8th, just two minutes off the winning 39:22 of T.O.C.'s John Mowat. Kip Sumner placed 10th, Reed Shaddock 15th, and the rest followed.

The trackmen will compete in Western on the 15th, in a tune-up for the OUAA meet on Oct. 23, while the long-distance squad moves to the All-Ontario Competition this weekend. Look for good things to come.

Bill Davis: over-confident on his one-man platform

It appears that, after 28 years in power in Ontario, the Progressive Conservative Party has disappeared. Oh, there is still a three party election race going on in this province, but competing against the Liberals and the NDP we have, not the Conservatives, but Bill Davis.

Printed material and television ads abound with descriptions of this one-man political movement, Bill Davis, but seldom if ever do they mention that he belongs to a party or which one it is. The information(?) pamphlet distributed by the Campus Conservatives at Monday's Clubs Night, for instance, presents glowing descriptions and picture of Bill Davis and family, but only at the bottom of the last page do we get any hint about who he is representing. In small letters are the words, "Published by the Ontario Progressive Conservative Association," which isn't even a party.

The advertising is equally void of reference to the election.

And why should the Conservatives mention themslves or the election? The party and its leader both seem to be completely confident that they will continue to be the power in this province. Why should they talk about the Conservatives as a party in Ontario when they are really the government? Why should they talk about elections when they are certain that the election will result in no major changes for the party? The only function the Conservatives seem to feel they must fulfill for this election is to introduce the new premier, Davis, to the public.

Of course, appearing to be over-confident in an election campaign is always dangerous, so it is surprising that Davis would ever have made his confidence as apparent as when he asked Prime Minister Trudeau to move up the date of the federal-provincial conference on the economy, presently scheduled for December, to October 28, only a week after the election. It is unlikely that the Liberals or the NDP could take over the government, if they won the election, and prepare for the conference as well, in that short time, but the Conservatives could probably do it easily, since it would involve so few changes for them. It is thus apparent that Davis assumes he will win the election.

Confidence during an election campaign is, of course, necessary for any party to keep going but the smug assumption that victory is certain is another matter. That type of over-confidence can turn off a lot of would-be supporters and has often resulted in surprising electoral upsets. Perhaps this will happen in Ontario as the Davis Conservatives go the way of the Thatcher Liberals in Saskatchewan, the Manning Social Credit Party in Alberta, or the Smith Conservatives in Nova Scotia. One can always hope, and in this case, vote, that it will happen.

PRISON

Dear Editors:

While I found the interview with the two convicts in last week's Journal interesting, informative and of considerable social value, to use the stock phrases, I found one aspect of its presentation both disturbing and irresponsible.

Granted the the majority of Queen's students are sufficiently mature to realize that the social background of these two men is little criterion for judging their impressions of the system in which they have been caught up, the Journal has for some time enjoyed a circulation extending slightly beyond the student environment at which its articles are to a large extent aimed.

It is these 'other people' who perhaps are in a more immediate position to exert influence that would aid reform of our inadequate prison system, yet it is these very people who would be alienated by an interview that indicated that their efforts would be aimed at the provision of proper facilities for men whose habits reflect orientations totally repugnant to those of the "middle Canadian". It is thus that an unedited interview containing 29 times the word "fuck" in two pages in unfair to both the subject and the implied purpose of the interviewer. While the tone of the prisoners' attitudes have been perhaps more accurately reflected, a considerable amount of persuasive appeal in some quarters has been necessarily sacrificed.

Ain't it all a fucking shame.

BILLY LIAR

Dear Editors:

I really must protest Sol Finkelstein's "review"(?) of Billy Liar which appeared in last Friday's Journal.' Finkelstein is obviously unqualified to comment on drama-certainly unequal to the task of writing about it - in addition to being singularly undiscriminating and undiscernining.

Bill Martin may not have been a brilliant Billy Liar but his performance was certainly of a competence belying Finkelstein's delineation of it as "the only weak point" in the production. At the very least, Martin's performance could have been spared the invidiously unjust comparison with that of Rob McCallister.

Perhaps we could suggest that Finkelstein could take his talents to the Whig-Standard where they will undoubtedly be appreciated.

INITIATION

Dear Editors:

Naturally the Journal received a lot of flak attemtping to trounce Philip Miller for his maturely discriminating attitudes towards the orientation programme, because only the adolescents who enjoy this farce could be bothered writing -- as the gee-golly-whiz letter of Debi Bodner and the attempted put-down (paltry and specious rhetoric) of Ted Cape so readily proved.

I'm glad that Debi told us all that "we did these things because we wanted to", that "You need something to identify with" and that "Sure, you can't meet everyone in one week but organized activities help you start", because these comments gave us all such a rewarding insight into this freshette's bright and fertile mind. I might also suggest to Mr. Cape that the "Pvalovian reflexes" of which he accuses Mr. Miller might be more readily observable at any Mass Oil Thigh than on the letter-page of the Journal.

Philip Miller, as distinct from the mindless hordes of proudly illiterate idiots who somehow flood this place every year and who revel in doing oil thighs endlessly and suffering humiliation in the name of school spirit, is, I would imagine, one of the several students at this university with some character and individuality worth speaking of.

THE PUB

Dear Editors:

Golly, I don't think anyone would deny it was simply terrif when we finally got our very own student bar room. But undoubtedly the real reason we all go to the House of Commons is to lap up the inspired decor -- real giant-sized blow-ups of our very own campus football heroes.

Whooo-eee! Where can I obtain reprints for my bed-sitter?

Congratulations President Thieu:

It sure was hard to vote against you

Millions of South Vietnamese went through the motions of voting in Vietnam's one-man presidential election, but for most the exercise appeared to have been utterly meaningless.

Theoretically, each voter had the right to cast a ballot of no confidence in President Thieu.

"But who would dare to do such a thing?" said a farmer who seemed to sum up the prevailing feeling in the rural areas where the majority of the people live.

In the cities, where the people are more sophisticated and less easily intimidated, there was expected to be a certain protest vote against Mr. Thieu.

The call by the anti-government An Quang Buddhist faction for an election boycott was expected to have impact in the cities of Da Nang and Hue, where the influence of the so-called militant Buddhists is strong.

Demonstrations in Hue and in Da Nang, where a brutal clash occurred between police and rioters on election day, contributed to lowering the voting turnouts in those two cities.

But in most of the country's provinces, such as those of the populous Mekong delta where a third of the country's people live and An Quang influence is weak, the boycott appeal went largely unnoticed.

Although President Thieu had said that the opposition would be allowed to speak out on the election, his opponents were denied the use of the radio and television stations, which of course, were controlled by Thieu.

It would be difficult to determine just how much of a "pro-Thieu" vote there was, since most farmers seemed to feel that they had no choice but to cast a valid ballot, meaning a "vote of confidence" for President Thieu. In many areas this was apparently because local officials and other government cadres advised the people how to vote.

But in other areas there simply appeared to be an unspoken understanding that one should vote "confidence" in Mr. Thieu in order to stay on the safe side of the authorities.

And playing it safe is something which most Vietnamese farmers have been doing with consummate skill for years. For most farmers interviewed by this correspondent over the past few days, the idea of voting "nonconfidence" was virtually inconceivable. Thus, the vote was hardly a test of Mr. Thieu's popularity.

Farmers said that they feared trouble from the local authorities if they didn't vote. But few had paid much attention to Mr. Thieu's election campaign or his campaign speeches. One farmer said that he had heard part of one of Mr. Thieu's speeches on the radio, but that he "didn't understand" what Mr. Thieu was talking about.

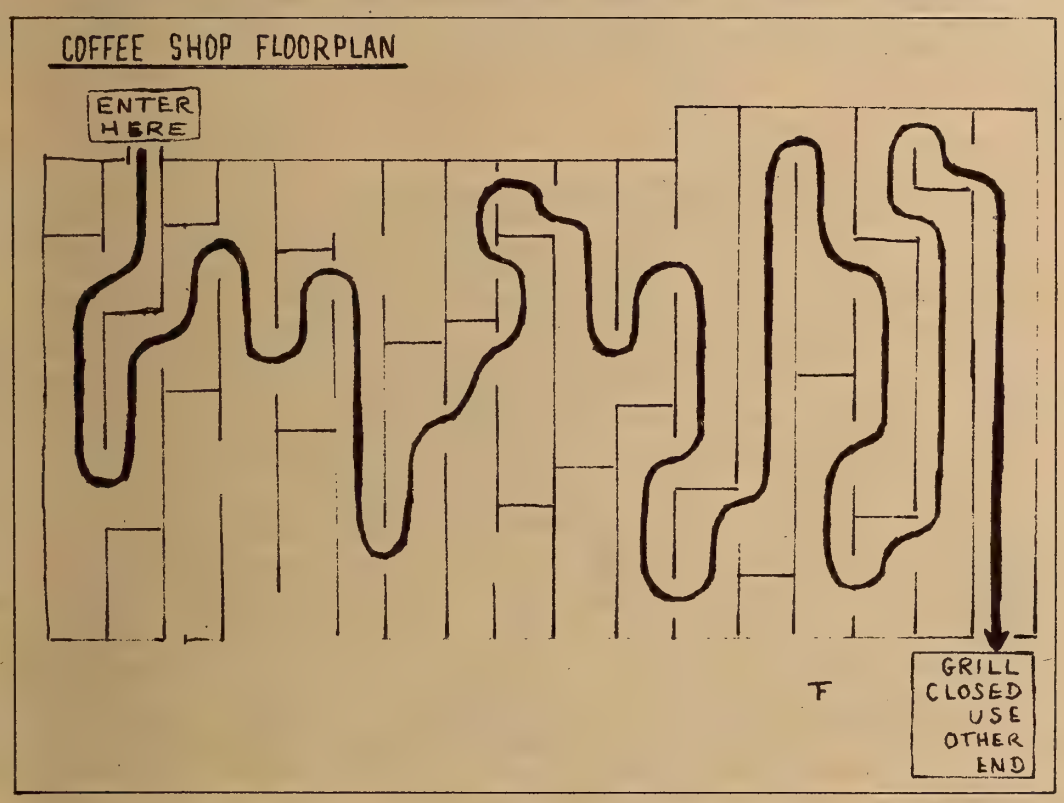
Some farmers in villages south of Saigon said that their hamlet chiefs had explained to them how they could vote confidence or nonconfidence in Mr. Thieu. But to vote nonconfidence in some of the rural polling places might have required courage. In order to vote against Mr. Thieu, one had to mark the ballot, tear it, or drop an envelope without the ballot into the ballot box.

Voters in three polling places observed by this correspondent south of Saigon did not carry pens or pencils to mark and invalidate the ballot. A man who did carry a pencil might have looked a bit suspicious.

And pens and pencils are not available at the voting place. The best bet, if one wanted to vote against Mr. Thieu, might have been to tear the ballot slightly. But what if someone in a neighboring booth heard?

In Saigon, there were receptacles where a voter could deposit an unused - or invalid ballot - but in the three voting places observed in the countryside, there were no such receptacles.

And there was a space below the curtain sealing off the voting booth large enough to permit officials to see if anyone dropped his ballot on the floor.



If he decided to stuff the unused ballot in his pocket, he would have to think twice, because signs were posted saying: "It is absolutely forbidden to carry away the ballot you do not use." Posted regulations warned that according to the electoral law a person would be subject to paying a fine or going to prison for one month to a year if he violated this regulation.

At each rural voting place, government representatives were out in strength. At the village of Phong Duoc, for instance policemen, Popular Force soldiers, Self-Defense militiamen, and representatives of intelligence-gathering organizations had turned out at the schoolhouse used for voting. A lieutenant from the military security service stood six feet from the ballot box, watching as the people, many of them barefoot, shuffled through and voted.

"Election very good," the young lieutenant said, smiling broadly.

But the people, some nervous, some impassive, and some giggling with embarrassment, looked as though they were in a hurry to perform their duty and get away as quickly as possible.

the Dormouse

BY ALAN BROADBENT

Just the other day, Heffalump, a large grey animal, was standing around on a street corner, waiting for something to develop. Heffalumps are wont to do this.

Streaking around the corner came an energetic little elf, called Elrond by his friends. Elrond was very likely to be seen streaking around corners.

Elrond was also very likely to be seen running into people, particularly on your more blind corners, and was seen to run into Heffalump.

Heffalump was not moved by the thump, as large grey animals are not wont to be, but Elrond rebounded a good four feet.

"By gar," Elrond said as he dusted himself off, for he had never seen an animal quite so large, and at the same time grey. "Pray, wot are you who takes up one entire street corner?"

Heffalump was already taking a shine to this little fellow, and he answered in dulcet tones, "I am a heffalump."

Seeing the beginnings of a smile on Heffalump's face, Elrond thought that this might well be a fine animal. "A big one at least," he thought to himself.

"Where are you from, there, Heffalump?"

"Oh, I'm from these parts," replied Heffalump. Not being able but to notice the diminutive size of this chap before him, he queried, "Are you, by any chance, an elf?"

Elrond hesitated for a moment before replying in the affirmative.

"Yes, my name is Elrond, and you could say that I am an elf."

"Do you have any family here in the area?" Heffalump asked, wanting to prolong the conversation with the tiny chap.

"My mother lives over on the campus of Queen's, in the student's union," Elrond responded.

"Is she a graduate student there?" Heffalump asked, knowing something of the university.

"No, her name is Alma Mater Society," Elrond twinkled.

Heffalump reeled at these words, almost demolishing three buildings in the process, as large, grey, reeling animals are wont to do.

"My words seem to make you reel, Heffalump," said Elrond, dancing to avoid falling and flying debris.

"You can say that again, Elrond," Heffalump replied, catching his balance, with a look of astonishment on his face.

"My words seem to make you reel, Heffalump," Elrond repeated, not wanting to disobey the whims of this large, grey animal. "Why do you carry this look of astonishment on your visage, if I may call it that?"

"My mother is also Alma Mater Society."

After some merriment and rejoicing at this uncovering of a sibling relationship, the two set to reminiscing about their old mom.

"I always thought she was a bit of a bitch," said Elrond, being given to critical analysis.

"From the differences in our appearance, I would think she did a bit of messing around," suggested Heffalump, adding the familiar "if you know what I mean."

Elrond didn't have the faintest idea what Heffalump meant, and defended his mother.

"In fact," he said, "this in only a disguise, this elfery, as I will show you."

With this he streaked into a phone booth, and moments later appeared as a high-rise co-operative college and residence.

"There, you see, I am not an elf, but am similar to you, large and grey and all," Elrond said triumphantly.

But Heffalump did not seem to be at all taken aback by this.

"I must admit that this Heffalump facade is only a disguise also," he said, and with some effort he squeezed himself into the same phone booth Elrond had so handily streaked into moments before. After a somewhat longer time, Heffalump emerged as a small store on Princess Street in downtown Kingston.

Heffalump and Elrond both marvelled at their expertise in disguise, as one might well expect, and finally agreed that there were major differences in their physical appearance.

"I guess she did do a bit of messing around, old Alma Mater Society," agreed Elrond.

And with that the two turned into a pub and remained friends for a long time.

The York University student council voted to give $250 to striking Tex-Pack Ltd. workers in Brantford.

The 200 members of the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union have been on strike against Texpack for 11 weeks.

"We want to show we care," said council president Michael Fletcher. "Canadians everywhere, including the strikers at Texpack have supported university students through taxes in the past 20 years, often with no direct benefits themselves. Now it's time that we students started repaying the debt."

The York decision follows last week's vote by the University of Toronto Student Council to donate $500 to Texpack workers.

A strike of 950 office and laboratory workers at the University of Montreal gave nearly 18,000 students an indefinitely long holiday starting Monday.

The students and their 2,100 professors have voted to boycott classes in support of the non-teaching staff, which joined the Canadian Union of Public Employees last winter.

Montreal's other French language campus, the University of Quebec, also faces a shutdown because of a labour dispute. This would affect 8,200 full-time students and 2,800 part-time students.

Statistics Canada have released figures indicating that abortions are being performed in increasing numbers in Canada, with an increase of about 40 per cent over 1970 during the first year of Canada's liberalized abortion laws.

Amendments to the criminal code allowing abortions where a three-member-panel rules that the mothers health would be threatened came into law in August, 1969.

The House of Commons failed again Tuesday to unite against nuclear weapons tests and the planned United States test in the Aleutian Islands in particular.

Liberal and New Democrat MPs have tried three times in the last two weeks to have the Commons vote condemnation of the U.S. test proposed for later this month on Amchitka Island.

Such motions require unanimous consent to be put to debate or to a vote.

For the first time in its 75-year history, the Canadian Club will allow women to become members, President W. J. Adams announced Tuesday. Adams told an all-male audience of about 200 at the Royal York Hotel that the decision is " by no means a concession to the women's liberation movement. It's just that women have been taking a more active part in business and in the professions in recent years."

The club was established in 1896 to encourage the study of Canadian arts, literature, and economy.

The University of Calgary wants 400 volunteers to take part in its research project on the non-medical use of marijuana. Each volunteer will be paid fifty dollars.

The two-year project, financed by $100,000 grants from the federal government, will be an attempt to determine the physical and mental effects of marijuana smoking under controlled test conditions.

Marijuana for the program, kept in a safe at the medical school, was provided from a government plot near Ottawa.

Persons in good physical health, 21 years of age or older, are eligible. Professional, business, and office personnel are among groups which would be suitable.

The Great Television Debate between the leaders of the three Ontario political parties turned out to be somewhat less than great.

Robert Nixon said it was "sort of like a Burmese mating ritual".

Stephen Lewis called it "dull, listless, and ridiculous."

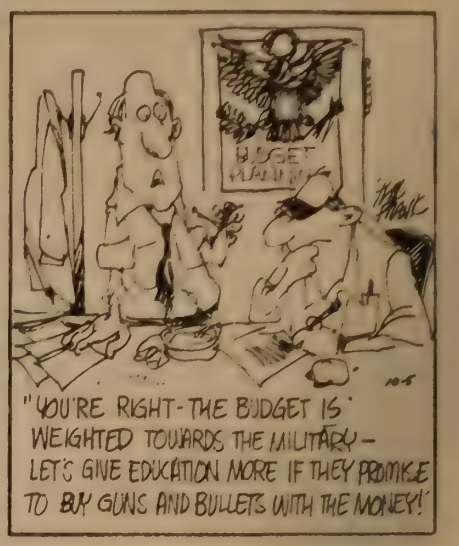
Premier William Davis was "frustrated" by it.

Such was the first debate of this sort in the nineteen-year history of television programming in Ontario. The hour-long show, taped Tuesday morning, sparked dissatisfaction and criticism of the format, which, according to Lewis, was merely a question-and-answer session. "There are about 1,000 T.V. shows I can think of that were better than that. I don't think anyone won or lost."

Police in Montreal arrested seven members of the Front de Liberation du Quebec yesterday on the first anniversary of the kidnapping of James Cross.

The police claimed to have broken an FLQ cell in arresting the five men and two women. None of them was immediately charged and none of them had had his identity disclosed by police.

The raid which resulted in the seven arrests started after a policeman spotted a recently repainted car which matched the make of a car used in a credit union hold-up on Sept. 24. A note left at the scene of the robbery claimed that the FLQ had been responsible for it.



The federal-provincial dispute over ownership of off-shore mineral rights flared up again Tuesday following the announcement of the discovery of oil on Sable Island 90 miles off the coast of Nova Scotia.

Prime Minister Trudeau told the House of Commons that that Ottawa does not recognize Nova Scotia's claim to all royalties from Sable Island oil, and warned Nova Scotian Premier Gerald Regan that if he "can't agree with us in some solution then he won't get anything."

Robert Stanfield, the person whose constituency includes the tiny island, called Trudeau's stand "absurd and unfair" to Nova Scotia.

Ottawa and the provinces have been trying to reach what Trudeau described as a political settlement of the dispute about off-shore mineral rights since the 1967 decision of the Supreme Court of Canada that offshore mineral rights were the property of the federal government. Ottawa then offered to split royalties evenly with the provinces.

Nova Scotia rejected the offer and still claims that it has sole rights to all the royalties including those on Sable Island.

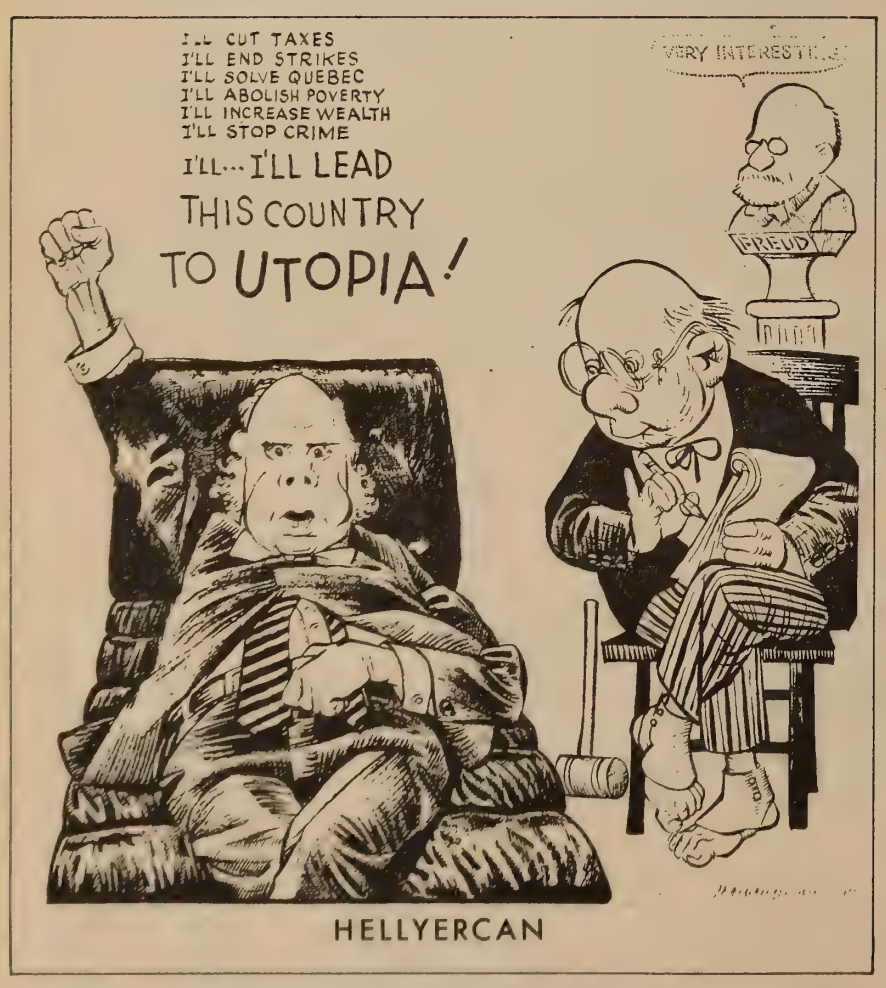
THE WORLD

United States lawyer William Kunstler, who was an unofficial negotiator at the prison revolt at Attica, N.Y. , last month, said Monday that prison revolts in the U.S. had just begun.

Kunstler, in Toronto to appear on the CBC television show Front Page Challenge, said that since the Attica riot, there had been jail revolts in Dallas, Baltimore, and Pontiac, Illinois. He said that New York Governor Nelson Rockefeller could be legally tried for murder in the deaths of the 10 Attica prison employees and 32 prisoners killed by the bullets of state troopers.

"Rockefeller will not be tried, although he halted negotiations and ordered the use of weapons against unarmed men for reasons that proved to be untrue," he said.

South Vietnamese President Nguyen Van Thieu was re-elected Sunday by a whopping 91.5 per cent of the electroate - a total so large that it brought renewed charges of election rigging. The result even surprised Thieu, who had predicted he would get 60 per cent of the votes.



The election was marred by Communist shellings, terrorism, and bloody violence in the streets which left more than 21 persons dead and more than 100 wounded.

Thieu declared that the vote had showed the "high political consciousness and determination of our nation."

Five and half per cent of the electorate voted against Thieu, and officials were unable to account for the other three per cent of the votes cast. One election official said the discrepancy could be due in part to the fact that seven ballot boxes were stolen in Da Nang.

However, there were indications that neither the large voter turn-out nor the high number of pro-Thieu votes were entirely authentic. A Saigon election clerk said that "all polling stations received orders prior to the election to replace invalid - anti-Thieu - ballots with valid ones." Opposition leader Ngo Cong Duc charged that "more than 3,000,000 of the blank voting cards were distributed to province and district officials "to be used in case of a low voter turnout".

Vice President Ky and General Duong Van Minh, the two major opposition candidates, dropped out of the election, charging Thieu had rigged the balloting.

Action Canada's proposals for tax cuts, wage and price guidelines and an increased money supply could cure almost everything that ails Canadian society, Paul Hellyer, the movement's founder and leader, said over the weekend. These measures, he said, would bring an end to labour strikes, poverty, unemployment, the housing crisis, crime in the streets and Quebec separatism.

The Action Canada program calls for "substantial" tax cuts, and mandatory guidelines to keep wages increasing only as much as the productivity of the entire labour force, resulting in "zero" inflation. The program will end unemployment, Hellyer said because "sufficient jobs would be available at decent wages for everyone who wanted to work". A further result would be a "strikeless society" because labour disputes would be legislated away by the guidelines and "resolved in a just way". Since full employment would remove the need for anyone to steal, Hellyer said it would result in "a society where both rural and urban people could leave their homes for the corner shop without having to lock their doors; where anyone can take an evening walk in their favourite park or along their favourtie road without fear of being molested."

According to figures released by the organization, four months of intensive work and publicity have given Action Canada a total membership of 4,738. This figure hardly indicates a populist movement that is sweeping the country.

Chief constable warns against beer in public

Two west Kingston residents have complained about the obscene language used by some students at Queen's football games, the Whig-Standard said Thursday.

The Kingston paper quotes Robert Good, a member of the Frontenac County Board of Education, as objecting to the words shouted by a group of students. "A group of young adults marched past me with clenched fists, screaming obscenities. It was genuine verbal violence shouted at a distance of fifty inches, not safely insulated fifty feet away."

Good said he did not mind the words as much as the implication of violence and disrespect. "If they were merely colourful or slightly vulgar there would be no problem. As a taxpayer, I feel if the senate and the trustees can't control the students then maybe we should cut back on enrollment until they have a number they can control."

And the Whig says similar complaints have come from Robert Pullman, an apartment building superintendent who lives near Richardson Stadium.

"The young people have been urinating against the fences, throwing beer bottles onto the premises, and all the five and six-year-olds have begun using the vocabulary they've heard screamed in the cheers." Pullman told the Whig-Standard

A letter to Good from Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch said Deutsch also deplored the conduct of some spectators at the Queen's-Ottawa game Sptember 18.

"I am satisfied that it was not Queen's students who were to blame" Deutsch added, however.

He said crowd control at football games was the responsibility of the Alma Mater Society and its constables.

But chief constable Glen Agar told the Journal Friday that there was very little the constables could do. They are chiefly concerned with keeping order and preventing any violence, not with shouted words Agar said.

AMS president Patrick Riley told the same thing to the Whig-Standard. "We have no plans to charge those who swear. If they're really vocal we will, however, ask them to shut up or leave. And we're not goint to try to change the words of traditional cheers just because a few people object."

Agar said he agreed that the conduct of some students at games this year had been unusually rowdy. He said the distance students walk from residences to the new stadium is one reason for the problem.

Drinking liquor or beer either in the stadium or on the way to it is illegal, he pointed out. A student found on Union Street with a bottle of beer will be arrested, the chief constable said, and there is nothing the constables can do to protect students who insist on drinking in public.

SAYS VIC SHOULD BE COED

By Chris Redmond

The coed residence committee will be asked tomorrow night to recommend that Victoria Hall be an integrated residence next year.

Gordon house and Brockington House would become women's residences, to keep the total number of men and women in residence the same.

If the committee agrees to the proposal it will go to the Women's Residence Council and the Inter-Residence Council for consideration.

Committee chairman Doug Romans will present to the committee a draft proposal which says Victoria Hall would be integrated by rooms -- that is, men and women would live in alternate rooms throughout the building.

The Victoria-Gordon-Brockington proposal is the third detailed plan for coed residences which has been considered by study committees in the past two years.

A proposal to make Chown Hall and Gordon-Brockington coed, either by rooms or by alternate floors, was presented early last spring but abandoned.

The plan considered by the present committee in the most detail was to make only part of Victoria Hall -- B, C and D wings -- coed, probably with men living on one side of the floor and women on the other. Morris Hall would have become a women's residence to compensate for the 194 women displaced from Vic by men.

The more extensive plan is now being proposed because Romans says the results of a survey taken last week show an unexpectedly large demand for coed residences.

Men and women polled in meal lines said more than three-quarters of them -- 77 per cent of women and 88 per cent of men -- would consider living in a coed residence after their first year at Queen's.

In first year 47 per cent of freshettes and 62 per cent of freshmen said they would have applied to live in coed residence if it had existed.

Making Vic coed would displace about 380 women. The capacity of Gordon-Brockington is 356, so that only minor adjustments would be required to keep the number of residence women around 1125 and men around 1004.

Details about fees, readmission policies, dons and other matters involved in starting coed residences have not all been worked out for the Victoria-Gordon-Brockington proposal.

But a 60-page report considered last week by the coed residence committee goes into detail for the earlier Victoria-Morris plan.

It gave figures for the number of upperclassmen (94) and freshmen (100) who could live in coed Vic if that plan were put into effect, and broke down in detail which residences they would come from.

The report said all men in residence, either on Leonard Field or in coed Vic, should pay the same fee scale, despite minor differences in service and accommodation. It also said women in Morris would be under the control of the present women's residence system and subject to their fee scale.

Complete integration of the Leonard and Ban Righ dining halls should take place, the report said, allowing a resident student to eat wherever he preferred.

The coed part of Victoria Hall would continue to have proctors responsible to the Women's residence Council on the women's side of the floor. On the men's side there would be floor seniors, chosen by the men who were to live there.

These proctors and floor seniors would be represented by Victoria Hall Central Committee with representation on both the IRC and the WRC.

Coed Victoria Hall would have three female and two male dons. At present there is one female don in B Wing, one in C Wing and three in D Wing.

The committee's report, presenting the Victoria-Morris proposal, traces the history of proposals for coed residences at Queen's. The first recommendations were made in 1969-70, it says, when an IRC report said that "the residences, as part of the university, a supposed learning environment, nevertheless severely restricted intellectual interchange between the sexes outside the classroom, and that there was a disturbing lack of social intercourse between male and female students other than formal dating."the Chown-Brockington proposal was made in early 1970, and argument centred on "whether or not women and men living in the same residence, that is, Brockington House, amid four other non-integrated residences, would make the atmosphere within that building any more conducive to studying and the exchange of ideas".

The proposal was dropped, but reintroduced in March 1971 when AMS president Patrick Riley said it should be put into effect at once, and that men and women should alternate by rooms, not by floors.

As a result of the Riley proposals a committee was set up representing the AMS the IRC and the WRC.

Queen's short of money; hiring to be slowed

Queen's has a budget deficit of almost half a million dollars this year, and will need $1.1 million more next year to balance the 1972-73 budget.

Those figures are presented by the Principal's Committee on Resource Allocation, in a report published by the Queen's Gazette this week.

The committee met all summer to consider the financial crisis in which Queen's finds itself, and to recommend ways to save money.

The main recommendation the group makes is that the university stop hiring large numbers of people, and particularly permanent professors: "All new appointments will be made on a term or sessional basis. Only in exceptional and well-justified cases will new tenured appointments or new probationary appointments leading to consideration for tenure be approved."

That is one of four guidelines presented for the administration of funds assigned to faculties and schools. The others are to direct a larger share of the money available toward "non-tenured and casual academic staff" including graduate tutors; to allow sabbatical leaves only where it is necessary and can be done without having to hire a replacemtnt; and to avoid filling non-academic positions if possible.

That policy applies to the rest of the university as well: "No vacant position may be filled without prior review and approval by the Vice-Principal Finance with the advice of the Director of Personnel."

The financial problems next year will mean a cut of about five percent in administrative budgets for Queen's, the committee's report says. The money allotted for faculties and schools will be reduced about two percent.

The committee, chaired by Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch, says the major reason for the money shortage is that the cost of living is rising faster than the Basic Income Unit, the figure which determines how much money the Ontario government gives universities.

For last year the BIU increased by six percent, and for this year by 4.85 percent. Next year the increase will be only two percent.

The stringency will continue for some years, the report says. It points out that the $491,000 deficit for 1971-72 is being made up out of the accumulated reserves the university has. So large a deficit will virtually exhaust these funds, it says, and another deficit next year could only be made up from the special-purpose endowment funds which the university uses to finance scholarships, research and special projects.

Use of that money for general operating of the university would be short-sighted, the committee's report declares.

Deutsch, in a letter accompanying the published report, invited members of the university community to examine its recommendations and comment on them to him. Planning of the 1972-73 operating budget is about to begin, the letter says.

Homecoming

Love is Homecoming is here from Wednesday through Saturday this week. Quite apart from student activities, Homecoming means the arrival of more than a thousand alumni on campus. Queen's graduates as far back as 1911 will be returning to their, and our, university to join in oil thighs and don their scarves once again. Eventually today's students too will be Queen's grads and members of the Alumni Association. And so, students are invited to join the Alumni Association in greeting returning friends with a warm Queen's welcome.

Judy LaMarsh speaks tomorrow

Judy LaMarsh, the bird in the gilded cage, will be featured speaker at the Commerce Society's "Banquet One" tomorrow night in Wallace Hall of the Union.

Born in 1925, Miss LaMarsh became teacher, architectural draughtsman, translator, lawyer and finally member of parliament for Niagara Falls. From the time she was elected in 1960 until the spring of 1963, she was the only woman member of the opposition in the house of commons.

When Lester B. Pearson became prime minister in 1963, Miss LaMarsh became minister of national health and welfare, and in 1965 became secretary of state. She did not stand for re-election in 1968.

As minister health and welfare, she introduced the Canada Pension Plan and the Canada Assistance Plan, increased federal assistance to amateur sport, and eventually introduced medicare.

While secretary of state she was responsible for the CBC, the National Film Board and other matters of culture and art. The 1967 centennial celebrations were her responsibility as well.

Tickets for Banquet One are still available for $3. The banquet begins at 7:30 p.m.

Correction: summer school

An article about representation of summer school students which appeared in The Journal on October 1 incorrectly attributed several statements to M. Ross Wardle, acting director of the department of extension.

In a letter to The Journal, Wardle emphasized, "I refused completely to speak for QSSA (the Queen's Summer School Association), but I am quoted extensively as having done so."

The error arose in the editing of interviews which The Journal conducted with Wardle and with AMS vice-president Victor G. Bradley.

Several pieces of background explanation given by both Wardle and Bradley were incorrectly presented as opinions expressed directly by the summer school director, when they were nothing of the kind.

It remains true that QSSA has expressed keen interest in certain aspects of student representation, and that such representation may be introduced within this school year.

The Journal regrets any confusion which we caused.

As Wardle stated in his letter, "The matter of representation for students registered through the department of extension, and the role and future of the Summer School Association in relation to ASUS and AMS, were matters at this point for the students themselves to become familiar with, to consider and then make proposals."

WHY VOTE?

WHY LIBERAL?

REPORT NO. 2

As mentioned in our last report, these are excerpts from the official Liberal Platform 'Blueprint for Government', not idle promises.

POVERTY

The present patchwork of welfare programs and unrelated assistance schemes needs to be replaced by a guaranteed annual income based on a negative income tax. The working poor must not be penalized for going to work, as they are now. One out of five suffers poverty. We need the Liberal-proposed 'Bill of Social Rights and Responsibilities.'

FOREIGN CONTROL

We cannot get by without foreign investment, but we can welcome it on OUR terms. Foreign loan capital will be made more attractive than equities. Venture capital companies will be set up to provide 'seed money' for new Canadian companies. We need much stricter enforcement of existing legislation requiring processing Canadian raw materials in Canada.

Queen's students bleed 800 pints

The fall blood drive held last week in the basement of Victoria Hall collected about 800 pints of Queen's blood -- 150 pints less than last year's total. But Red Cross officials said they were pleased with the turnout anyway.

During the morning of Thursday, the blood drive's final day, all the B positive and AB positive blood collected was rushed to Ottawa Civic Hospital to meet an emergency shortage.

The rest of the blood collected at Queen's will be inspected at Ottawa and then returned to Kingston General Hospital and Hotel Dieu Hospital at Kingston, for use in transfusions here. There was no unusual blood in the 800 pints, the Red Cross said.

The blood drive clinic was sponsored by the Engineering Society and the Nursing Science Society, and the Red Cross said the cooperation of student volunteers was the major reason the drive succeeded.

The spring clinic will be held during the first week of Febrauary.

Birth control information centre proposed

Questionnaires will be handed out on campus next week asking whether there is a need for a birth control information centre at Queen's.

They are sponsored by a study group whose organizer is Mary Ellen Marus, third-year arts and science student and former member of the birth control advisory committee of Zero Population Growth.

The group hopes to set up a student-run centre to tell students what facilities for birth control and abortion are available to them.

Miss Marus said the centre would try to provide an informal, personal atmosphere with student-to-student contacts. The centre would be well equipped with pamphlets and other information, and staffed by students trained for the job, who could direct inquiring students to the appropriate agency and tell them what procedures they should follow.

Questionnaires will be distributed in women's residences and the Union. If the response shows that an information centre is needed, Miss Marus said, there will be a meeting for interested students later in the month.

Education students finish elections

Education students have chosen Ed Devai, graduate of the University of Alberta, to be their representative to the University senate for the year.

Devai defeated Rob Warner 114 votes to 68 at the Education Students Society general meeting Thursday night.

Robin Lerpiniere, who holds degrees from Trent University and from Queen's, was chosen internal vice-president of the society. He received 129 votes; Geoff McCleary had 51.

The general meeting was followed by a dance in Student Street of McArthur Hall. Dances will be held at McArthur regularly this year, according to external vice-president Anne Merrick.

With its executive complete (the other positions all were acclaimed last week), the Education Students Society will continue its organizing with a general meeting to be held some time next week.

Arts 73 sets up fund to honour padre

Arts 73 has raised $375 so far for a trust fund to be used by the university chaplain, "padre" Dr. A.M. Laverty.

Jim Chauvin, organizer of the fund for Arts 73, said the money will be presented to the padre as the class's graduation gift to the university. It is to be administered by Laverty to help Queen's students who need financial assistance.

The gift is in recognition of the 25 years during which the padre has counselled and helped Queen's students. It will be presented to him at a testimonial dinner in January or February, Chauvin said.

The $375 raised so far came from the sale of Tortuga raffle tickets. By arrangement with Science 72, the profits of tickets sold by members of Arts 73 go to the fund rather than to the Science Formal. Chauvin said the year hopes to make the same arrangement with the Commerce Society when its raffle begins after Christmas.

Arts 73 has asked alumni of the past 25 years to contribute to the fund, and is welcoming gifts from present students as well.

FOOD?

A Student Food Committee is finally being set-up! Any people interested in improving the situation of food service on campus, please leave your name, address, telephone no. in the AMS office; c-o Alison Allan. SENATE ELECTIONS TOMORROW

Graduate Studies 1 year term

Ian Boag

Ian Boag has been a graduate student in Chemical Engineering for two and a half years. Among other things, he has been vice-president of the GSS, a member of the GSS Council, and a member of the chemical engineering student-staff committee. He is currently on the Graduate School Council.

Graduate students currently face a substantial drop in income due to higher tuition dues and the new tax laws. These facts cannot be altered, but they should be considered if graduate students are to be asked to shoulder a greater share of the economy measures in this university. It has been my experience in my own department (where the comprehensive exams were recently revised) and in the graduate school (where measures to reduce the inpact of the new tax laws are under study) that a responsible student voice is usually well received by those dealing with matters affecting the academic and financial well-being of the students. If elected, I hope to join the Student Affairs Committee, which is the logical forum for such matters.

I feel that as an involved graduate student of over two years standing, I am well qualified to represent the graduate viewpoint and to understand the issues that concern the university. I can offer no platform, as senate elections are not fought on such a basis and a student senator is responsible to more than just the faculty he represents. On the basis of my previous experience and a continuing interest in the functioning of this university, I would hope to make an effective contribution in the Senate.

Mike Williams

Michael Williams is currently in the Master's Program with the Geography Department. As an undergraduate at Queen's he was an active member of the Alma Mater Society, the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society, and the Intramural Athletic Council as well as serving on the excutive of his year society.

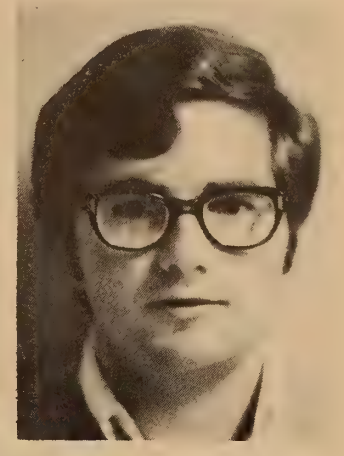
This being my only opportunity to present my views to the whole GSS, I would like to make a few generalized comments on my approach to Senate as a graduate student.



Obviously, the sudden problems caused by the direct and indirect controls exerted on the graduate student are the most pressing issues facing us at this time. As a person totally dependent on these reduced resources, I feel the Senate is the place to present, both vocally and quietly, opinions and suggestions to help ease the burden. It is not enough to accept the government position but instead, we must find long range solutions, of which the McIntosh Scholarships are a start, and a long range clarification of the graduate student's position at Queen's. For, without the full backing of Senate, solutions now and in the future will be hard to find.

I ask for your support to enable me to present the graduate students' views to Senate and to act as a responsible Senator in the operating and planning of this University.

Arts and Science for 1 year term

Phil Brown

Philip Brown has been a resident of Kingston for eight years. He is enrolled in 3rd year honors History. He has had experience in many facets of University life, including service on DSC's, and has a good knowledge of the Senate committee system, through membership on the subcommittees on Radio Broadcasting and Concerts. In addition he does part time work running projectors for the department of Space Allocation, and in recording audio tapes for other University departments. Other extra-curricular activities include House Managing the Grant and Dunning Hall concert series and active participation in numerous Drama presentations. He has also appeared in many Kingston theatre productions. Readers may remember him as Teddy in last year's presentation of "Arsenic and Old Lace" at the St. Lawrence Summer Playhouse.

In addition he is very actively involved in CFRC, holding the positions of Announcer Supervisor and FM Program Director. In this capacity he has had dealings with many university departments.

He is running primarily on the basis of the confidence that he has the experience in the university administration to adequately represent the students of his faculty in the Senate, and in doing this to bridge what to many students appears to be an unfathomable gap between themselves and the complex structure of Queen's University government.

Stewart Searle

I believe that the goal of a university is not just to provide a 'liberal education' for its members, as suggested in the Principal's Report on Teaching and Learning, but to provide a liberal education with the intent that this might be used to make contributions to society, fulfilling an obligation of university members to society. What is the nature of this obligation?

Sharpening our pencils it is not difficult to see the extent to which the cost of our university education is subsidized by society. The operating budget of Queen's for the 1971-72 session was approved in the neighborhood of $31 million. With enrolment at about 8,000, the cost is roughly $4,000 per student. Clearly a tuition fee of $500 does not go very far in covering the actual cost. I am not suggesting that the university should be the paid servant of society, but having been provided with a 'liberal education' we should be prepared to make some contribution to society in return. This is how I feel the university should be oriented.

The Senate achieves this goal in two ways. Perhaps most obviously, the actual policy decisions of the Senate determine to a large extent the direction or orientation of the university. It often must reach the delicate balance between commitments to society and the freedom of the members of the university community. Secondly, the Senate provides a channel through which those interested, can contribute to the university community now, and from this experience, will be better prepared to contribute to society later in life.

It is for this reason that I am running for Senator, and I urge your support.

Rob MacKnight

As there are no real issues on campus, all having been hashed over so many times in the past, this can only be a statement of my reasons for running for the Senate. My main concern is Queen's expansion and campus planning. I would like to see Queen's remain a small university --i.e. a maximum of 10,000 students --for two main reasons, one economic and one traditional. First, I don't feel Kingston can support a university community of over 10,000 -- many students may feel now that Kingston is pressed for accommodation and services (railroad and bus) for the present student population. Campus expansion in the downtown core -- the main campus -- has been opposed by Kingston city council for tax reasons. The only alternative is the West Campus. As a member of Artsci 74 I hope I can somehow influence this expansion since I will have to live with it, unlike most other members of the senate who will soon be graduating. Also, with student population growing, I am afraid Queen's will lose its famous spirit and the students will be lost in the anonymity of the university system, along the lines of U. of T. and McGill.- Queens.

by John McMurtry

A few months ago my neck got a hard crick in it. I couldn't turn my head; to look left or right I'd have to turn my whole body. But I'd had cricks in my neck since I started playing grade-school football and hockey, so I just ignored it....I had trouble lifting it (a book) with one hand. I was losing the strength in my left arm, and I had such a steady pain in my back I often had to stretch out on the floor of the room I was in to relieve the pressure.

Apparently the steady pounding I had received playing college and professional football in the late Fifties and early Sixties had driven my head into my backbone so that the discs had crumpled together at the neck - "acute herniation" - and had cut the nerves to my left arm....

Not much of this will surprise anyone who knows football. It is a sport in which body wreckage is one of the leading conventions.

Just about anybody who has ever played football for any length of time, in high school, college or one of the professional leagues, has suffered for it later physically.

Indeed, it is arguable that body shattering is the very point of football, as killing and maiming are of war. (In the United States, for example, the game results in 15-20 deaths a year and about 50,000 major operations on knees alone.)

To grasp some of the more conspicuous similarities between football and war, it is instructive to listen to the imperatives most frequently issued to the players by their coaches, teammates and fans. "Hurt 'em!""Level 'em!" "Kill 'em!" "Take 'em apart! Or watch for the plays that are most enthusiastically applauded by the fans. Where someone is "smeared", "knocked silly", "creamed", "nailed", "broken in two", or even "crucified". Just as in hockey, where a fight will bring fans to their feet more often than a skillful play, so in football the mouth waters most of all for the really crippling block or tackle. For the kill. Thus the good teams are "hungry", the best players are "mean", and "casualties" are as much a part of the game as they are of a war.

Football the sport of kings

The family resemblance between football and war is, indeed, striking. Their languages are similar: "field general," "long bomb," "Blitz," "take a shot," "front line," "pursuit," "good hit," "the draft," and so on. Their principles and practices are alike: mass hysteria, the art of intimidation, absolute command and total obedience, territorial aggression, censorship, inflated insignia and propaganda, blackboard manoeuvres and strategies, drills, uniforms, formations, marching bands and training camps. All the virtues they celebrate are almost identical: hyper-agressiveness, coolness under fire, and suicidal bravery.

One difference between war and football, thoudh, is that there is little or no protest against football. Perhaps the most extraordinary thing about the game is that the systematic infliction of injuries excites in people, not concern, as would be the case if they were sustained at, say, a rock festival, but a collective rejoicing and euphoria. Players and fans alike revel in the spectacle of a combatant felled into semiconciousness, "blindsided," or "decapitated."

After every game, of course, the papers are full of reports on the day's injuries, a sort of post-battle "body count" and the respective teams go to work with doctors and trainers, tape, whirlpool baths, cortisone and morphine to patch and deaden the wounds before the next game. Then the whole drama is re-enacted - injured athletes held together by adhesive, braces and drugs - and the days following it are filled with even more feverish activity to put on the show yet again at the end of the week.

By the end of my football career, I had learned that physical injury - giving it and taking - is the real currency of the sport. And that in the final analysis the "winner" is the man who can hit to kill even if only half his limbs are working.

In thinking back on how all this happened, though, I can pick out no villains. As with the social system, the game has a life of its own. Everyone grows up inside it, accepts it and fulfils its dictates as obediently as helots. Far from ever questioning the principles of the activity, people simply concentrate on executing these principles more aggressively than anybody around them. The result is a group of people who, as the leagues become of a higher and higher class, are progressively insensitive to the possibility that things could be otherwise. Thus, in football, anyone who might question the wisdom or enjoyment of putting on heavy equipment on a hot day and running full speed at someone with the intention of knocking him senseless would be regarded simply as not really a devoted athlete and probably "chicken." The choice is made straightforward. Either you, too, do your very utmost to efficiently smash and be smashed, or you admit to incompetence or cowardice and quit. Since neither of these admissions is very pleasant, people generally keep any doubts they have to themselves and carry on.

Of course, it would be a mistake to suppose that there is more blind acceptance of brutal practices in organized football than elsewhere. On the contrary, a recent Harvard study has approvingly argued that football's characteristics of "impersonal acceptance of inflicted injury," an over-riding "organization goal," the "ability to turn oneself on and off," and being, above all, "out to win" are of inestimable value" to big corporations.

As an ex-player in this seasonal coast-to-coast drama, I see little to recommend the view that football is a cathartic experience. What organized football did to me was make me suppress my natural urges and repress them in an alienating, vicious form. Spontaneous desires for free bodily exuberances and fraternization with competitors were shamed and forced under ("If it ain't hurtin' it ain't helpin',") and in their place were demanded armored mechanical moves and cool hatred of all opposition. Endless authoritarian drill and dressing-room harangues were the kind of mechanisms employed to reconstruct joyful energies into mean and alien shapes. I am quite certain that everyone else around me was being similarly forced into this heavily equipped military precision and angry antagonism, because there was always a mutinous attitude about full-dress practices, and everybody (the pros included) had to concentrate incredibly hard for days to whip themselves into just one hour's hostility a week against another club.

CANADA

Still reeling from the initial blow of the 10 per cent surcharge imposed by US President Nixon on all goods imported into the US, the Canadian economy received another jolt from the US government Wednesday.

A US tax reform bill was passed by the House of Representatives which provides for a seven per cent tax benefit for US firms which buy US-made machinery and electrical equipment rather than buying foreign made products and provides a variety of tax benefits for US firms which manufacture exports at home rather than in subsidiaries in other countries.

The first provision, when added to the existing 10 per cent surcharge, creates an effective surcharge on Canadian machinery imports of 17 per cent, virtually shutting those Canadian firms producing such products out of the American market.

The second provision could result in US firms shutting down some of their Canadian branch plants, laying off more Canadians at a time when unemployment is already very high.

The bill still has to pass the Senate, but is expected to become law within two weeks.

While MPs in Ottawa were again unable to agree on a united course of action, almost 9,000 elementary and high school students gathered at the United States consulate in Vancouver Wednesday to protest the planned US nuclear test on Amchitka Island.

The House of Commons has been trying for two weeks to decide what it wants to say in its protest to the US government.

Bell telephone rates will go up again in about 30 Eastern Ontario communities, including Kingston.

The increase of 35 cents per month for residences will bring the monthly rate in Kingston for a residence phone up to $5.15 from $4.80. Business rates will go up to $12.50 from $10.90 when the new rates take effect, 30 days after Bell files its new tariffs.

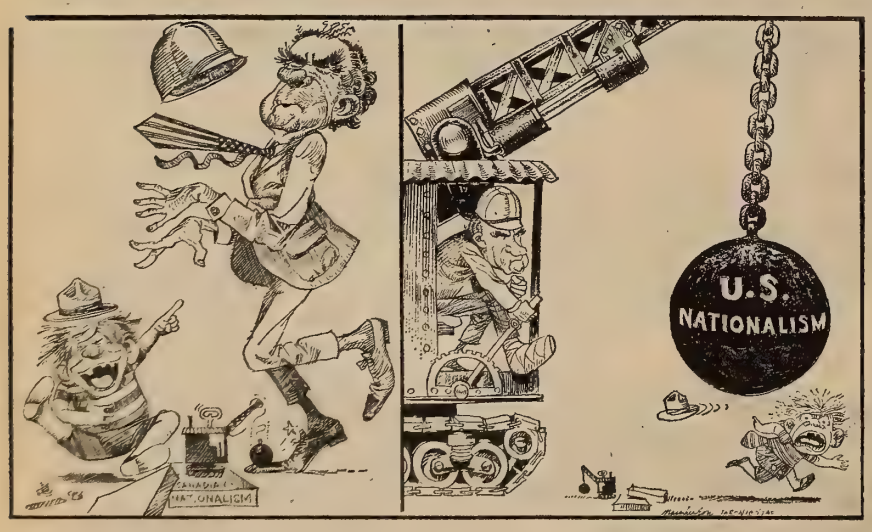
This new rate, approved last week by the Canadian Transport Commission, is the second this year. The last rate increase, of 15 cents, took effect Jan. 1.

The Globe magazine will cease publication this month and will be replaced as the Globe and Mail's weekend magazine supplement by Weekend Magazine.

J. L. Copper, publisher of the Globe, said that the magazine has been declining in advertising revenue "at an accelerating rate."

With its competition, the Toronto Telegram, going out of business by Oct. 30, the Toronto Star has decided to increase its advertising rate.

The increase is expected to be a "normal" year-end rise, but will take effect Dec. 1, a month earlier than the usual date for newspapers' annual rate adjustments.



Solicitor-General Jean-Pierre Goyer has announced changes in the treatment of prisoners in federal prisons.

Goyer said that wives or husbands of prisoners may be allowed to visit their spouses overnight, prisoners will be paid the minimum federal wage rate for work and convicts will sit on committees to help operate the prisons.

He also said that consideration will also be given to allowing girl or boy friends to visit unmarried convicts so that convicts can have normal sexual relations instead of homosexual relations which are not uncommon in our uni-sexed prisons.

The federal government has requested a second adjournment of court proceedings by four Saskatchewan farmers against Finance Minister Benson regarding payments owing under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

The farmers are trying to force Benson to make the payments due them. The request for the adjournment came because of the possibility that the government's proposed bill the Grains Income Stabilization Bill, which would replace the Reserves Act, will be withdrawn and payments made under the old legislation before the court case came up.

US — President Nixon said Thursday night that the US will face an unlimited period of restraints on wages, prices and rents in the second phase of his programme to curb inflation.

The restraints will take effect Nov. 14 when the present 90-day freeze expires. No direct controls will be applied to profits.

The controls will be maintained until the administration is confident that their removal will not start a fresh bout of inflation.

FEEDBACK

B, S, and T

I have just finished reading the blurb about "Blood, Sweat and Tears" in the Journal of October [illegible] and would like to comment. Judging [illegible] 10 inch propoganda photograph these nine musicians give the impression that their music is worthy of a $22,000 cheque, handed over to them without any objections by the A.M.S.

In my opinion, the payment of such a large amount of money for one evening's performance, is grievous. Surely the article and photographs appearing on pages 6 and 7 of the same Journal issue show us where $22,000 could be put to a much better use!

However, it is obvious that popular music is MUCH more important than the social problems such as poverty, sickness, and delinquency, facing us right here in Kingston.

After all, "Blood, Sweat and Tears" did rate the front page. Supposedly, we are here at University in order to gain a deeper understanding of our fellow man, and to learn to cope with the realities of life. Does the cheque for $22,000 reflect this?

Sincerely,
Sheila M. Harwood

Dormouse

Dear Editors:

As I have always enjoyed Alan Broadbent's column, The Dormouse, and have considered it to one of the most interesting features in an otherwise increasingly prosaic Journal, I find myself puzzled at the somewhat vicious and apparently unprovoked attack made upon him by Tommy Hind in the issue of Oct. 5.

For one thing, in his eagerness to slander, Hind commits the same crime he blames the unfortunate Broadbent for -- that of trying to be "in": sordid and scatological phraseology is obviously more acceptable today than it was when Broadbent and myself were young. For another, it seems absurd that Hind whould play panther merely to attack Dormouse; jealousy indicated by the virulent and hominem does not mix well with scorn.

Judging from the way Hind has quarried his argument, he cannot say anything in as many words, and is incapable of developing an idea in a rational, right ordered manner and communicating it to others. His forte is vacillation upon a theme, especially in those cases where the theme is unclear. His efforts testify only to his bad manners and bad taste.

The Dormouse must not take such an attack while lying down or while asleep for it is simply a diversion from the larger and much more serious occasion of an influx of chaos and futility into newspapers and literary magazines.

Gaels Win Big in Muddy York

For the second time in six games, the Golden Gaels broke the half-century mark on the scoreboard, piling up eight converted touchdowns on their way to a 62-7 walk over the outclassed York Yoemen. The game was played under abysmal conditions, in facilities strongly reminiscent of some local high schools; in fact it was impossible to keep statistics, which is why there may be some errors contained herein.

It was apparent early in the game that the rain and wind would ground York's passing game, so the Gaels decided to put on a display of plain power football--the run-the-ball-down-their-throats-and-out-the-other-end variety long forgotten by many colleges. Warrender, Hadden, McLellan, and company simply ran over, through and by defenders as the offensive line had a very productive day (Current guesses put total offense in the 400-yard plus range). McLellan also got ambitious and ran back a punt for a touchdown--after "Moose" McCarney had let out a yell, "McLellan, you're going the wrong way". (There was a 'return left' on-and Gordy went right.) Another fine return, by Joe Pal, was called back on a very dubious clipping call.....where have we seen that before?

McLellan - 3 TDs

Defensively, the Gaels were sound, despite the enforced absence of defensive regulars Jim Sherritt and Bill Thompson. Linebacker Dave Blair and defensive ends Brett Biggs and John Waddell put great pressure on the York passer, while the interior defensive line gave up very little yardage. Tackle Don Smith recovered his third fumble of the year, and middle backer Mike Lambros was all over the field. Lambros also punted very well, collecting a single on one booming effort.

The secondary also played well, with halfback Dave Campbell collecting two interceptions; the second of these was a classic. Campbell stepped inside the intended receiver at the sidelines, picked off the ball, and raced untouched for six points.

Not all was sweetness and light, though. The Gaels collected an unholy lot of penalties, and fumbled the ball three times, including one that set up York's only touchdown. Tackling, though improved, was still ragged at times; this is something the Gaels cannot afford against Varsity

Besides the TD'S already mentioned, the Gaels got majors from McLellan (two, for a total of three), Dave Hadden (two), and Warrender (one), and Hollingsworth (one). Warrender's came on a sixty-yard burst in the third quarter, with Hollingsworth grabbing in a pass fron Ronald Serebrin late in the fourth period. Doug Cozac kicked all converts and added a field goal. The Gaels also picked up a safety touch.

Next week, Queen's begins a home and home series with the Varsity Blues. The Gaels must win one game to clinch the Capitol Division title, and would prefer to do it at home. Toronto looks....well, watch for our preview story on Friday. Then we tell all.

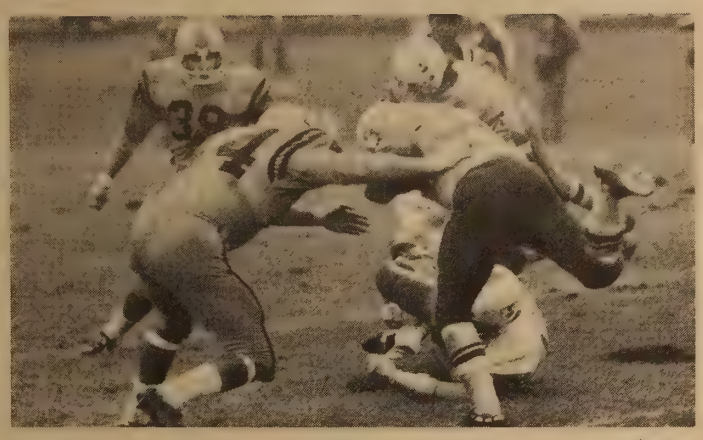
Soccer Gaels Bomb Ottawa U.



It took Queen's less than a minute of play against Ottawa U to do what had proved impossible against Carleton. The Gaels scored two goals in the first two minutes Saturday, then went on to defeat the outclassed Gee-Gees by a whopping eight to one margin.

Almost straight from the opening kickoff, Bruce Wormald took a long pass through the middle and sped past the entire Ottawa defense to score on a low corner shot. Wormald went on to score a hat trick, collecting a second breakaway goal early in the second half, and potting the team's seventh marker late in the game. Teammate Davie Robertson also scored a hat trick, with the second, fourth and fifth points of the contest. Gord Taylor scored the third goal of the first half when he thundered a hard shot just under the crossbar; with about seven minutes gone, it looked like Queen's was trying to match the output of their football counterparts. However, things slowed down considerably after that, with the Queen's forwards content to pass the ball about in the Ottawa half of the field. This laxity could have been dangerous against a more adept team than Ottawa U. With about five minutes to half-time, Stan Taylor apparently grew tired of the passing drill (perhaps in response to coach John Walker, who was offering comments about shooting) and hammered in a hard shot from thirty yards out. The ball deflected off the goalkeeper's hands, but rolled over the line for the fourth and final goal of the first half.

The second half was more Wormald and Robertson, with John Torode getting into the act when his corner kick was deflected into the net by an Ottawa defender. Ottawa got its only goal (and its only real scoring opportunity) when goalie Jim Flood, perhaps galled by his inactivity, took on one of the Ottawa forwards. The resulting penalty kick cost Flood his shutout.

Despite the low quality of the opposition, the Gaels played solid, determined soccer throughout the game although the forwards could still shoot more. The Gaels travel to Peterborough on Wednesday to meet Trent, then return here against Carleton on Saturday. Game time is 11:00 a.m., at the West Campus field.

Administrator chosen president at Sudbury

The executive assistant to the principal of Queen's is leaving for Laurentian University, less than a year after he arrived.

Dr. Edward J. Monahan, who became assistant to principal Dr. John J. Deutsch last July, has been appointed president of Laurentian University of Sudbury, Ontario, effective July 1, 1972.

Monahan, 43, came to Queen's from the Canadian Association of University Teachers in Ottawa, where he was associate executive secretary. Previously he taught philosophy at St. Francis Xavier University in Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

Edward J. Monahan

Laurentian, a bilingual university with enrollment of about 2000, has been without a president since July 1970. The previous president, Dr. Stanley Mullins, resigned under pressure from both the Board of Governors and the faculty and students of Laurentian.

Since then, vice-president (academic) Dr. R.J.A. Cloutier, has been acting president.

Tension at Laurentian, which centered on division of power between the board and the faculty-dominated senate has "eased considerably" in recent months, according to Laurentian publications officer Mrs. Jean Baxter.

Representatives of the committee seeking a new president went to the department of university affairs in Toronto for guidance, she said, and Dr. Walter Hagey, former president of the University of Waterloo, was appointed consultant. He made recommendations to the board and senate to ease the tension and increase efficiency.

Students are represented on both the board and the senate at Laurentian, Mrs. Baxter said.

Monahan was chosen over two other candidates, she said: Fr. Larouche, vice-president, of the University of Quebec at Chicoutimi, and Dr. Cote, head of the department of philosophy at Laval University in Quebec.

Fire alarms continue

Kingston fire trucks were called to the campus three times last weekend, for alarms in Earl Hall, Dupuis Hall and the phys ed centre. There were no fires.

City fire chief Warren Gibson said the alarm in the phys ed centre was the only one which seriously disturbed him.

That alarm was caused by children playing hockey in the parking lot under the arena, he said. A thermostat was struck, accidentally or on purpose, and the fire alarm sounded.

Gibson said such false alarms are expensive. "If they continue to allow a bunch of children to get in where they can set the sprinklers off, it's going to cost them a lot of money."

He said he thought the university should hire a watchman if the underground parking lot is to be kept open.

Gibson added that he thought children playing in the parking area had caused some vandalism and stolen items from unlocked cars. One habitual user of the lot confirmed that his car had been rifled recently. A spokesman for the university department of physical plant could not be reached for comment.

The fire call at Earl Hall Sunday morning was the result of steam pouring from a rooftop vent, which a passer-by thought was smoke. The Dupuis Hall alarm was caused by a malfunction of the alarm system.

Thursday's child

Yes, today is Thursday.

Yes, this is The Journal you see before you.

The Queen's Journal is proud to announce that, beginning immediately, it will publish three issues each week – Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday. For now this is done on an experimental basis; we hope to make it permanent.

Three issues a week is a first for The Journal, which began as a monthly in 1873 and has been twice a week, with occasional lapses, since early in this century.

Our advertisers have supported the change enthusiastically. We hope our readers will do the same.

Rehab 74 chooses officers

First-year rehab thereapy students have chosen their officers for the coming year: Sue Coish will be president of first-year physiotherapy, and Kitty Noble president of first-year occupational.

Susan Coish

Miss Coish, who was mentioned in this year's first issue of The Journal as an outstanding member of the freshman class, says she gained experience this summer working at a camp for retarded children. Miss Noble, from Toronto, said she is like Miss Coish in being keenly oriented towards activity and in her enjoyment of other people.

The two presidents represent 36 women and two men in Rehab 74, first year of the three-year diploma programme, which involves training in the rehabilitation of the physically and mentally handicapped.

They said their aim is to draw Rehab 74 into the whole of campus life through social events. Though Rehab is small they said they are determined not to be unknown, and Rehab 74 has already joined forces with civil engineering in producing a float for the homecoming parade. Other events have been planned with nursing science and medical students.

Correction: Arts 73 fund

Hoechst thinks ahead

Moving with the Times

This year Canadian Hoechst marks its eighteenth year of growth in Canada by moving into new custom-built Montreal headquarters. The Canadian expansion has been closely linked to the worldwide development of Hoechst, which is now among the world's top five chemical companies, with worldwide sales that last year totalled approximately 3.5 billion dollars.

In Canada, sales have almost doubled in the past three years. The new St. Laurent head office and warehouse buildings will provide space for a 100% increase in the company's head office staff, and have been designed for expansion to accomodate increased Canadian production.

Research: Window to the Future

Today's research creates the products of tomorrow. One-third of Hoechst's current sales come from products which did not exist 10 years ago. And with worldwide sales approximating close to 3.5 billion dollars last year, Hoechst spent close to 100 million in pure research, and on laboratory buildings and equipment. The results of this investment decide Hoechst's position in future markets, including Canada.

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organization, Canadian Hoechst has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

This new building is just one of the more visible indications of Canadian Hoechst Limited's continuing investment in Canada.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the Company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. Hoechst likes it that way. So do their customers, here and around the world. Hoechst thinks ahead.

Canada must take a stand, speaker says

"Where is the man who is prepared to take a stand, pound the table, and give the Americans some eyeball-to-eyeball of their own medicine?" Richard Rohmer asked Thursday.

He is chairman of the Mid-Canada Development Foundation, Inc., and of the University of Canada North, and he was speaking at the school of business at Queen's on "the state of relations between the United States and Canada, and some choices which Canada faces".

He said the August 15 wage-price freeze announced by President Richard Nixon had made the American-Canadian relationship new and different, "which will require Canada to develop entirely new strategy in its future dealings with the United States".

That strategy must be based on self-interest, Rhomer declared, "just as the Americans think of nothing but their own best interests".

He described the traditional attitude of Canada towards the United States as "servile" and said the initial Canadian reaction towards the import surcharge imposed by the United States confirmed that stereotype.

"Nothing has changed," Rohmer said. "The Canadian cap is in hand and the Canadian mouth is puckered."

American apathy toward Canada comes from ignorance, he continued. "The Americans and their government do not know much or care much about Canada.

"The fault is ours, not theirs."

Rohmer pointed out that a major exemption to the 10 percent import surcharge was for natural resources, and he said this was no accident. "The United States is under the resource domination of Canada," he said.

"Natural gas, oil, minerals, wood and paper products, water and electricity are but a few of the natural resources which the American industrial machine and the urbanization which supports it must have. There is no doubt that in the short term the Americans could acquire a supply of some -- but by no means all -- of these materials on the world market.

"Furthermore, I cannot not believe that the Government of Canada would refuse to allow the supply of these needed resources to the United States, although it might now be necessary to regulate and control their flow if the jobs of Canadian industrial and service workers are to be defended."

A year of the import surcharge would cost Canada $90 million in exports and 90,000 jobs, Rohmer said. "We're going to have a tough winter."

He said Canada should not give in to pressures that its economy be integrated with that of the United States. "Such an integration of our economy with that of the U.S. would inevitably lead to cultural and political integration and domination. This is a totally unacceptable course of action.

"If economics were all that mattered, this nation would never have been formed, but would long ago have become part of the United States.

"The fact is that we have a way of life, a life style, a culture, a country which is totally distinct from and, in my view, even superior to the United States. I wish them well but on the other side of the border."

He said Canada should take several steps to survive in the presence of "the new United States posture of protectionism, isolationism, unilateral action, belligerence and arrogance".

First, Rohmer said, Canada should put an export impost on natural resources.

Second, with the proceeds of the impost, Canada should create "new high labour content public work projects across this massive, rich, largely unopened nation".

Third, Canada should put a temporary freeze on all immigration.

And fourth, he said, the CBC should budget a large amount of money for "first-rate shows on what Canada is, who its people are, and its importance to the people of the U.S." and buy prime time on America television to show them.

Rohmer said he was particularly worried about a lack of leadership in Canada. "Where's the man in Canada who understands that with all our rich resources, with all our vast forests, with all our fresh water, with all our superb cities and industries, and with all our fine citizens, we have a country of opportunity unparalleled in the world?"

Canada must be "a nation of builders", Rohmer said. "What we lack is the leadership."

Finally, he said, Canada must realize that it will take strong measures to influence the United States.

"To get the elephant's attention, maybe the mouse will have to do more than blow in its ear."

Blood, Sweat and Tears; a plug for the concert

By the AMS Concert Committee

Blood, Sweat and Tears: "A primal force behind fusion of rock and big band jazz". (Esquire October 1971).

Blood, Sweat and Tears: Voted most popular group of 1969 and 1970. and best LP of the year 1970, in the annual Downbeat polls.

Blood, Sweat and Tears: Chosen instrumental combo of the year by Playboy readers in 1970 and 1971.

Why?

Bobby Columby, drummer for the group, explains in a Downbeat interview: "The point of rock'n'roll -- that is, the obvious beat and lyric -- will never be dead. The thing is that it's heading in the direction now where it's going to try, hopefully, to get the best out of other music, which it for years had missed. It's missed jazz-concept solos. It's missed more interesting chord structures. It's missed more interesting arrangements. So our band in essence is trying to get the best out of all music and combines it with rock'n'roll."

Time agrees: "With its five-man horn section, the group is the most successful attempt yet to combine jazz-flavored brass and reeds with rock guitar and rhythm. The musicianship displayed in its complex arrangements and lithe leaping solos is a second to none in the rock world."

The group's lead singer is Canadian-born David Clayton-Thomas. Dan Heckman, music critic for the New York Times and Village Voice, says of Clayton-Thomas' performance on the new BS&T album:

"I think David has never been given credit for the artistic range that he has as a performer. He has a much wider range than he has even begun to express and he is a first-class singer." (Downbeat, September 1971).

Others in the group are equally talented. Three of them are products of top-rank conservatories (two with MA's). Another two have at least some music-school training, along with a wide experience in jazz and commercial bands. One grew up almost exclusively in the jazz tradition. The remaining three served their apprenticeships in folk, rock and blues outfits.

But despite the abundance of geniuses in the band, no one is the controlling factor. Says Cayton-Thomas, "We're trying to encompass every type of music that each of us knows and loves."

Thus BS&T is a blending of many personalities and styles. As Time says, "It is a hard-chugging blues-rock outfit with a fillip of modern jazz. It is a modern jazz combo with a

Thus BS&T is a blending of many personalities and styles. As Time says, "It is a hard-chugging blues-rock outfit with a fillip of modern jazz. It is a modern gazz combo with a streak of contemporary classical dissonance. It is a chamber ensemble with pastoral flutes, Bartokian brass and a buzz of electronic sound effects."

Playboy this month sums it all up: "Bood, Sweat and Tears is nine men who have learned how to develop instrumental patterns in a considerable variety of pop styles. They're still first and best in the field they created."

Blood, Sweat and Tears plays tonight at the arena.

EQUITABLE TAXATION

Despite the many well established pleas including those of its own local leaders, the Tory government won't pay its fair share of taxes. In Kingston, over one-third of the assessed property is tax exempt. Any wonder you find accomodation scarce and expensive? Bob Nixon has assured Dr. Hazlett of immediate equitable relief.

WOLFE ISLAND FERRY

A typical example of the arbitrary paternalism of the present government. Contrary to all the people's wishes, the government has decided to re-locate the ferry without any consultation. A little concern for people would have avoided so much anguish.

ROCK HILL, JULY 2, 1971

I weep for them -- the flower children who with garland garb and open hands offered us blowing bubbles and yellow balloons.
They asked so little in return,
and so many times turned the other cheek, until tired of turning circles
they drifted into Walden ponds.

I weep for them -- our brothers and sisters the thousand mindless souls who came expecting Woodstock, but having seen the trappings avoided the essence, taking the drugs and dress, and thinking this is all -- wonder at crumbling illusions.

My anguished eyes and silent mouth cry out to my little sisters.
In choosing not to choose their freedom is forever gone.
In our gentleness what have we done?
Offered the essence, you took the shell, and the thousand broken beer bottles and desperately hurled obscenities are the songs of self inflicted chains.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

One of the primary aims of the Aesculapian Society Executive involves the provision of certain services for the benefit of all medical students. In recent months many of these services have been successfully undertaken; yet before the year is out, medical students can hope to reap rewards from many more. We would do well to outline these services for the benefit of the students of medicine and for the edification of the campus at large:

The highlight of last year's events is, beyond a doubt, the Variety Show. In sharp contrast to the amateur "gross-outs" of yesteryear, this show earned for itself a reputation of good taste and professionalism. As well, this year's Variety Show promises to be just as enjoyable and just as respectable. Another major achievement of the past year was the editing of the Aesculapian Reporter as a first rate medical newspaper. Although never lacking in originality and potential, this enterprise died from a paucity of advertisement backing. A meds newsletter will be its replacement for this year.

The ever Sports Weekend for Ontario Medical Schools was held last year. Although the idea originated at the University of Ottawa, Queen's was the first medical school to host the event. Needless to say, Queen's won most of the sports events hands down. However, out of courtesty, the engraved bed-pan was presented to Western's medical school in recognition of their drinking prowess.

In a more serious vein, the Aesculapian Society, in conjunction with faculty, has struck an Ethics Committee whose job it is to formulate a code of ethics which relates to the behaviour and appearance of students in the medical milieu. Contrary to first impressions, this committee was implemented for the protection of medical students. Another committee established for the benefit of the Aesculapian Society was the Orientation Committee headed by the Vice-President, Bob Reid. This group organized a program which was very successful in welcoming Meds '75 into first year medicine by way of lectures and co-operative sports and social eventts.

In the recent past, a couple of imaginative projects were proposed which, for one reason or another, never quite materialized. A game effort was made at establishing a medical house on Wolfe Island, but the unavailability of suitable property and the probability of a channge in the ferry route rendered this project unfeasible. An abortive attempt at starting a Meds Yearbook was made earlier this year as well. Although there were individuals who were willing to take on the task, the idea was not endorsed by a majority of medical students and so it was subsequently dropped. Queen's Medical Review, an annual journal, will again be published this year despite last year's financial loss. This publication will this year display a modified format which will incorporate certain "yearbook" aspects while at the same time maintaining a high degree of academic appeal.

Some of the other future services from which medical students will benefit include: a Microscope Central Store (from which first year students may buy their microscopes directly); before Christmas exams for third year (so Meds '73 can spend their Christmas holidays skiing instead of studying); a probable First Aid Course for second year pre-meds (so Meds '76 will at least know a bit more medicine than their friends in Arts); and a possible student-faculty sponsored half-course instructing students how to properly handle therapeutic counselling involving problems of sexuality. As well, we are fortunate in having secured the husband-wife team of Drs. Churnick and Churnick (former students of Masters and Johnson) for the Aesculapian Society Lecture. Their talk, entitled "The Dry Vagina -- Friction in Marriage", will no doubt be well attended by members of all faculties. Another function planned for the new year is the Aesculapian Society Banquet, an event which promotes interyear fellowship.

Finally, from the people that brought you Variety Show '70, this year's Medical Formal is being undertaken on a scale to equal any in the past. Under the competent tutelage of Craig Johnston and Don Argue, and with the help of myriads of other workers, we are optimistic that this year's Formal will leave no one disappointed.

More Things

BY DAVE CAMERON

October is traditionally the transitional period in professional sports. The World Series marks the completion of the most oppressively long schedule of any sport. No comment on the Series is necessary here as it could well be over by the time this article hits the sports page. Pittsburgh's disaster area (formerly known as their pitching staff) may have already allowed the Oriole hitters to overwhelm the outfield with bouncing baseballs.

October also marks the beginning of the hockey season. This year's NHL results shouldn't provide any major surprises. Watch for the Montreal Canadiens, with their new rookie Guy whats-his-name, to make a big run at the Boston Bruins. The Bruins should win the Eastern Division, but if their forwards ever stop scoring watch out, because the defense is not good enough to take up the slack. If that situation occurs, both Montreal and New York will pass them. In the West, the Black Hawks will again be the team to beat. Minnesota and St. Louis should have a merry time fighting it out for second place.

Field Hockey Sweeps Exhibitions

Queen's took part in an exhibition Field Hockey tournament at Guelph on Oct. 2. The Seniors defeated Guelph 4-1; with Karen Carson scoring twice, and Marilyn Ennis and Fran Warrick putting in one each.

The Intermediates then took the field against McMaster and downed them on scores by Cathy Collins and an unidentified Alison.

In the final game, the Queen's Seniors swamped York 9-2. Marilyn and Karen counted for 4 and 3 points respectively, to give each a total of 5 for the tournament; Marg Gibson and Sue Stuart each also added a point.

Rugger Gaels Pound Mac 45-3

Saturday afternoon in the rain proved doubly gloomy for the McMaster Marauder Rugger Buggers as they went down to a crushing defeat at the hands (and feet) of Gavin Reid's Rugger Gaels. The Gaels' crisp tackling and offensive speed kept the less mobile Mac squad pinned in their own end throughout the match. Ron Easteal paced the winners with 24 points, on three penalty kicks, six converts, and a drop-goal, while Warren Smith had three tries for nine points.

The Rugger Gaels are undefeated this season, with a record of 5 and 0. Gavin's charges are away this weekend for an evening encounter with Guelph, with their next home game October 30 against Waterloo. Be there!

Some parting thoughts

After both U. of Alberta and Lutheran lost over the weekend a number of people have suggested that I might want to take this last chance to revise my earlier predictions. Well the answer is no! Since I'm fleeing the country anyway and won't even be here to answer for this column, I'm not only going to stick with those earlier statements but I'm also going to add a few:

1) Both the representatives from the Central and Western divisions will be eliminated in the O.U.A.A. playoffs. (The whole western section is just a collection of mediocre teams anyway and will be fighting it out to the end)
2) The W.I.C.A.A. team will wallop the winner of the Q.U.A.A. (we picked U. of A. over Bishop's)
3) The Bluenose winner will present few problems for the winner of the O.U.A.A. (we pick Queen's over St. Mary's)
4) Since the sections are relatively unchanged, U. of Ottawa won't win one single basketball game and Queen's will have to be extremely lucky to get a playoff spot.
5) In hockey, the teams in the western section will have to scramble for last as there is only one decent team in the entire western section. (Waterloo)
6) In the very strong eastern east section the Gaels should be able to get a berth possibly behind U. of T. Carleton and Laurentian. (yes, Laurentian: They do have a good hockey team)
7) Of course all these predictions are based on the traditional strengths of the university teams, and you can never tell when a team will appear from nowhere. (1970 Gaels hockey team). So, last prediction:
8) If you hang this article on your wall it could provide a whole year of laughs.

Soggy track hurts X-C

Steady rains and wind throughout Saturday's Cross Country Championships in Hamilton combined to turn the 7½ mile course into a treacherous bog. A large number of the 56 entrants in the Men's Senior race dropped out, while others, including Queen's best prospect Bill Hosegood, finished with minor injuries resulting from falls on the slippery turf.

Kip Sumner led all Queen's finishers in 15th spot, while Hosegood limped home 27th. All eight Queen's entrants finished the grueling event. Freshman Bill Bryden, competing in the Juvenile Men's division, finished 26th out of more than 100 entries.

Field hockey here Saturday

On Saturday Oct. 16 from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m. the Queen's Intermediate Field Hockey team will compete in a tournament against McMaster and U. of Toronto. The games will be played on the West Campus Outer Field. When the Queen's girls faced McMaster two weeks ago, they defeated them 2-0, but they have not played U. of T. yet. Action in Sunday's calm off R.M.C.

Sailors a distant second

Queen's sailors placed a distant second behind the defending champions, University of British Colombia, in the CIAU championships held at RMC October 9, 10, and 11. UBC collected 12¼ points under the Olympic-style scoring system, while Queen's skippers Bob Lewis and Eric Courtney finished with 34 points. Trent placed third and RMC fourth.

Saturday's competition over the Gold Cup course off RMC was interrupted by heavy winds gusting to 30 mph. The 420-class dinghys proved more tractable in the calmer seas of Sunday, but UBC had an insurmountable lead by that point.

CANADA

The published list of demands the United States will make upon Canada as a price for lifting the 10 per cent surtax on American imports was drawn up by the U.S. Treasury Department, The Star learned Sunday.

The list of demands, which shocked Canadian officials, was produced as a preliminary working paper in preparation for negotiations expected with Canada in the near future.

Canadian officials here called the demands "clearly unacceptable."

The list -- entitled Grievances Against Canada: Major Items — is the latest economic blow to hit Canada.

On Aug. 15 President Richard Nixon imposed a 10 per cent surtax on all dutiable American imports. Then last week he announced that American firms that manufactured their own "exports" at home, instead of their foreign subsidiaries, would receive a 7 per cent tax benefit.

The two measures, in effect, put Canadian exporters at a 17 per cent price disadvantage and involve $3 billion of Canadian goods sold in the U.S. annually.

Informed sources indicated in interviews that they regarded the list as a comprehensive summary of all available pressure-points that could be exploited in bargaining with Ottawa, rather than a firm American policy demand.

The list was leaked to the Chicago Tribune and contained 11 major items on which the U.S. could seek Canadian concessions:

— A rewritten auto pact that would allow all U.S.-made vehicles to enter Canada duty-free; increased Canadian defence purchases in the U.S.; and removal of preferential treatment for Canada under existing defence-production sharing agreements.

— Unilateral tariff cuts by Ottawa on manufactured goods; and an end to pressure on foreign companies to expand domestic production so as to reduce exports.

— Removal of limits on duty-free goods that Canadians can bring back from the U.S.: measures to end the exports of short-term capital to Europe while Canadians continue to raise huge long-term loans in the U.S.

— Elimination of tax-preference proposals that would give Canadian companies a better break than foreign-controlled firms; cancellation of embargoes on used cars and planes, and assurances that Canada will stop "playing off" the Lockheed Co. against other manufacturers in dealing in a new anti-submarine war-plane.

— Removal of incentives for the French rubber company Michelin to build a plant in Canada aimed mainly at exporting tires to the U.S.

— An end to the government's "buy Canadian" policy in government spending.

A program to create 41,800 jobs in Ontario this winter, at a cost of $93-million, was outlined by Premier William Davis Friday.

New Democratic Party Leader Stephen Lewis Monday promised up to 100,000 new jobs before Christmas if an NDP government is elected Oct. 21.

The Federal Court of Appeal ruled yesterday that the Indian Act discriminates against Jeannette Lavell because of her sex, and held that her name must be restored to the list of the Wikwemicong band.

In June Judge B. W. Grossberg dismissed Mrs. Lavell's appeal, holding that she lost no rights, because of her marriage to a non-Indian.

Mrs. Lavell objected to losing her Indian status and with it the right to take her 13-month-old son, Nimke, back to the Manitoulin Island reserve where her ancestors have lived since the War of 1812.

The judgment of the three-member Federal Court of Appeal, regarded as highly important, means that unless the Crown in the meantime seeks and is granted leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, Judge Grossberg must reopen the case and direct that Mrs. Lavell's name be restored to her band list.

Mrs. Lavell was removed from the band list in December, 1970 after her marriage the previous April.

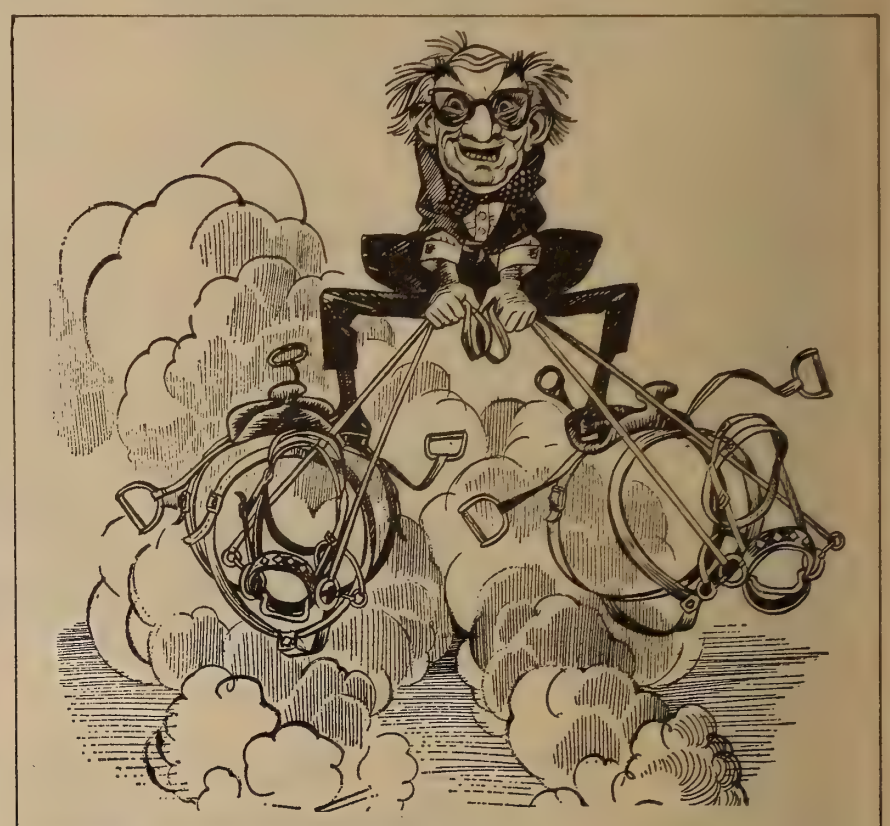
The Indian Act provides that an Indian male who marries a non-Indian retains his Indian status, but an Indian woman who marries a non-Indian not only cannot confer the status of an Indian on him, but also loses all her rights and privileges of an Indian under the Indian Act.

THE WORLD

U.S.A. — The week-long Newspaprer Food Editors' conference which closed in Chicago at the weekend reflected the growing concern of the food industry for the relatively new "disease" called consumerism, which is frequently discussed on the food pages.

Speaker after speaker (and there were more than 20 speeches given during the conference) proved that good news is no news, as the same defences were put up by every company executive no matter whether his firm's product had been under fire from consumer groups.

Instead of the usual razamataz of hard sell for new products, company spokesmen frequently put themselves in an adversary position against the press.



Hugh E. Muncy, president and chief executive officer of the Illinois Retail Merchants' association greeted the 155 food editors last Sunday by telling them that the American food press makes uniformed and vicious attacks against honest businessmen. He suggested that they spend more time looking for the good in business instead of ferreting out the bad.

LONDON — The world fleet lost 352 ships last year, the highest peacetime total for 50 years, Lloyd's Register of Shipping reports.

Eighty-nine of the ships were under the Japanese flag, including the largest vessel, the 34,000-ton ore carrier, California Maru.

It added that the ships lost last year included 140 that foundered and 63 that caught fire. Both are record figures.

Ships lost included 21 oil tankers, 29 per cent of the total tonnage lost, and 77 fishing craft.

Joey Smallwood has called a Newfoundland election for Oct. 28 and says he will run with one foot on his past record and one foot on his future accomplishments.

War Measures Act Proclaimed

MORE THAN 3,000 MONTREAL STUDENTS RALLIED THURSDAY IN SUPPORT OF FLQ —CP Wirephoto

BULLETIN

Prime Minister Trudeau tabled the War Measures Act regulations shortly after 11 a.m. and immediately moved for an emergency debate on the regulations. The move was unprecedented in Canadian peacetime history.

The major decision in his announcement was that the FLQ was an outlaw political organization and police were given the power to arrest any person suspected of being a member of or being connected with the FLQ.

OTTAWA (CP)—Prime Minister Trudeau today turned the powerful War Measures Act against Quebec terrorists, using the measure for the first time in Canada's peacetime history.

The proclamation at the extraordinary hour of 4 a.m. EDT followed full consultation with Quebec authorities and touched off a wave of arrests there in a desperate bid to find and free British envoy James Cross and Quebec Labor Minister Pierre Laporte kidnapped by the Front du Liberation de Quebec.

It followed late-night consultation by the prime minister with leaders of the other political parties in the House of Commons.

The act has been used only twice previously—at the start of the First and Second World Wars. Its use for coping with the situation in Quebec was announced at 5:15 a.m. by spokesmen for the prime minister to sleepy reporters summoned for the event.

(Other stories and pictures dealing with the Quebec crisis appear on pages 2, 3, 19 and 22 today in The Whig-Standard.)

The timing of the move was attributed to absence of response of the FLQ to respond to a 3 a.m. deadline set by Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa in a last offer to the kidnappers.

The Quebec government's final offer was to buy the lives of the two kidnap hostages by recommending parole for five criminals and granting safe conduct out of Canada for the kidnappers.

The act is emergency legislation that allows the government to proclaim arbitrarily that there is a state of "war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended."

It can punish those who break its regulations with any combination of fines up to $5,000 and five years imprisonment. Even after the emergency is declared over, sentences under the act continue in full.

The spokesman said the gov-

Ryan:

May be living in police state

By ROBERT TAYLOR
Staff Reporter

Canadians face the prospect today of li... virtual police state, if the full power of t... Measures Act is invoked.

Professor Stuart Ryan of Queen's Univer... faculty of law, said in an interview today that ... application of the act and its potential regulat... "could mean outright abrogation of all our c... rights."

Asked what the Act might mean to the average Canadian, Prof. Ryan said it all depends on what regulations the government attaches to it later today, but added: "Here is the worst that could happen, as I see it."

—He said the police could be given unlimited power to arrest anyone at anytime "without showing any cause as to why that person is being arrested".

—Any person so apprehended, he said, "can be held indefinitely" and "without bail".

—An appeal for bail would probably have to be directed to the federal minister of justice, who could refuse the application without saying why.

—"Canadians could lose all the protections now afforded and offered by common law and the Bill of Rights."

—Persons apprehended may be held in a jail or in a concentration camp, similar to World War Two operations when the Act was last proclaimed.

—Prof. Ryan said that even though a person is not aware of the Act being invoked or aware of having breached any of its regulations "he can still be arrested and detained".

Prof. Ryan said he would imagine the Act will be put into effect across Canada and not just in Quebec, since it is a federal law.

He said any of the measures he mentioned could be put into effect or anything else the government deemed necessary to put the FLQ situation under control.

Police raids across Quebec

MONTREAL (CP) — Police pounced on hundreds of known Quebec separatists, sympathizers and others in raids across the province early today, hours after the federal War Measures Act was invoked.

A Quebec Provincial Police spokesman said 140 persons were arrested in Montreal, 52 in Quebec City, 20 in Rimouski and 11 in Chicoutimi.

Search warrants had been issued for others wanted in connection with events arising out of the kidnappings last week of British envoy James (Jasper) Cross and Quebec Minister Pierre Laporte.

A member of the Montreal combined anti-terrorist squad confirmed that labor leader Michel Chartrand and well-known separatists Charles Gagnon, Pierre Vallieres and Jacques Larue-Langlois had been detained.

Police would not say why the four men were picked up or if any charges had been laid.

An anti-terrorist squad officer said "a team of prosecutors" is busy preparing charges in connection with the detentions.

Two Montreal French-language radio stations—CKAC and CKVL—broadcast reports that Robert Lemieux, who had acted as mediator for the kidnappers in negotiations with the government for release of the two hostages, had been detained by Quebec Provincial Police.

The switchboard operator at the Hotel Nelson, where M... Lemieux lives, said the young lawyer was escorted from the hotel overnight by the QPP.

Mr. Lemieux abandoned talks with Robert Demers, the government's negotiator, Thursday night after the government made its final offer: It would recommend that five convicted terrorists be released on parole.

Chartrand, Gagnon and Lemieux spoke to a rally Thursday night at which students voiced approval of the political aims of the separatist-terrorist Front de Liberation du Quebec, responsible for the two kidnappings.

Chartrand is the outspoken leader of the 67,000-member Montreal central council of the Confederation of National Trade Unions.

Gagnon and Vallieres both

Searle, Boag are senators

Stewart Searle and Ian Boag were elected student representatives to the university senate in very light voting Wednesday.

Stewart Searle

Total turnout in arts and science was 416, chief returning officer Doug Donald announced. Searle received 200 votes; Philip Brown was second with 113 and Rob McKnight had 103.

Searle, filling the balance of an unexpired term on the senate, joins Paul Burke, Trisha Jackson and Doug Vallery representing arts and science.

Arts and science turnout was about 10 per cent of the electorate; in graduate studies it was just over five per cent, with 52 votes cast. Boag received 31 votes; Mike Williams had 21.

Boag joins Tim Garrard as graduate student senator.

Both Searle and Boag will serve until September 1, 1972.

The senate is the chief governing body of Queen's University.

Meeting on tenure announced by AMS

The Alma Mater Society has announced that a conference and symposium on tenure will take place at Queen's October 23.

Student leaders from many other Ontario universities will attend, and Queen's students are also invited.

The Tenure conference is the Queen's contribution to a series of inter-university conferences which have been held by student leaders around Ontario since early summer. Queen's delegates have gone to conferences about student aid, undergraduate curriculum, and other matters which concern all universities.

Tenure -- the system by which, after a probationary period, a professor is guaranteed his position and cannot be removed -- is becoming controversial in Canadian universities, according to AMS president Patrick Riley.

He said the subjects to be discussed at the one-day conference would be as follows:

Tenure in principle and practice: What is tenure? What is the present impact of tenure policy on Ontario universities? Is tenure effective for the intended purposes? If not, why not?

Teaching standards: Is this the crux of the tenure issue? How should we establish standard for the profession? How should standards be applied or implemented? What is the role of teacher training?

Tenure and personnel procedures: How should personnel decisions be reached? What are the roles of faculty, students and course evaluations? What is the impact of the budget on personnel decisions? How do we implement reduction or discontinuance of programmes on budgetary grounds?

Alternatives to tenure: What ars the advantages and disadvantages of alternatives? These could include one-year contracts; five-year contracts; the personnel practices of the civil service; the personnel practices of organized labour.

The tenure conference runs from 9:00 to 5:30 on Saturday, October 23, in the conference room of McArthur Hall.

Students can give to United Fund

The 1971 United Fund drive begins at Queen's Sunday.

Student participation in the campaign is coordinated by Chris Dundas, external affairs commissioner for the Alma Mater Society.

Boxes will be placed in the Union, the library, Leonard Hall and Ban Righ Hall for student contributions.

During the week, volunteers will go door-to-door in the residences and in nearby apartments asking for contributions. A concert is also planned with proceeds going to the fund, Dundas said.

He said there is no specific target for the student part of the drive. It is one segment of the Kingston and district United Fund drive, which aims to raise $275,000 in the present campaign.

Blues join Gaels in Homecoming celebrations

There will be two parades tomorrow, Saturday of Homecoming Week.

And in one of them, the Queen's Bands will be joined by the Varsity Blues Band from the University of Toronto.

The Queen's Golden Gaels play Varsity at Richardson Stadium beginning at 2 p.m.

The homecoming parade starts at 10:00 tomorrow morning, and will be led by both the Queen's brass band and the Blues band, according to Queen's bands manager Doug Romans.

The parade will include floats, which are to assemble at 9:30 a.m., as well as the bands. Students at large will follow.

The parade begins from Leonard Field and will go up University Avenue, via Union Street and through downtown to Bagot Street and back to the campus along Bagot through City Park.

Another parade, following the usual route from Leonard Field up Albert Street, will leave the central campus at 1:00 p.m. for the west campus and stadium.

Students will be joined in the parade and at the game by alumni returning to Queen's for reunion weekend, organized by the alumni association.

Saturday evening is the homecoming semi-formal, Noch Nik, in Grant and Kingston Halls.

Homecoming events are sponsored by the Alma Mater Society through the homecoming committee and the Queen's Bands.

Candidates will talk

The candidates from Kingston and The Islands in next week's provincial election have agreed to meet in a closed panel discussion sponsored by three Queen's ecological organizations.

Zero Population Growth, Survival, and Pollution Probe are cooperating in sponsoring the discussion, which will be taped for broadcast on CKWS television or the Queen's radio station, CFRC.

Dr. R. Harmsen, Queen's biology professor and spokesman for ZPG, said the purpose of the programme is to acquaint students with the local candidates and the issues in Thursday's election.

Harmsen, Allaine Armstrong of Pollution Probe, and Dr. Gordon Edwards of Survival will take part in the panel discussion, which is to be taped tomorrow.

The candidates in this riding are the incumbent, Syl Apps, Jr. (Progressive Conservative); Dr. John Hazlett (Liberal); and Mrs. Mary Lloyd-Jones: New Democratic).

Women will vote on coed residence

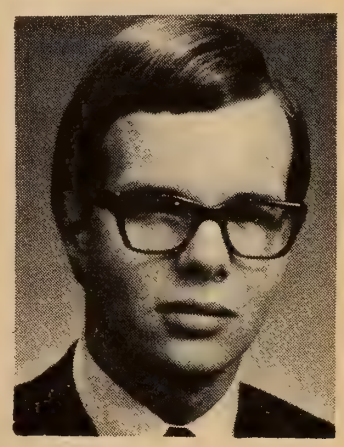
Students in women's residence will be asked to vote on adoption of a proposal for integrated residences, Victoria Hall (ABC) block chairman Joan Delavigne said Tuesday night.

She is one of two Women's Residence Council representatives on the study committee which is working out a coed residence proposal. That committee met Wednesday night to consider the details of a proposal, drafted by committee chairman Doug Romans, to make Victoria Hall coed next year and turn Gordon House and Brockington House into women's residences.

Under Roman's plan, the 360 places in Gordon-Brockington would be filled by women, and this would make 360 places in Vic available for men. They would be assigned in the proportion of 221 freshmen, mostly in double rooms, and 139 upperclassmen in singles.

The apartments in the basement of Gordon-Brockington would be occupied by female dons and by the business administrator of women's residences.

Victoria Hall would have a married warden, living in the apartment on 2C and eleven dons six male and five female.



The Romans proposal recommends that integration be on a "room and room about" basis -- that males and females be in alternate rooms.

At other Canadian universities where coed residences have been tried, the report says, "it was found that a separate floors, that is stratified, integration style was artificial, and seemed to perpetuate the feeling of distinct sectors for the two sexes."

It continues, "Individual privacy could be maintained to a reasonable and acceptable extent, especially with the individual type of washroom facilities to be found in Victoria Hall, while the moderating influences of one sex on the other could be maximized, with a room and room about method of coeducational living."

Under the Victoria-Gordon-Brockington scheme, about forty per cent of students in residence would be involved in integrated living.

In a poll last week, 47 per cent of freshettes said they would have chosen to live in an integrated residence this year if it had existed. And 76 per cent of those freshettes said they would choose integrated residence for their second year if they could Freshmen said yes even more strongly: 62 per cent for first year and 86 per cent for second year.

Doug Romans

About three-fifths of residence-dwellers voted in that poll, which was advisory, not binding on residence government.

The proposal will go to Women's Residence Council on Monday and to Inter-Residence Council on Wednesday. After those bodies consider the details, coed residences will go to referendum and eventually, if approved there, will be considered by the residence governing boards.

Romans said his proposal should be able to be in effect by September 1972 if it is approved.

Sceptical engineer to visit Queen's

A mechanical engineer who is suspicious of technology will speak at Queen's October 22, sponsored by Survival.

He is Dr. Victor Paschkis, professor emeritus of mechanical engineering at Columbia University.

Engineering technology has to be sharply limited and carefully controlled if man is to survive, Paschkis says. "If the world consumed at the same per capita rate as the United States, the known reserves of many critical materials would give out within a very short time -- even if population growth ceased now." he said in a recent paper titled "Assessment -- By Whom, For Whom?"

Paschkis continued "We must have a crash programme to convert technology from the mushrooming production of unnecessary trivia for the prosperous, to the rpoduction of necessities for the poor.

"Simultaneously, we must change technological practices which ruin the environment. Such changes, as difficult as they are essential, are difficult because they require a new life style."

In his paper, Paschkis said engineering projects should be scrutinized by impartial boards to eliminate wasteful industry and minimize the environmental impact of projects which are necessary.

He admitted this would take time, cost money, and slow progress, but insisted that there is no alternative and that such a slowdown should be welcomed as "a blessed relief from the muddle we have got ourselves into".

He continued, "No administrator undertakes a project until two reports are on hand: one dealing with the technological, scientific aspects of the project, and one dealing with the economic aspects. Assessment would require a third study of social aspects and secondary effects.

"Both because of the complexity of modern technology and because of the limited knowledge of science, there may be many cases where secondary effects cannot be predicted without long and careful study. It appears advisable to have the general rule: 'When in doubt, err in the direction of too much, rather than too little, caution; go slow!"

Paschkis will come to Queen's after visiting the University of Guelph, where he will lecture on "Social Responsibility of Academics" and on "Technology: Friend of Foe" and will meet with a group of engineers and physicists, a group of biologists and agricultural scientists, and a group of town planners.

Survival is sponsoring a public discussion with Paschkis in Dupuis Hall auditorium at 8:30 on October 22. A statement from Survival said engineering students and faculty "who are concerned about the future of their profession" were especially invited but that people from all disciplines were welcome to contribute their observations.

Faculty board discusses how to choose heads

Students' voice in the choosing of department heads will come under fire again this afternoon when the arts and science faculty board meets to hear the recommendations of two of its committees.

The faculty board sent the matter to committee in the spring after arts and science professors persuaded the university senate -- the body which ranks above the faculty board -- to suspend action and allow faculty boards to talk about how department heads should be chosen.

The controversial question is whether students should sit on the committee which recommends a new department head to the dean of the faculty which includes that department.

The policy originally approved by the senate said they should. But some professors objected and asked that the principle be given more detailed consideration in faculty boards and their committees.

Two of the arts and science committee will recommend to faculty board that the original policy should be approved only with specific qualifications.

One committee which consists of the present department heads says that if students are to be members of "search committees" (the committees which search for candidates for a position) they should be chosen from a larger list of student names presented by the departmental student council or other representative student group.

The committee on procedures will recommend another amendment: that when anyone is asked for his opinion on the selection of a department head, he should be allowed to insist that his written opinion be restricted to only the faculty members, or only the students, who are on the search committee.

This would allow a faculty member who is suspicious of student involvement to make comments for the benefit of the faculty only, and would permit a student to make confidential comments to the students on the search committee if he wanted to do so.

After considering these suggested amendments, the faculty board will be asked to approve the policy.

Bookstore prices are lowest at Queen's

by Pat Muldoon

Tech Supplies, the Queen's bookstore, has lower prices than almost any other Canadian bookstore, a senate task force has decided.

The task force, set up by the university senate last spring, spent the summer studying Tech Supplies and surveying college bookstores across Canada.

Questionnaires were sent to about 130 Queen's students living in cities across Canada. They were returned with information about 21 major Canadian universities' bookstores.

Nancy Hoey

Mainly the survey was to compare prices on thirteen specific books, and to give the bookstores' policies on supplementary books, light reading, gifts, second-hand books, cheque cashing, book return and so on.

Tech Supplies had the lowest prices, the results showed, on all but five of the items. On three of those the lowest price was only a few cents lower than what Tech Supplies charges, and one of the differences was the result of a difference in the edition of the book.

Queen's is unlike most other campuses in not having city bookstores near by to compete with the university bookstore, according to Nancy Hoey, vice-president of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society, who was secretary for the committee during the summer.

But, compensating for its monopoly location on the campus, Tech Supplies has a restriction in its charter which keeps it from competition with Kingston merchants, the engineering newspaper, Golden Words, said last week.

Tech Supplies is owned by Queen's University Engineering Society Serivces Incorporated (QUESSI), a subsidiary of the Engineering Society. Despite popular belief that QUESSI is rich (it owns Clark Hall), it did not make a profit last financial year, Golden Words said. GW said QUESSI voluntarily opened its financial records to make this point.

Presently housed in Clark Hall, the bookstore will move into the planned new university centre when that building is ready. The move will mean an increase in space for Tech Supplies, to about 21,000 square feet from the present 8,000, Miss Hoey said.

Moving to the university centre might mean that Tech Supplies would have to pay commercial rent, however, she said, and this could mean an increase of about seven per cent in textbook prices.

Non-textbook items, such as gifts and supplementary books, provide a larger profit than textbooks Miss Hoey said, and any profits which come from their sale will be used to lower textbook prices. There will be more peripheral items -- gifts stationary and books -- when the bookstore gets its extra space, she said.

The task force is continuing its study of bookstore facilities. When it was established in the spring, at the urging of the sociology departmental student council and the arts and science faculty board, one suggestion was that the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society operate a bookstore, either competing with Tech Supplies or supplementing it, in the new arts-social sciences complex.

But the ASUS executive turned that idea down.

An undergraduate commerce class is now conducting a survey of student attitudes toward bookstore facilities. The results of that survey will be considered before the task force formally reports, Miss Hoey said.

An interim report from the task force, which is headed by student senator Tim Garrard, will be brought to the university senate at its December meeting. That report will include details on Tech Supplies prices, as compared with costs and with other university bookstores, and will make recommendations for future bookstore policy at Queen's.

Queen's publishes a handbook

The university handbook, produced for the first time this summer, will be published again for 1972, the registrars office says.

The yellow-covered book was mailed to incoming freshmen along with the faculty calendar, and used to explain Queen's to high school students and other potential arrivals who did not need the detailed course descriptions available in the calendar.

It contains, besides general information about the university and its academic and extracurricular offerings, a description of each department and what it does.

The Handbook was intended to replace the parts of the faculty calendars which contain general information and, in many cases, are duplicated in the calendars for arts and science, applied science, commerce sometimes several other faculties.

Instead of an armful of calendars, a high school guidance office should be able to make do with the Handbook and a pamphlet on Queen's admission regulations, according to the editor of the Handbook, assistant registrar Lloyd Davies.

It will save the university money on both printing and postage, Davies said.

The 1971 handbook was ready early in the summer. Distribution was delayed, however; only first-year students with confirmed admission got the book until mid-September. Staff in the registrar's office were patiently pasting tiny slips onto page 3 of the book, where the word "Foreword" had been misprinted in thousands of handbooks as "Forward".

The 1972 handbook is to be ready for distribution early in the new year.

Professor's trial set

Queen's law professor Keith Latta will come to trial December 13 in Edmonton, charged with non-capital murder.

Latta, 43, is charged with killing his former business partner, Edmonton travel agent Robert Neville, who was found shot in his Edmonton office June 13.

Latta was arrested in Kingston June 20 by Edmonton police.

He was to have stood trial before the Alberta Supreme Court next spring, but the trial was set for the winter sittings at his arraingment Tuesday.

He was free on $25,000 cash bail before the preliminary hearing in June, but Alberta supreme court judge Mr. Justice M. E. Manning denied bail after a judge found there was sufficient evidence that Latta should stand trial.

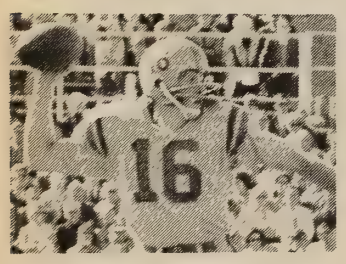
Varsity's Not Invincible...

From this writer's point of view, Saturday's classic encounter between the Varsity Blues and Queen's Golden Gaels should be a fine game to watch. The Gaels boast the league's best running attack, with Warrender, McLellan and Hadden ranking 1-2-3 in rushing. In addition quarterback Tom Taylor has a real deep threat in flanker Stu Lang. On the other hand, Varsity puts the ball in the air. Frequently QB Wayne Dunkley has a fine arm, and split end John Chapman may be the best in the league. But Toronto's running game, weakened by injuries to Cor Doret and Bob Morrow, was less than impressive against Carleton last Friday night.

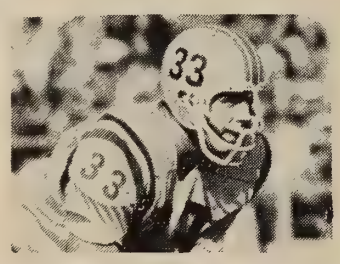
There are other factors to be considered. Normally a homecoming crowd would give the Gaels an edge in psych factor, but Varsity has its back to the wall. The Blues must win both games to take the Capitol Divison title, while the Gaels need only (hah) a split. Needless to say, Queen's would prefer to finish the whole affair right here.

Injuries could be another factor. The Gaels are healthy on offense, where centre Jim Murphy returns after a one-week absence, and healing on defense, with Lambros, Sherritt, Devonshire, and Thompson almost back to their normal levels of efficiency. Toronto has several problems, most notably Wayne Dunkley, with a chronic right ankle. Carleton aggravated this injury last Friday, and the Blues don't move the ball at all without him. Also out are halfback Cor Doret and deep back Peter MacNabb.



Finally, there is the weather. The Gaels can run, wet or dry, but passing teams have problems in the rain, and Toronto does like to throw. So, if the winter (fall?) monsoon breaks over Richardson on Saturday, look for trench warfare in the mud, with Queen's having a decided margin; otherwise, it could be close, but the Gaels will probably win. The probable lineup looks like this:

Tom Taylor (16) will start at QB, with Warrender (23), McLellan (21) and Hadden (27) as his running backs. Stu Lang (30) will be flanker, with Alex Mevin (73) and John Hollingsworth at the ends. From tackle to tackle, the offensive line will be Dave Whiteside (67), Don Gordon (53), Jim Murphy (50), Al Dresser (69) and Joe Visocchi (64). Tom Dickinson (40) may see action at centre, and Bruce Potter (61) at tackle. John Booth (28) works behind Warrender and McLellan, while Raold Serebrin is the backup quarterback.



On defense, the situation is not as clear-cut. The probable starters are John Waddell (71) and Brett Biggs (76) at defensive end, Jim Sherritt (77) and Don Smith (65) at tackle, with big Brian Rose (59) and Bill Thompson (79) as the backup men. Linebackers are Mike Lambros (33), who also punts, Paul Hand and Dave Blair (29). Paul Manske (22) and Peter Sabiston (55) are the likely reserves. The deep five are Joe Pal (24) and Dave Campbell (39) at the corners, Doug Cozac (15) and Brian Casey (25) at the halves, and Jay Graydon (37) at safety. Cozac also does the placekicking. Alex Morris (38), a good rookie from Ottawa, also sees considerable action as a defensive back.

Of course, the final edge may come from the "old man" himself . . . Frank Tindall is one of the cagiest head coaches in Canadian football, and an expert at exploiting the weaknesses of opposing teams. So are assistants Hal McCarney, Bill Miklas and Doug Hargreaves. Toronto, based on past records, does get outcoached at times. This is probably one of them.

Once again, Queen's sky divers will be making an exhibition jump into centre field before the kickoff in Saturday's Homecoming Game. Jo Chow, the club safety officer and a veteran of over 600 jumps, will be joined by Ken Sommerfeld, a freshman with over 200 jumps and Jon LovettDoust, another 200-jump man, in this demonstration of landing accuracy. These three are also involved in the Sport Parachute Club's training program. Anyone interested should come to the Brockington Common Room at 7:00 p.m. on Monday, Oct. for further information.

Backs to the wall

Having trounced Ottawa, 8-1, and disposed of Trent with equal ease, 4-1, the Soccer Gaels now face that deciding rematch, this Saturday at 3 p.m. on the West Campus, with Carleton, who squeaked past them, 1-0, in their first encounter. While the football team may be hoping to take the first of two opportunities to sew up first place in its division, the soccer team will be fighting tooth and nail for the supremacy they have held in theirs for the past two years. It is a game that should be well worth watching.

Wednesday's game started with a scare with goalie Flood losing sight of a high shot in the floodlights to give Trent the opening goal. An equally unfortunate error by Trent equalled the score and two minutes later Stan Taylor shot a 55 yarder that skidded on wet ground and popped over the goalie's head. Gord Taylor added another and Drysdale finished it off with his second.

Theatre 5 Back Again

By Diane Gordon

Theatre 5 was established by Gordon Robertson and four other Kingston people to investigate the possibilities for semi-professional theatre at the Grand Theatre in 1965. Since that time the company has grown into one of the most versatile groups in the province. Three years ago the company made a definite decision to build a central core of actors that could perform in a wide variety of roles and styles.

The underlying philosophy of the group is one that sees drama as an art form and the actor an artist who through the development of his native artistic skills is continually growing in his art. In order to give their actors as challenging a job as possible, they choose from a wide variety of material and in so doing, hope to satisfy the theatre-going public.

After a successful summer season at the Grand, Theatre 5 plans to open its Fall-Winter season with THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST by Oscar Wilde, which will run October 21, 22, 23. THE HOMECOMING by Harold Pinter will be next and it will run October 28, 29, 30.

Because both of these plays were so well-received by summer audiences they feel that they will add a great deal to their new season. The other plays to be included in their new season are ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN ARE DEAD by Tom Stoppard, An Anthology from the works of well-known Kingston writers, and PRIVATE LIVES by Noel Coward and a modern classic of particular interest to students. (possibly THE GLASS MENAGERIE by Tennessee Williams).

One of the extras that Theatre 5 offers its audience is the opportunity to discuss the play and or production either directly after the performance or at some other mutually convenient time. This is of particular value to students who are studying Drama or English; anyone wishing to make such an arrangement should call Diane Gordon at 389-0465. Also of interest to students is the fact that group rates are available (for more than twenty, the cost is $1.00 each).

All productions begin at 8:30 p.m.

"All Over" by Albee

By SANDY NAIMAN

The second in the Queen's Drama Department's "Sunday at Eight" series featured a reading of Edward Albee's most recent play, "All Over", on October 10th, in Convocation Hall. Fred Euringer, head of the department, explained prior to the reading that plays presented in this series would be those which one would not be likely to see anywhere else or for several years. "All Over" was panned on Broadway last season and closed after just one week.

Mr. Euringer explained that these readings demand an extra element of imagination and audience participation since they are not staged like the full scale productions one is accustomed to seeing with costumes, makeup and sets. Instead the stage directions are read and the characters throughought the play regroup themselves to establish variations in character relationships.

Last night's reading showed Albee's play to be a dynamic exploration of the interpersonal workings of a family surrounding the illness and subsequent death of its head. A mistress, a best friend, a doctor and a nurse enter into the machinery of the family to catalogue not only an evening but fifty years of entanglements with the unseen hero. Albee's play is not one of overt action, but character development, deterioration and ultimate destructiveness. The reading had sparkling life, and did not fall into the mundane rhythmical low key, which its characters, most of whom are in their seventies, may have allowed, perhaps to capture the illusion of reality. The reality was there, however, because it exists not in the oldness of the characters but in their feelings about themselves and each other.

Albee's characteristic quasi-soliloquy was ever present in his latest rendering, the rhythm of his language, and the poetry of it, meeting out the emotions of the audience and the actors alike.

The medium of last night's dramatic presentation, because of its sparseness, forced the audience to concentrate and conjure up its own images of how things would look. The tension of the play coupled with this atmosphere made the reading both an exciting and exhausting exercise for everyone.

Last night's reading featured Sheila Dobson, Moe Bock, Gearge Baszta, Barbara Aylesworth, Fred Euringer, Norma Edwards and Carolyn Heatherington.

On October 24th, Leroi Jones' "Dutchman" will be read. Further information concerning "Sundays at Eight" can be secured in the Drama Office.

Quebec – an introduction

There are some things which are too important to let slip out of your mind in spite of the pressures of new events and new issues which seem to press for so much of our thinking time. The Quebec crisis, which began with the invocation of the War Measures Act last October 16, is one of those things.

A CBC study of the event, shown a week ago, concluded that people, in both English and French Canada, seem to be acting as if the events of last fall had never happened. They tried to explain this on one of two grounds; either the kidnappings and the use of extraordinary police and governmental powers was an aberration, an event totally unrelated to the mainstream of Canadian life, in which case it did not deserve much thought, or else the events served to point out too clearly the central aspects of Canadian life but the truth thus bared was too immediate and too unbearable for people to, at least yet, contemplate.

It seems more likely that it is the latter case, and for just that reason what happened last fall deserves critical attention (and seems to be getting it, judging by the number of books which have been written on Quebec and the October crisis in the last twelve months.)

Two things in particular emerged from the crisis. The first is the nature of the present federal government under Pierre Trudeau and the other is the opportunity which was forced on English Canada to look at Quebec and to re-examine basic assumptions about the Canadian federal state.

Trudeau and his government deserve attention because in many ways the crisis was of Trudeau's making. The suspension of civil liberties and the mass arrests in the early morning of October 16 may well have pushed the Chenier Cell into the murder of Pierre Laporte and certainly the 6½ month period of suspended civil liberties represented a threat to Canadian democracy at least as dangerous as the threat posed by the few members of the FLQ who have resorted to kidnapping or bombing.

The article beginning on page 9 examines the man who made the decision to invoke the Act and the consistency of his political philosophy which led him to such a decision. So many other writers have commented on Trudeau's consistency of thought and action that it seems likely that the type of threat he posed last year may well surface again in what he regards as a crisis. Moreover, his unyielding nature and his absolute adherence to federalism make it appear unlikely that a successful solution to the Quebec "problem" will be reached, at least if successful is taken to mean that Quebec stays in Canada (as most English Canadian would probably view it.)

The lack of understanding of Quebec by English Canadians could also serve to convince Quebeckers that they should separate. The articles starting on page 12 attempt to outline how Quebeckers view English Canada to allow at least some understanding.

Page 12 and 13 outline the type of activities being engaged in by Quebec nationalists now and since the crisis. The next article (page 15-18) presents an outline of the Quebec economic situation to put the Quebec nationalist fervour of recent years in some kind of focus.

FEEDBACK

letters to the editors

Rah! Rah!

Dear Editors:

We thing that the Queen's Journal can do much better in exhorting Queen's students to new heights in the activity for which they have become renowned during out-of-town football weekends. Dashing Queen's blades have already acquired well-earned reputations of proficiency for the jobs they have done on both the Lord Simcoe and King Edward Hotels. But this still ealves major targets such as the Westbury, Royal York and Park Plaza uncracked. In every room are colour television sets and expensive furniture galore simply begging to be hurled out of tenth-storey windows by by tipsy roistering gallants from old Queen's. (Oil thigh na banriggin! Shag Heil!)

But in the light of past successes and in the contemplation of pinnacles of glorious rowdyism still to be achieved, what does the Journal do? In an unsigned articel (we therefore assume it to be editorial policy), "Follow the Gaels to York", on the excuse that "York" is not really a major away week-end", after unfortunately rejecting the concept of a mass rally in Yorkville, it merely suggests that "a Saturday night celebration at the Speak Easy could provide a temporary disturbance". A temporary Disturbance!! We cannot brook this meagre justification of even the slightest of temperance in the exhibition of traditional Queen's enthusiasm and feel that this erosive spirit represents a regrettable depreciation of the former virility of Queen's maledom.

We certainly hope that the Journal will not continue to encourage the furtherance of this slackening of fibre, no matter how slight it may be. When first the walls begin to crack, then soon the house comes tumbling down.

CFRC

Dear Editors:

Regarding your article in Tuesday's edition (Oct. 5) of the Journal of CFRC, may we clarify the situation as to who owns and runs the radio station.

CFRC Queensradio, is owned and the licence held by Queen's University. It is, however, operated by the CFRC Student Radio Club under the direction of the full-time Station Manager.

The licensing problem, which may have caused some of the confusion referred to in your article is another matter. The Secretary of State has stated that agencies of a provincial government may not hold broadcast licences. Queen's University is defined under previous federal-provincial arrangements as being an agency of the government of Ontario (even though it is a royally chartered university).

Therefore after March 31, 1972, unless an extension of the present licence is given. a new licensee, which may be affiliated with Queen's University, will have to be found. This means that a corporation may be set up which will be in some sense independent of the university, but which will operate within a framework similar to the existing one.

The problems attendant upon the creation of this corporation and its functions are under study at present.

In other words, despite any alterations to the licence, we forsee no substantial change in our role as a student radio station.

— Paul D. Barron, Secretary
CFRC Student Radio Club

(News Ed Notes: We were aware of the new CRTC regulation which prohibits universities from owning radio stations, so we sent a reporter to ask station manager Andrew Marshall who now owns it and he refused to say anything about it. By the way, we got the station phone number wrong -- it should be 547-6677.)

Not so much the FLQ as the White Paper

If the government could afford to pay all the extra police and soldiers during the October crisis, one caller asked Prime Minister Trudeau on a province-wide open-line radio program in Quebec in December, why couldn't it afford to help people in lamentable circumstances?

The PM replied that the living conditions of the people depend largely on capital investments made in Quebec. But the events of October and similar disturbances had scared investment away from the province.

"The fall of investments has been many times greater than than the extra expenses needed to pay policemen overtime" Trudeau said. "Don't blame the police for poor living conditions. Blame the FLQ whose activities have caused investments to fall."

That's the common wisdom of the federal and Quebec governments, but recent statements by a leading American expert on US investment in Canada suggests a much different tale: many US corporations remain less perturbed about kidnappings and deaths than about Benson's white paper.

John B. Dempsey, president of the Canadian Enterprise Corporation, a holding company, and also publisher of a widely-read bi-weekly newsletter designed to inform US executives on the Canadian investment situation, noted that "several of the Americans interviewed by me (for the newsletter) stated, in one way or another, that they hoped Mr. Trudeau would deal with the white paper on tax reform in as objective a manner as he has the Quebec situation.

"In terms of Canada as a whole, its attraction as an area of investment opportunity remains threatened by the continuing uncertainties over the white paper."

On a CBC radio program Mr. Dempsey reported that a poll he conducted of business leaders demonstrates they have been unshaken by the events in Quebec, and in fact, "the confidence of some has increased" because of government action. He remarked in the same broadcast last October that "it boils down to one line -- the degree of safety of money." and that has not been lessened.

Soon afterwards, he revealed elsewhere that ". . . the chairman of Hanna Mining assured me that Premier Bourassa's position on the mining aspects of the white paper, which had the effect of triggering Mr. Benson's substantial modifications of the original text in turn enabled Hanna to announce its $200 million expansion in Quebec. The premier himself assured the Hanna people that he would deal sternly with Quebec terrorists, which action has subsequently been implemented, and hence the basis for that company's confidence in the future of the province."

The War Measures Act and the Politics of Functionalism or Pierre E. Trudeau, the same yesterday, today and forever

By Fred Caloren

The attitude of the government reflected in the War Measures Act is not a departure, temporary but necessary, from the policy of a regime which claims to be based on the ultimate worth of individual. Nor does it represent an aberration on the part of the Prime Minister, of whom so many said he was good on individual liberties if doubtful on collective rights. Nor does it repose, as the people will inevitably come to realize, on the inside knowledge of a Quebecker or the special information of police intelligence close to the scene. The position of the government which finally expressed itself in the War Measures Act is not a deviation from the current brand of liberal politics. The action is of a piece with the theory and practice of politics enunciated long ago by Pierre Trudeau and some of his closest collaborators.

In May, 1964, Trudeau, Marc Lalonde (Trudeau's principal secretary and chief of his staff) and others signed a Manifesto For A Functional Politics. A year later, a further essay appeared on Agriculture in Quebec. In June, 1964, Trudeau presented a paper to the Royal Society of Canada in which he wrote,

"There is some hope that in advanced societies, the glue of nationalism will become as obsolete as the divine right of kings, the title of the state to govern and the extent of its authority will be conditional upon rational justification; a people's consensus based on reason will supply the cohesive force that societies require; and politics both within and without the state will follow a much more functional approach to the problems of government. If politicians must bring emotions into the act, let them get emotional about functionalism!"

This advocacy of functionalism in the sixties was but the continuation and refinement of the Cite Libre struggle of the fifties against Duplessis. That combat was essentially a quest for efficient and rational liberal democracy against the arbitrary, incompetent, corrupt and personalized regime which made a lot of mileage out of gut nationalism.

The political theory of functionalism is found clearly and rigorously set forth in most of the major writings of Pierre E. Trudeau.

It consists first of a vision of society as essentially an operating system. Government, industry, education, culture, and economic life are all seen as parts of the whole, sub-systems in their own operation, just as spark plugs and carburetors fit together into the system which is a car engine.

The main concern is not with the parts, isolated in themselves, but in their movement and interrelationships, and thus the conception suits particularly well a world of rapid change. It is the operation, the functioning of the system which is important. The systems-operational analysis allows the policy maker to come up with the optimum possible provision for the smooth running of the society, the state, the economy or whatever.

The emphasis is on making the system run, and the authors of the functionalist Manifesto add, "If we wish to make this country run, it is necessary at all costs to preserve and develop federalism."

Built upon this vision of society as a system, the functionalist claims also to have the surest grasp on reality itself. As Trudeau wrote, "The first law of politics is to start from things as they are given. The second is to take account of the real relationship of the forces which stand against or link up the political agencies contending on the scene."

In examining the forces which drive the society system, the most important to the functionalist is the economic sub-system. The economy operates on the scale of continents, according to their own laws, and independently of other levels of reality such as national, cultural and linguistic considerations.

Cultural and social well-being are tributary to economic growth, although there may arise conflicts between the two. Social welfare may, for instance, call for some curbing of economic or technological forces, but the primacy of economic laws must not be infringed laws must not be infringed.

"There is scarcely a state which can transgress with impunity by the laws of economics and technology. The one that tried, in the name of worthy social goals, would impoverish its economy and at the same time make those social goals unattainable." (Trudeau)

Other elements of social reality are seen as less important. Collective traditions, language and geographical factors give way to more important, more imposing things. The authors of the Manifesto write, "We opt for the free movement of economic and cultural factors, and we reject the concept of the nation state as obsolete." Thus, they view those who would give nationalism a major place in social political life as having a deformed perception of reality. The other social factors, too, are given free course only if they do not interfere with more important operations of the system at other levels. The important thing is that economic forces and progress are not impeded.

The function of the political system enters here. The state will strive to guarantee that the society is oriented toward "the most modern trends," which are "a humanism open to the world" and "various forms of political social and economic universalism." Differences of ethnicity, nationality, religion and language give way to common markets, multi-national corporations, uniform culture, uniform products, generalized consumption habits, etc. Functional politics is concerned with enhancing the operations of these superior forces and institutions dominating the social world. They are seen as universal because they are predominant and extend beyond the complicating parochial and "dysfunctional" particularities of time, place and person. Because they are universal and they are apparently rational.

It is thus clear why the authors of the Manifesto are no more moved "by the clamors in certain anglphone quarters in the face of the acquisition of Canadian enterprises by American financial interests, than by the adoption of the province of Quebec of economic policies based on the slogan 'Maitre Chez Nous.'"

With society so perceived, it is apparent that functional politics is a politics of problem solving. The functionalist sees his task as the prevention and remedy of dislocations and malfunctions in the mechanism which is society. The pragmatism involved is seen in the Manifesto's call "for discarding global ideologies in order to enable us to get at the specific problems of our society."

In 1964, the writers made a list of the problems which they saw. Although many of these directly affect or concern people they are inevitably conceived of and posed as problems of the system.

Thus, the costs of unemployment are to be "measured in terms of lost production" as well as of "human misery," thought the former, being more easily quantifiable, will receive the attention which the functionalists' system analysis can bring to bear.

There is also a warning about the social disintegration that will follow if the intellectual and bourgeois elites and the working on the one hand, and the unemployed on the other become strangers to each others, since this kind of rupture would be costly to the system.

"Human capital" is another problem because insufficient resources are being allocated to its development through investment in education and health. It is clearly bad business to spend so little when one considers " the high return on each dollar invested in this form of capital."

Humans are also seen as a problem in that, in this modern, fast-moving society, they often lag behind changes in technology, jobs, new products and conditions of living. They may also oppose innovations because they feel insecure. Techniques of retraining and better information on new jobs will help to move sluggish wills and bend recalcitrant flesh to the new and emerging realities in the social arrangement.

It is interesting that the Manifesto also viewed the opposition parties as an aspect of the problem of "political elites." These parties, it is suggested, should cease seeking after short-term political gain and fulfill their real function by providing the increase in information necessary for increasing the efficiency and "progress of democracy."

Above all else, the politics of functionalism is a politics of reason.

Marc Lalonde described the style of the regime to Time magazine two years ago as follows: "Technology means the systematic application of scientific or other organized knowledge to practical tasks. That's what we are trying to achieve: the ability to apply reason to broad social and economic problems."

This is not only desirable to the functionalists, but necessary because the social system is, to them, essentially rational. It is so by definition. If it were not, it would not be perceived as a mechanism or a system

"Consistency is ... the most remarkable quality of Mr. Trudeau's thoughts and actions over the past two decades." -John Saywell (1968) operating throughout and in its parts according to laws of its own dynamics. Since these laws are discernable under rational analysis, analytical and calculating reason alone can pretend to understand and manage the social order.

The attitude of the government reflected in the War Measures Act is not a departure ... not an aberration on the part of the Prime Minister ... but is of a piece with the theory and practice of politics enunciated long ago by Pierre Trudeau.

Reason applied to the governance of the various parts of the system will seek to express itself in an instrumentation for control that is coterminus with the various sub-systems of the whole. The nation state, which is coincidental with a specific geographical territory, ethnic group, religious tradition etc., corresponds to no such universal and rational reality. It is outdated as well as dangerous. For example, it brings irrational forces like nationalism, and particular accidents like language and ethnicity into disruptive conflict with the "universal" energies like technology and culture which move across its lines.

The Reason of the system and of the functionalist politician would invest itself with a new collective power, a new state, or states, which ideally "could have different sizes for different ends." and powers necessary to obtain these ends.

> "For example, in order that the authorities may intervene appropriately in social and cultural questions, where desires and needs can easily vary from one region to the next, and where the citizen must feel in fairly close communication with the sources of power, there is value in having a state territorial jurisdiction that is relatively limited. In other areas, that of economic efficiency for example, the geographic area benefits from being much more extensive. In yet other spheres, such a peace or commercial agreements, there would be a tendency towards an international political order." (Trudeau)

The federal type state is, therefore, the closest to the ideal. "The advantage of federalism is that it allows the creation of a state which is commensurate with the problems . . ." Thus, "in the last resort the mainspring of federalism cannot be emotion but must be reason."

It must now be obvious, however, that in speaking of the application of reason, science and technique, we are speaking not of politics but of management. Informed by his scientific analysis, the functionalist policy maker is fused with the research expert and the administrator. As a policy maker, he does essentially what the system, for its own maintenance, and on its own terms requires. This exercise of power he sees as tending towards "universal" values and "humanism open to the world." It is presumed devoid of heavy ideological commitment, and free of particular, partial and non-rational biases.

In the same fashion, opposition, dissent, resistance or withdrawal are not acknowledged and taken seriously as political claims. They too are "problems" to be handled with administrative techniques; or they are symptoms of malfunction in some part of the mechanism.

It should be added by way of comment, if it is not already clear, that the reason claimed as paramount by the functionalist politician is a truncated and alienated version of the attribute called human intelligence. As the operating principle of a Reality particularily confined -- of institutions mechanically conceived and forces empirically discerned -- this abstracted rationalism is neither proper to the needs of people, nor is it profoundly critical.

The politics of functionalism also parades as the champion of individual liberties, the ultimate value of the individual person. "We will fight every position which corrodes fundamental liberties and democratic institutions." wrote the signers of the Manifesto.

> "The state must be careful to stop at the doorstep of the individual conscience. I think that the human person, in his inner being, is the only one authorized, in the last analysis, to choose his scale of values, and to decide which of the forces confronting each other appears to him to predominate." (Trudeau)

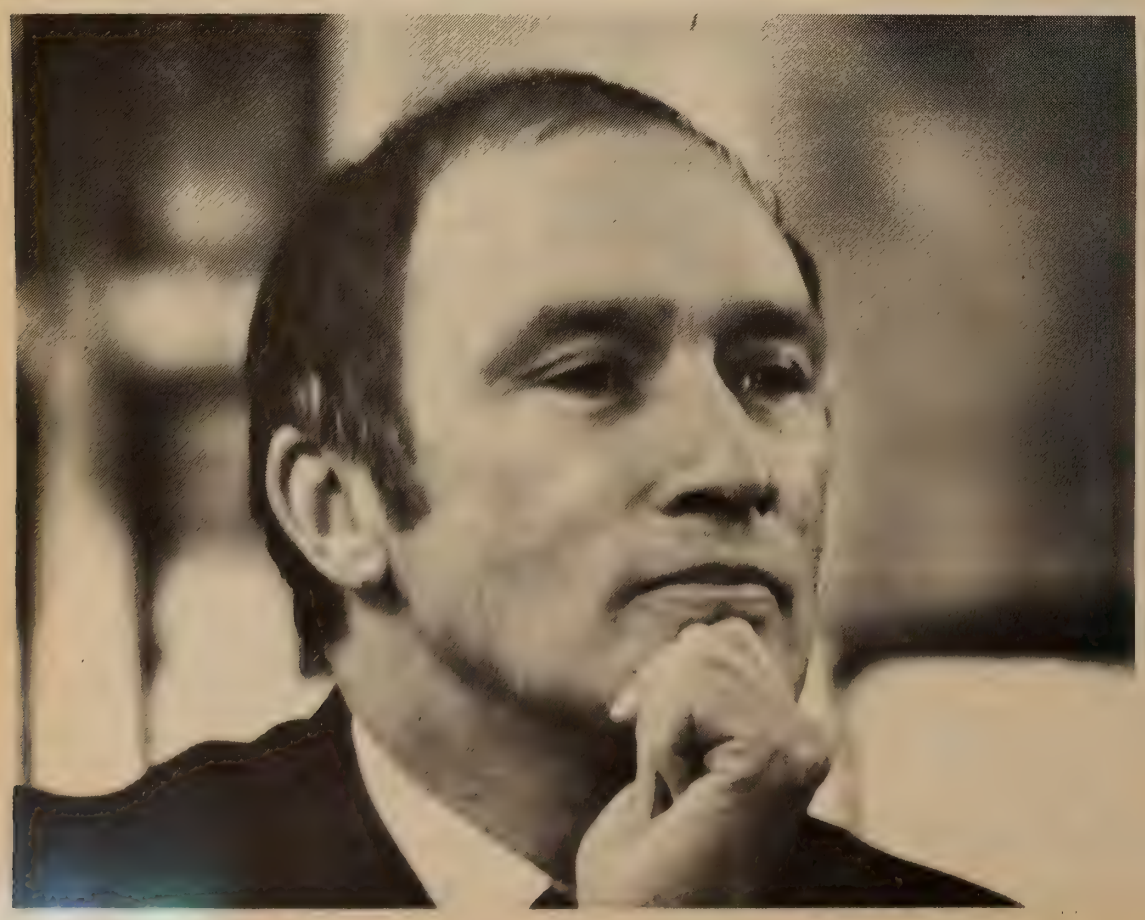
One wonders what meaning this can have after the systems analyst and the social engineer have decreed, in fact, what order of reality, what institutions, will prevail to keep society running smoothly as it is. One wonders what kind of person these may be, and what is the extent of this freedom, after the person has been "revalorized" by the rational politician, "independently of his ethnic, geographical or religious accidents." "The social and political order must be founded in the first place on the universal attributes of man, not on what particularizes him." — like the language in which he expresses himself, the traditional values which give his life meaning, the community where he finds support and relationships and goes about his daily life, his feelings and his emotions. The individual of the functionalists has no collective, corporal or sentential dimensions. This individual is disembodied mind.

Even then, however, it is not individuals who people the real world of functional politics. The subjects as well as the objects of functional politics are institutions: corporations, organized groups, governments . . . The individual is valuable so long as he does not interfere with the corporate citizens!

Politics is pre-eminently the business of organizations. It is organizations that have the proper knowledge, the significant political consciousness and hold means of effective political action. Thus the writers of the study on Agriculture in Quebec advise "farmers learn to reconcile their individualism as small landowners with the necessity of channelling their political influence through agricultural organizations. At the same time, the level of politicization of these organizatins should be intensified . . . Only the increased action of agricultural associations at the really political level will spur our governments."

The individual human actors on the political scene must be seen in this context for what they are: members of elites, experts in the analysis and advocacy of their organizations' interests, technicians skilled in the brokerage of interconnecting power and objectives. Organize! Get yourselves experts, the farmers were counseled. Then agriculture will become a political force. The citizen state, that is the state composed in theory of equal and equally valuable individuals has disappeared. Political responsibility devolves now, conclude the writers of the Manifesto, not so much on the people as on the ruling functionaries. Their conclusion is worth quoting in full:

> Valid political action presupposes a sense of responsibility. This has often been said in order to obtain respect for the political institutions from the population. But it seems to have been forgotten that these norms apply with even more rigour to those who govern than to those who are governed. The political equilibrium in a society is maintained by a very delicate gearing mechanism which could be destroyed by irresponsible acts or statements by public men, directors of corporations, labour authorities, heads of ethnic or religious associations etc."



On a world stage where the roles are played by vast impersonal forces and puissant, far-flung institutions, and where the plot is thick with the complexities of their multiple, subtle and far-reaching inter-relations, politics boils down to the cool deliberation and maneouverings of experts in the management of economic, social and organizational power.

Let us sum up the main and obvious consequences of this theory of politics.

It is basically an abstraction. There are vast and deep areas of life which the Reality known to Reason ignores or loses track of. The "wide"and "generous" views of Pierre Trudeau "can be narrow", writes Pierre Vadeboncoeur. "There are things which his mind, which has a technocratic cast, does not seem to see: he excludes them." That a person might be more than a rational calculation . . .; that there might be more important things to the people of Quebec than taking their place in the "grand ensemble" and collecting the dividends from the continental economic system . . . such prospects and possibilities find no place in the political practice and theory of functionalism.

Functional politics is pre-eminently the politics of the status quo. The recognition and promotion of existing patterns of society is the beginning and the end. What is going, by definition, is what ought to be going. There is no room here for the tension of classical political theory, the tension introduced by the collective pursuit of values beyond those which prevail and are empirically perceived. According to that theory, politics is the dealing in difference between the life of man as it is, and as it could or ought to be; "between existing social institutions and potentially more humane social institutions." Functional politics, on the other hand, is basically a non-human politics of non-human values.

In the absence of more transcendental human norms and ideals, concern in the theory and practice of the functional politics is the "maintenance and adaption" of the system, as the jargon puts it. Operational efficiency "at all costs" is the chief value, the motto on the wall and the theme of the political manuals.

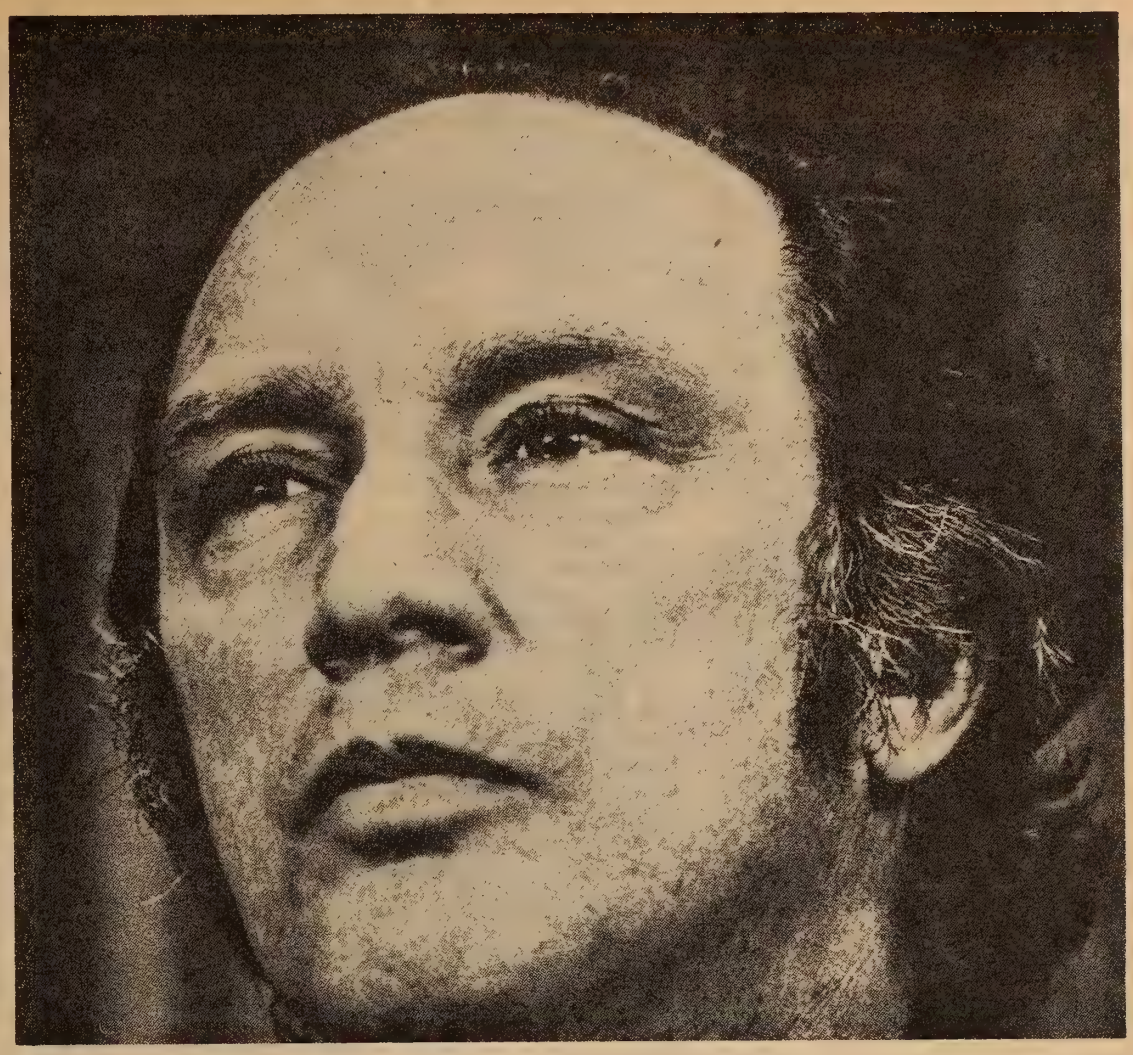
To the mind of the functionalist it is inconceivable that the system itself, as a whole, could be the cause of human distress and discontent. The system is the ultimate reality, absolute and immutable except by the operation of its own autonomous laws. It is, therefore equally inconceivable to think of radically altering the arrangements. One tinkers and facilitates; one does not tear down and rebuild.

Even short of such far-sweeping changes, there are strict limitations placed upon the response that the functional politics can offer to the demands for change or reform. That is, appeals voiced in terms of people's experience and needs will be translated into answers which make sense to institutions and organizations which dispose in the world of "problems." The answers will be those which suit the system. Thus, for example, the unemployment of youth will be met by the offer of a voluntary programme of military service.

It ought to be clear by now. When situated in the perspective of the political philosophy so long held and consistently enunciated by Pierre E. Trudeau and at least one close adviser, the promulgation of the War Measures Act is a gesture that is neither exceptional nor excessive.

"How far would you be willing to go in that direction?", asked the incredulous Tim Ralfe of Trudeau. . . To the point of using electronic listening devices and the suspension of certain civil liberties?, pursued Ralfe. "Yes certainly," replied Trudeau. "I think society must take means to prevent the emergence of a parallel power which defies the elected power of this country. I think that goes to any distance." three days later the War Measures Act was proclaimed.

In what respects does the War Measures Act appear as a late fall bloom on a well nurtured plant?



First, there is a long-standing, or indirect relation: The impasse in which the government found itself stems from the whole social situation in which an armed revolutionary movement in Quebec, small though that movement be, has come into being and issued in the events of early October. This is a situation characterized by a combination of four things; an immense loosening up and setting in motion of Quebec society; a resurgence of national consciousness; the continuance and recent exacerbation of social, economic and political inequality; and a slowly growing, radical, social and political consciousness expressing itself in all sorts of forms of "new power" at the level of the people. In spite of the social, economic and human dimensions of that situation in Quebec, the systems analysts have identified emotional nationalism, "separatism", as the problem; and the saving of Canadian Confederation as the rational solution. Ottawa is the power base from which to deal with problems in Quebec and with Quebec as a problem!

Only Drapeau-Saulnier (—Oops! how could one forget the zealous Wagner and the solicitious Remi Paul? Spectacularly bent, both of them, on smashing crime and terrorism—) has taken the revolutionaries (and most other dissidents) seriously, and then as incendiary trouble makers, not as spokesmen for a new order that will not be achieved by Expos-Olympic Games. Trudeau continues to talk as though democracyitself, as it 'flourishes" in Canada is largely to blame for the rise and outbreak of revolutionary activity. He is right, but for the wrong reasons. Liberal democracy has not been too liberal or democratic. It has been too bound up with and subservient to the dominant forces and institutions working in and over society. In both Ottawa and Quebec the regimes have been unable to look the basic problem in the face, even to recognize it. Inevitably the exasperation produced by the failure of the neo-liberal regime and its own contributions to the state of affairs, was bound to issue in an incident where consent was spectacularly withdrawn and the state's power was challenged by its own kind of raw power.

Second, the functionalist regime recognizes as politically legitimate only the forces and pressures which fit its rational categories. The rest is the business of the criminal courts, the police, the armed forces the psychiatrist or the social worker.

Armed opposition, warfare of a kind, in other words, — even if in this case it takes the very limited but effective form of urban guerilla terrorism — is not acknowledge as political opposition. Such "violent and fanatical men" could not conceivably fit their feet beneath the board-room table. The regime, the system, is beyond their cognizance. They are hard grit in the gears.

However, in this case, the characteristic functional ways of dealing with the problem are ineffective: — attempts at indifference, accommodation, acceptable to the system alternatives, repression. We saw them all pathetically brought to bear during the tense October weeks, as they have been in the years before. Only the technique of force remains and so its application is stepped up even though it violates one of the conditions of public consensus and infringes the civil liberties of some very minor elements in the system: individual persons and dissenting groups.

Since, however, the regime is seeking to rid itself of non-political and illegitimate forces its own action can be considered legitimate and reasonable, an exceptional application of one of the techniques used to maintain the system and ensure the adaptation of all the parts to its continued progress. In all events, as far as the regime is concerned, the revolutionary movement remains beyond the political pale. The very fundamental political problem to which the insurgents are pointing, that is, the quality and legitimacy of the regime itself, is a question to be kept hidden from view and unexamined.

Third, the functionalist regime remained rigorously true to the political theory of functionalism in rejecting the demands of the kidnappers to hand over convicts under the criminal code as political prisoners. In the first place, they could not, as we have just pointed out, be recognized as political. In the second place, "should the governments give in to this crude blackmail we would be facing the breakdown of the legal system . . . " So delicate is the mechanism, so tight its rational inner logic, that one infringement of the laws of its motion would ruin it and screw up the whole works. According to the vision of functionalism, the legal subsystem is not politics; it is a branch of management dealing with personal behaviour. It is not in this department that the problem is to be met. The only level at which the functionalist regime can meet the insurgents at "the moment of grave crisis" is that one which is common to them both, the use of armed force. It is at this level of reality that the functionalist will perceive the problem and deal with it in the immediate. Subsequently, when the management has regained control of the enterprise, the problem will be translated back into categories which are more fitting and more befitting. These will be the rational categories of criminal justice, and probably psychoanalysis of the individual, maybe even the sociology of alienation and poverty.

The War Measures Act was, then, dictated by a problem of technique, of instrumentation. It was admitted at the time of its being invoked that the measure was an "unsatisfactory" device, clumsy and overpowered, not carefully adapted to the problem. Urgently necessary but unworthy of the sophistication of a technocratic regim,e it would be replaced as soon as possible by more suitable legislation.

Virtually all of the discussion in the opposition and in the country has been on this point and on this level. The inappropriate force of the War Measures Act is taken to be the problem, the critical issue now facing the country. The debate is on the ground occupied by the functionalists. Even then, the discussion will be arduous when more appropriate measures are proposed. For even then, all parties to the issue will not see the problem which the measure is calculated to resolve, in quite the same terms; and many will assert, whatever measure is introduced, that its costs are high in terms of basic liberties, notwithstanding the fact that the maintenance of the system is at stake.

All who understand "the problem" essentially in these limited terms are party to a certain degree to the blindness and partiality of the functional vision.

Finally, let us recall that the functionalists were true to their philosophy to the end. Individual liberties, as never before in the history of this country, did go by the board, when the institutions and dominant forces of the system appeared to be threatened. Trudeau pointed out to Ralfe with that inimitable logic that the violence of the kidnappers was being committed "against the total society."

Nonetheless, it took eleven days to bring the only measure declared to be available to the government the War Measures Act, into play after the kidnapping of James Cross. And it has been seven years since the movements "attempting to destroy the unity and freedom of Canada" have been openly practising their violent tactics. There is evidence of a certain sudden necessity in the government's action. It was not so much the necessity of finding a solution commensurate with the problem. That was too obviously impossible and too late. Nevertheless, manoeuvering in accordance with the functional programme of action and problem solving, the governments, particularly Drapeau-Saulnier and Ottawa, found a problem commensurate with the sweeping solution! That problem was not new to them. Insurrection and overthrow of the state, we were told, was imminent.

The coincidence of the theory and the practice of functional politics thus remained impeccable!. And under the cover provided by the War Measures Act the left in Quebec in all its shadings, even into the liberal centre, was dealt, at least momentarily, a heavy body blow through the physical and psychological arms of the regime.

The War Measures Act is not the problem. The War Measures Act is but the logical fruit, the consistent outworking of the politicial theory and practice of functionalism. The crisis in the country is the crisis of a social order, and a regime which is unable to see or work its way out of the impasse.

From Our Generation, Nov. 1970.

Awareness, action growing among working class Quebecois

there has been a very clear trend to see that Quebec is the homeland of French speaking people . . .

The Parti Quebecois primarily represents small and medium capitalists, with economic control via the state.

Ed. note: Last Sunday, at a meeting of the SCM (Canada) John Huot described two interrelated streams of what we might call the movement in Quebec: (a) the "National Stream," dealing with questions directly related to the national question of whether Quebec should be a province; whether it should have autonomy, or whether it should be independent; and what kind of independence as well as the question of language, which has been increasingly important in the past four or five years; and (b) the trends that grow out of socioeconomic problems - the class questions.)

I will talk about the national question in terms of the constitutional and language issues. Within Quebec there has been an increasing tendency (though always present) for Quebecois to see themselves as a people distinct from the rest of the people in Canada, that they are not simply one of the ten provinces but that they are, (and the language has varied over the years and over the centuries) in some way the national homeland of the French speaking people in Canada. That is a slight change because in the early 20th century there were still people like Henri Bourassa who saw the possibility of making the whole of Canada the homeland, along with English Canadians, of a French speaking people. But there has been a very clear trend since 1960 to see that Quebec is the homeland of French speaking people and that the fate of the French speaking minorities outside of Quebec is largely going to be determined by socio-economic factors and that the trend there is towards assimilation.

There has been a strong attempt by the federal government and the social groups that it depends on in English Canada to revive the idea from the beginning of the 20th century that we should have a bicultural country. It can be noted here that one of the most interesting studies of the B and B commission, (which it has chosen not to publish, but which has been leaked out through the French press) was a study of all the counties in Canada which have a fairly large proportion of French speaking population, or people of French ethnic origin. It traced the assimilation of French people into the English community by seeing how many people still had the French mother tongue. The study indicated very clearly that all over Canada the trend was towards a decline of French speaking. That is one of the underlying factors which has lead to the consciousness that Quebec is the national homeland of the French speaking people and that it is not simply a province like the others as defined within the constitution.

During the sixties specifically political formations developed which put forward the programme of independence for Quebec, independence from the Canadian confederation with full constitutional powers of its own, its own parliament and so forth. A variety of smaller groups came together in 1968 to form the Parti Quebecois and in 1970 after only two years of organization they received 24 percent of the total vote in the provnicial elections in Quebec.

I should say a word about the PQ in terms of the social groups of which it is composed and which more or less lead it. It is quite clear to most observers that it is, both in terms of its programme and people who lead it, primarily a party representing the part of Quebec society consisting of the small and medium capitalists in Quebec. In other words, these are people who are now directly owners of retail establishments, department stores and so on, but also a part of the class which increasingly sees that the only way that it will be able to get its control of enough capital to directly compete with English Canadian and American capitalists is through the state. One example of this was the nationalization of hydroelectric power in 1962 in Quebec. The key person behind that was Rene Levesque, then a minister in the Liberal government and now the leader of the PQ. If one looks at the programme of the PQ, one sees that a constant theme is that it is only through the state and through certain selective nationalizations that French people in Quebec, (ie., certain classes of French people in Quebec,) are going to be able to get control of enough capital to begin at least some form of development independent of English Canada. It is clear from its program that that is the direction it wants to go in but it has a much larger membership obviously than that and in some ways, and certainly in 1970, it was playing a very progressive role in bringing large numbers of people face to face with the independence question. Since that time it has been much more ambiguous. They have been more clearly trying to establish themselves as a moderate force and in so doing have been increasingly setting themselves apart from the other line of development in Quebec, the 'Peoples Movement' which is increasingly seeing the solution not in electing a political party which will legislate independence, but are increasingly working to build other kinds of political organizations with various different programmes. For example, they talk about working class power being the solution to the problem, not simply putting in another small group into power which will not be able to solve the problems of underdevelopment and poverty.

In terms of the kinds of coalitions developing around the constitutional question I would like to mention one particular incident. You will remember the famous constitutional ultimatum from the June conference of last year which most English Canadians thought was good and would solve the problems and so on. Within Quebec, as soon as the ultimatum to accept the basic charter was presented, a coalition made up of the PQ, one of the major petit bourgeois nationalist groups (the St. Jean Baptist Society), the 70,000 member teachers union, the 250,000 member Quebec federation of Labour, the 250,000 member Confederation of National Trade Unions and hundreds of small organizations united in a common front to oppose that constitutional charter that was put forward by the federal government in Victoria. That gives an idea of the broadness of awareness on the constitutional question.

There is now a falling proportion of Francophones in Quebec itself. The reason for this is that something in the area of 95 percent of non-French and non-English speaking immigrants into Quebec are assimilated into the English community through the school system. The reason for this is quite obvious. For many of the immigrants, for example the huge Italian community, French would be a much easier language to learn, yet the reality of the situation is that to make it in Quebec today one must speak English, and it is very clear to the immigrant coming to Montreal where the power lies and where the road to success lies and it certainly isn't through becoming a francophone in Quebec. Of course, there is a dialectic there - because of the way that immigrants have been used by the dominant English group in Quebec, there obviously is a certain hostility among francophones towards immigrants - it's not a black and white question. Historically, it runs back to the large numbers of British immigrants which were surplus manpower from England from 1815 to 1850 who were shipped over in hundreds of thousands to Quebec when there were no jobs and no land for Quebecois, and who, in addition, brought over a cholera epedemic. That kind of feeling towards immigrants has deep historical roots.

Increasingly over the past ten years, there have been political movements centered around the programme of French Unilingualism in Quebec, defined in this way: schooling, all public institutions like government, courts, etc would be French only and French would be the language of work. Of course the last is one hardest to legislate because all the chief sectors of Quebec industry are controlled by American or English Canadian capital. Increasingly, there is a consensus within the more politically aware segments of the Quebec population that French unilingualism and not bilingualism is the solution to the declining proportion of French speaking population in Quebec.

At this point it is interesting to see how the Federal government's bilingualism programme affects the situation. Most of us think that the programme is mainly aimed at the French speaking minorities outside of Quebec since the bilingualism programme is defined in terms of minority language.. However, inside Quebec, English is the minority language. This means, for example, that in the first two years, 1969 and 1970, half of the money the federal government puts into its second language programme has gone to the English in Quebec who already control most of the wealth within Quebec, and whose schools are under attack increasingly within Quebec. Another affect of this is that a recent government task force on language problems recommended that if there is a certain proportion of French speaking population in an area, then that area is designated as a bilingual one. We, of course, are led to believe that this is mainly going to be useful to the French speaking population of St. Boniface or in Nova Scotia or something. Under that report it was decided to designate the whole of Quebec as a bilingual district, withthe consequence that every federal institution, for example, the post office in 99.9 percent French Lac Jean, will have to have a bilingual official. I think that it will be important to watch how the federal bi and bi programme is directed in a very significant part towards the English community in Quebec and not towards the French community outside of Quebec.

Finally, a broadening of the national movement in Quebec is indicated by the development of the issue of language of work. It has been on this question that unions and, increasingly, rank and file workers have become active. One of the major issues of the GM strike in Quebec last fall was that French be the language of work on the shop floor. In the GM plant in Quebec, workers with some supvisory duties over other workers had to speak English, but not French. Many of those jobs were held by unilingual English people who had semi-supervisory roles right on the shop floor over people who spoke only French. Also since that time there have been several strikes and walkouts by rank and file workers who are pushing for French as the language of work. This is an indication, much clearer than in any of the other areas,that the class composition of the national movement is beginning to shift. One other indication is of course that 6 of the 7 seats that the PQ won in 1970 were in working class districts in Montreal, not in the bourgeois districts. That again is an ambiguous phenomenon because, as explained earlier, the PQ programme is not essentially in the interests of these people but it obviously presents a programme that is more interested in change than the other parties.

There has been a rapid development in the other line, the socioeconomic questions in recent time. The first indication of that is that the Quebec based federation of unions, the Confederation of National Trade Unions in 1968 passed the "Second Front Manifesto" which said that unions in Quebec had to go beyond the traditional collective bargaining concern that had been the traditional concern of trade unions and begin to get directly involved in political action. They analysed the underdevelopment, unemployment, and all the socio-economic problems in Quebec in terms of what they called American Imperialism and they talked about the multinational corporation and finally they talked about the necessity of building a class power. They talked about government in Quebec as being a class government serving the American and Canadian. Anyone who has any familiarity with trade unions will find this rather surprising and that surprising element indicates the significance of what is happening in Quebec unions, or more basically what is happening in Quebec and is being reflected in development of the unions. Just about two months ago the CNTU published a very interesting political statement whose title is "There is no more future for Quebec in the present economic system", and when they said that they mean capitalism, they spoke about the power of the multinational corporation and large corporations, they talk about the necessity of criticising and understanding that problem in terms of class political parties and propose a continuing of the second front programme.

There also has been a development of coalitions between trade unions, political action committees and citizen groups in working class districts . . .

There also has been a development of coalitions between trade unions, political action committees and citizens groups in working class districts, particularly in Montreal, but also in most of the larger cities in Quebec. FRAP was, last October, presenting a slate of candidates against Drapeau in Montreal, specifically on a platform of working class power, nut just a platform of saying we have a different programme and we're nicer people. They did an analysis of the social background of Drapeau's party and found out, and it's no surprise, that there wasn't a single working person, they were all lawyers, and small shopkeepers etc. Formations like FRAP now exist in several cities in Quebec and work on a wide variety of fronts, mostly on a rank and file level. FRAP now is trying to join community based political organising with work place based political organising. It is important to note that FRAP is the only organization now in Quebec that is clearly a working class political organization under the control of working people.

A third type of activity that has been developing for the last two years in particular is what I call for want of a better word "hinterland actions'. In the summer of 1970 in Canada, a small Gaspe town of about two or three thousand people, where there was a very large rate of unemployment, a local saw mill closed down. The government had promised that the mill would stay open and had given the mill cutting rights in the area. The plant was owned by K.C. Irving who closed down the plant but kept cutting the wood anyway. The people there took over the town for two or three days. They set up barricades, they burned down all the access bridges to the forests where Irving was cutting. Since that time, around basically the same kind of issues, in Mont Laurier, another case of some fairly marginal industries closing down, the working people in the town as a whole got involved in some very militant political actions, barricades closing the highways and blocking access to the area for two or three days. This type of thing has multiplied across Quebec. It still is ambiguous in political terms because in most cases the working people in the towns don't end up in control of the campaigns that are waged. It ends up in the control of the local lawyer, the local shopkeeper, the local priest. This is not quite a throw back to the hundred years before 1960 because the priest here is a mixed form of the progressive priests like the ones you get in Latin America, but there is still some of the sort of "we professionals know what is best for the people, we're the ones with the education so we should be the people who go and talk to the government." Then they go to talk to the government and the government says to be reasonable, but it's not those people that are out of jobs or have been on welfare for the last ten years. Nevertheless, the fact that this sort of thing is happening is an indication that some very important things are taking place in the small towns and rural areas as well as in the large cities.

The final point I would like to make is that I would propose a slightly different interpretation of what October 20 was about than is current even among critical people in English Canada. That interpretation, and I'm not now going to try to deal with the sort of interpretations that Trudeau and other people put forth, sees the government's action as an attempt to smash the independence movement. They say that the four or five hundred people that were put in jail were all activists in the independence movement, the government wasn't really trying to get the FLQ, it was trying to get the movement in Quebec in a much more broad way. If one were to analyse the social composition of the organizations that were attacked through the people arrested, and through the police raids (there were 3000 raids as well as 400-500 arrests -- files taken and never returned, printing presses seized, etc.) one would see that it was an attack on the beginnings of something much more threatening than an independence movement. The PQ proposes a common market with common financial institutions, common tarrifs and so on. Neither Rene Levesque nor any of the PQ leaders were put in jail. It was much more an attack on the beginnings of a working class movement.

The organization attacked most viciously in the media was FRAP. That is just the phenomenon which leads us to something more basic. The groups that were most hit both by raids and by arrests were citizens groups and working class organizations.

,,anything can happen,, in not so calm Quebec . . .

A number of writers, in looking back over the year since the invocation of the War Measures Act and in examining events in Quebec, have concluded that, if it did nothing else, the Act provided a period of relative calm in Quebec. For instance, Peter Desbarats, writing in the Toronto Star, noted that "the terrorist Front de Liberation du Quebec has been demoralized and even if this is temporary, the 12-month period of relative calm in Quebec has to be counted as a positive gain. As for separatist sentiment in general in Quebec in the past 12 months, there are no solid indications that it has grown. If anything, the signs point to an opposite trend."

On the other hand, we have the statement of Rene Levesque, leader of the Parti Quebecois, that unless the present "distorted setup" ends (ie, the control by English-speaking businessmen of the Quebec economy), "we are going to have explosions", and the warning of Michel Chartrand, president of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, that, in spite of the apparent calm, "anything can happen (this fall). The same fools are in power."

It certainly would be a mistake to believe that the Quebec "problem" is any nearer a solution than it was a year ago, or that nothing has happened in the past year in Quebec.

Even more, there seems to be little evidence to support the contention that the independence movement in Quebec has lost much steam. For instance, in the by-election held in February to fill the place of Pierre Laporte in the Quebec government, the Parti Quebecois received 35 per cent of the vote, a slight increase over the 1970 returns, and much more than was expected by Ottawa, where Regional Expansion Minister Jean Marchand predicted that the party would get less than 20 per cent of the vote.

As well, in a poll of public opinion completed by two Laval University political scientists last April, it was found that 17.5 per cent said they would vote for the Parti Quebecois, whereas only 15 per cent said they would have in earlier election. The poll also indicated that less than 30 per cent of Quebeckers felt that the Quebec government would be overthrown last October and more Quebeckers felt threatened by the presence of the Canadian army and the police during the crisis than by the FLQ.

Much of the activity in the past year in Quebec by those pushing for independence for Quebec has concentrated on the community organization work of the type exemplified by the Front d'Action de Politique (FRAP). However, there has still been considerable action in the now "calm" province. In the spring of this year, people in a northern Quebec community kidnapped, for a few hours, a Canada Manpower official and forced to listen to their grievances about the government's handling of the unemployment situation.

On Sept. 11, police across the country were asked to join in the search for Pierre Vallieres, the author of White Niggers of America, and defendant on a chrage of counselling to murder and to kidnap. Vallieres began being hunted after he failed to show up for his court date. Messages from the FLQ said that Vallieres had gone into hiding rather than "put up with the buffoonery of the courts." The message also said he wishes "to pursue more efficiently the fight agaginst the exploiters of the Quebec people."

Earlier, a prison break north of Montreal, again believed to involve the FLQ, released several of the so-called "political prisoners" whose release was demanded last October by the FLQ in return for the release of Cross and Laporte.

On Oct. 5, police in Montreal arrested seven people on a bank robbery charge and claimed that they had broken an FLQ cell. The hold-up for which they were arrested was one of at least two in September for which the FLQ took the credit.

If the left had temporarily been scared off public activity, it is now becoming more openly active again this fall. Starting last Tuesday, hearing conducted by a group of ten Canadians, led by Laurier Lapierre, are holding public hearings into the use of the War Measures Act last year. And on Saturday, many different groups of various political leanings will be joining together for mass demonstrations in Montreal on the day of the first anniversary of the invocation of the War Measures Act.

Nor are police in Montreal content to assume that everything is quiet. Security guards have been employed by many people in the area of Redpath Crescent, from where James Cross was kidnapped last October, and the RCMP and the Montreal police continue to make regular patrols through the area just in case.

Learning to use Tampax tampons is a lot easier. In fact, you won't believe how comfortable, how easy they are to use until you've tried them.

Tampax tampons were developed by a doctor, so you know they're safe. They come in three absorbency-sizes: Regular, Super, Junior. No other tampons do. And one will be perfect for you.

They have a silken-smooth container-applicator that makes insertion correct and comfortable, every time. And for extra safety, the withdrawal cord is chain stitched the entire length of the tampon. Disposal is no problem either, because both the applicator and the tampon are completely flushable.

Tampax tampons. Millions of girls all over the world have tried them. And use them. Some day you'll remember when you first tried them too.

And you'll be glad you did.

October, 1970- the reasons why

By Allaine Armstrong
(Introduction: Canada and Quebec," by John Huot)

October 1970 was not the first stage of the Quebec liberation movement. Nor the last. To English Canada, it was a 'crisis' situation; to the people of Quebec, it was the logical outcome of the beginning of their revolution.

The Trudeau government, aided by the mass media, were successful in perpetuating the myth that the crisis in Quebec was only the result of a handful of Quebec terrorists. Yet the kidnappings of a British diplomat and a Quebec government minister by the Front de Liberation du Quebec provoked, within ten days, a government response that was based on the claim that revolution and the armed overthrow of the government of Quebec were imminent. The Canadian government response to the work of a 'handful of terrorists' took the form of the occupation of Quebec by 7,500 federal armed forces, a province-wide police operation involving 2,500 local, provincial and federal police forces along with the troops, the arrest of more than 450 people from a wide range of social and political movements under emergency powers of search and detention without warrant or charge, and the granting of bail, and finally, the arraigning in court of more than a dozen persons on charges of conspiracy to overthrow the governments of Canada and Quebec by force.

Yet the FLQ actions were only a pretext for the federal and Quebec governments to launch a general attack on all the movements that have been generated in the national and class struggles in Quebec in the past ten years. In the climate of fear and repression that was thus created widespread censorship, both under the authority of emergency powers and by intimidation, a Quebec government investigation into teachers' political views in the classroom, and systematic attempts to discredit all opposition criticism have been justified.

Nor was this the first time that the Canadian and Quebec governments have tried to suppress the rise of a mass popular liberation struggle in Quebec. It is no accident that we in English Canada know virtually nothing about the history of the Quebec struggle, and the history of the repeated repression against it. In fact, the federal government's key strategic card throughout the crisis was solid English Canadian support for its attack at all levels of the liberation movement in Quebec, support based on traditional English Canadian racism towards the Quebec people, and ignorance of the Quebec situation.

That the Trudeau government has been able to use this ignorance in creating English Canadian 'unity' around its systematic repression of the Quebec people reflects the ignorance of English Canadians of the forces at work in the Canadian political and economic system as a whole. For there is a growing restlessness in the various regions of Canada which has failed to find appropriate forms of political expression and which can be diverted into hostility to Quebec. This hostility takes regionalized forms - such as Western Canadian feelings that Quebec is the spoiled child of Confederation, to southern Ontario's fears that 'national unity' to Atlantic bitterness that their region is much worse off than Quebec.

The reality is that the restlessness in the various regions of Canada is rooted in the concrete social and economic problems caused by the contradictions of the political system of Canada as a whole -- regional disparities, rising unemployment, job insecurity, loss of wage gains through rising prices and taxes, increasingly tough wage and salary controls for employees in the public sector, growing job insecurity for students and youth generally.

Recent developments in both Canada and Quebec can be understood only in terms of the conditions and structures of Quebec society, and more broadly, of Canadian society. In addition, these developments must be analysed in their historical perspective. For the 'crisis in Quebec' cannot be viewed in a vacuum; the events of last October have roots that go back to Confederation and far beyond. This paper is intended to give the economic background of the Quebec liberation struggle; an historical analysis of the development of the Quebec liberation movement will hopefully appear in a later issue. — Introduction: Quebec and Canada.

Quebec is one the one hand an internal colony of the Canadian nation-state, and thus is subjected to foreign domination as a nation by the structures and practices of Canadian colonialism, expressed is-a-vis Quebec in the federal system. On the other hand, Quebec is a region of the Canadian political and economic system, itself subjected to foreign domination by the structures and practices of American Imperialism. To grasp both the relative autonomy of these two distinctive structures of the Quebec and Canadian situation and their concrete interrelationships is to grasp both the dynamics of the Quebec liberation movement and its effects on political developments among the people in the various regions of Canada.

As a region of the Canadian political and economic system, Quebec has to be understood in terms of the functioning of that system in Canada as a whole. As Ernest Mandel has pointed out the survival of national monorities in the midst of capitalist nation-states since the 19th century is to a significant degree the function of the absence of genuine economic integration and economic equalization.

The federal political system in Canada is the political institution of the English Canadian bourgeoisie based in the central Canadian metropoles of Toronto and Montreal. The economic base of this bourgeoisie was originally in the development of the agricultural and some natural resources of the vast hinterland regions of Western and Eastern Canada, and the creation of a continent-wide national market protected by tariffs from foreign competition for goods manufactured in central Canada. The fundamental structure of the Canadian political and economic system created in 1867 was thus articulated in terms of a dominant metropolitan region in central Canada, the base of the nascent Canadian bourgeoisie, which sought to control and integrate the dependent hinterland regions of the Maritimes, Quebec (a mixed case, where some industrial development took place), the Prairies, and the Pacific Coast. The dominant position of the metropolitan region in central Canada, which produced manufactured goods for sale in a protected national market, while agricultural and resource producers in the hinterland regions competed in world markets, and which linked the various parts of its market by a new railway transportation system paid for by all the regions, has generated regional opposition movements which run from the early Maritimes secession movements through Prairie movements in the 1930's to present-day anti-metropolitan movements in virtually all regions of Canada.

...to the people of Quebec, it (October 1970) was the logical outcome of the beginning of their revolution.

The breakdown of the economic basis for this design of the English Canadian bourgeoisie since the 1930's with the direct penetration of U.S. capital in the form of direct investment in the natural resource sector (mining and smelting, lumber and paper-making, oil and natural gas) and in the industrial sector, to the point of effective control of the whole economy, has led to a process of economic disintegration and political balkanization of the Canadian political and economic system. The pattern of U.S. direct investment followed the original structure of the Canadian economic system: investment in resource development in the hinterland regions, and some parts of Quebec have 77 per cent of Canadian-controlled employment in the manufacturing sector, they have 89 percent of U.S.-controlled employment in the same sector (the population of all of Ontario and all of Quebec, which cannot be considered entirely part of the metropolitan region, is 63 percent of the Canadian population). Similarly, while 31 percent of Canadian-controlled employment is within 100 miles of Toronto and 41 percent within 300 miles, 45 percent of U.S.-controlled employment is within 100 miles of Toronto and 64 percent within 300 miles. The English Canadian bourgeoisise has accomodated itself to this integration of Canada into the U.S. Empire, maintaining a relatively dominant position as a comprador class in a dependent economy.

The erosion of the real economic base of the English Canadian bourgeoisie has greatly weakened the federal state's political and economic mediations for integrating different groups and regions in Canada. The most recent examples of this are the federal state's contradictory policies to control inflation and rising unemployment, largely caused by the Canadian economy's integration into the U.S. economy, and the failure of the federal state's regional development policies, based on the twin premisses of continuing central Canadian metropolitan dominance and the 'necessity' of U.S. capital, to provide a minimal level of economic development in the hinterland regions to ensure their integration. It is this erosion of the real economic basis of the central Canadian bourgeoisie which has very strictly limited the policy options of the federal state in its attempts to integrate Quebec by promoting more economic development, and thus increased its reliance on force and repression as the means of integration.

Political responses in the various regions to these developments in the Canadian political and economic system have shown clear trends, although the level and intensity of responses have varied greatly. In the hinterland regions, (Atlantic, Quebec, Northern Ontario, the Prairies and the Pacific Coast) opposition has been directed against the continuing dominance of the metropolitan region and the policies of the federal state expressing its interests. In this perspective, the Quebec liberation movement can be seen as the most advanced form of hinterland opposition to the structures of the Canadian political and economic system, and the clearest instance of the aspiration for regional self-determination: it is significant that in the past few years, every region of Canada except southern Ontario has considered the benefits of separation from Confederation. This hinterland opposition has been entirely directed against the metropolitan-hinterland structures of domination within the Canadian nation-state, and not against the structures of American imperialism. All these hinterland regions tend to see the attraction of U.S. investment, particularly in natural resources, as the major road to economic development, and all trend to see direct integration into the U.S. market for manufactured goods as preferable to paying higher prices for goods manufactured in central Canada.

In the metropolitan region of southern Ontario, new political responses developed more slowly in the 1960's, but have begun to emerge more in the late 1960's and in 1970. This response to the integration of the Canadian economic system into the U.S. Empire has taken the form of direct opposition to U.S. domination in its economic, political and cultural manifestations. At this early stage, the political content of this opposition runs from such groups as the Committee for an Independent Canada, which seeks a modification, but not replacement, of the continentalist-imperialist system to accomodate more 'Canadian' participation in the economy, to more anti-imperialist positions being worked out by the Waffle group in the NDP. Both these tendencies are directed against the structures of U.S. imperialism in Canada (in varying degrees), and both generally ignore the metropolitan-hinterland structures of domination within the Canadian nation-state. Equally seriously, both tend to ignore the status of Quebec as an internal colony of the Canadian nation-state, defining it, in the case of the Committee for an Independent Canada, as a 'less developed region', and in the case of Waffle, rather abstractly as a 'nation with the right to self-determination'.

Furthermore, both these tendencies share the view that a strongly centralized Canadian state would be the primary means of effecting change in Canada's position vis-a-vis the U.S.

What is significant about these political responses in both the hinterland regions and the metropolitan region is that they are directed at the most immediate structures of domination that affect the region. It is also significant that both tend to ignore the structure of domination that does not affect them immediately. But both responses, however ambiguous their class content at this very initial stage of political development, express regional aspirations for self-determination that must be developed -- and widened to include the structure of domination they neglect – if U.S. imperialism and the structures of metropolitan-hinterland domination in which capitalism has been articulated in Canada are to be destroyed.

Quebec is on the one hand an internal colony of the Canadian nation-state, and thus us subjected to the foreign domination as a nation by the structures and practices of Canadian colonialism . . .

These introductory remarks point to the necessity of understanding the Quebec liberation movement and the responses to it in Canada in the context of the structures of the political and economic system of Canada as a whole. The emphasis on the fundamental structures of metropolis-hinterland within Canada and American imperialism externally is not meant to obscure the importance of class contradictions, but to specify how class struggle is articulated in the Canadian political and economic system at all levels -- international, national and regional. Nor is this emphasis intended to obscure the situation of Quebec as an internal colony of the Canadian nation-state, and not simply a hinterland region of Canada. To understand the dynamics of the Quebec liberation movement, both aspects must be analyzed.

In the final analysis, the most effective way English Canadians can express their solidarity with the Quebec liberation movement is to build liberation movements in their own regions to destroy the structures and practices of U.S. imperialism and Canadian capitalist 'metropolitanism' that the Quebec people are struggling against today.

Quebec as a Colony: National and Class Oppression

In order to understand the economic subordination of Quebec it is necessary to recognize the existence of certain socio-economic realities. The first is to recognize Quebec as a nation, united by common language, culture, and territory. Secondly, following the accepted definitions of colonialism, Quebec is a colony, a national entity that has been conquered from the outside, that has had imposed on it another language, another culture, and dominated economically, politically and culturally by Anglo-Canadian and US imperialism. Thirdly, Quebec is an industrialized capitalist economy in which the socio-economic subordination of the working class to the bourgeoisie is very real.

Thus there are two levels of oppression which affect the Quebec people: as a people, a national entity, all Quebecois are submitted to Colonization, cultural oppression, race discrimination and foreign political domination. This national oppression is exercised against all Quebecois, although obviously different sectors of the society are affected in different ways. At the same time, the working class (about 90 per cent of which is of French ethnic origin, the rest being immigrants from mainly European countries and a very small English component) is economically exploited as well, as wage labourers in the capitalist productive process. Class and National Oppression are not as easily separable in reality as they are theory, because class lines in Quebec tend to coincide with national divisions. The bourgeoisie is almost completely English (Canadian and American), and the working class is almost wholly French; and the working class bears the brunt of the most severe forms of national oppression.

The evidence backs up this point. The working class, made up of farmers, manual, and non-manual workers (qualified, and unqualified) forms approximately 91 percent of the population of Quebec. The middle class (petite bourgeoisie), which we shall define as making use of its own capital and primarily its own labour, accounts for 9 percent of the population. The upper class (grande bourgeoisie), defined as those who utilize the capital and labour of others, divides into two groups. The foreign upper class, by far the most important in terms of economic control, provides an interesting study of the penetration of foreign capital in Quebec. The indigenous upper class is also difficult to identify. Census figures are of no use in this regard. Sociologist John Porter, in his famous study of Canadian society, The Vertical Mosaic, found that, based on statistics for the years 1949-1950, there are 51 persons in the indigenous upper class in Quebec, even though French Canadians make up one third of the population of Canada; further, of the 907 Canadian residents that make up the economic elite of Canada, only 7 per cent are of French origin. If one considers their real importance, in terms of the control they exercise, their under-representation is still more marked; since only a handful of these 51 individuals can be classed among the most important businessmen of the province. Dumais, in his study of the social classes in Quebec, notes that is is equally probable that a good number of these grande bourgeoisie are front men for American or Anglo-Canadian capital. Politically, he concludes, this indigenous upper class may be identified with the progressive faction of the middle class, or with the foreign elite, according to their degree of involvement with foreign capital.

Statistics on the economic neocolonialism of Quebec are equally as frightening. Quebec is rich in natural resources, principally timber, minerals and water for hydroelectric power. Further, Quebec had some crucial extras - the St. Lawrence Seaway and an untapped supply of cheap labour. American capital had little difficulty in moving in. Now, over 60 per cent of Quebec's industry is American owned, and another 20 per cent is ANgo-Canadian owned. Although English speaking Canadians make up less than 13 per cent of the population, they control, together with the Americans, all the important sectors of the economy - banking and finance, manufacturing and the resource industries.

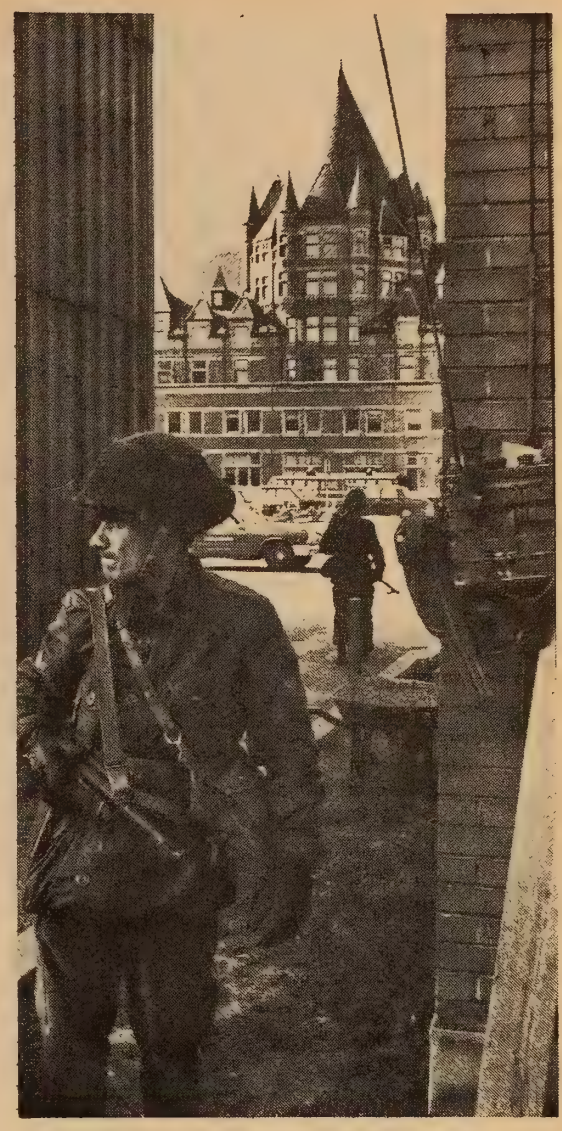
In his book, Colonialism in Quebec, Andre d'Allemange states that Quebec is being exploited by foreign powers to approximately the same degree as in the days of New France Some 60 per cent of Quebec is covered by forest, yet the pulp and paper industry is almost entirely controlled by Anglo-Canadian and American companies who have exploited the province's cheap labour and its forests without increasing its industrial capacity. Thus, the pulp and paper factories of Quebec produce no more today than they did in 1956 while the total world production has gone up by 41 percent since then.

The mines, particularly iron and copper mines, which produced some $500,000,000 in 1965 and are expected to triple their production in the next 20 years, are 64 per cent in American hands and 30 percent in the hands of Ontario. Typical of this domination is one Canadian mining corporation. Toronto-based Noranda Mines Ltd, which controls a whole series of company towns across northern Quebec. In the oldest and largest of these, Rouyn-Noranda, Noranda and its subsidiary, Quemont Mines, employ 2,200 of the town's 30,000 residents. When the city council wants to build a park, it has to get the company's approval -- and grant it an option to take over the land whenever it wants. With the local newspaper owned outright by Noranda Mines, it is not surprising that nothing has been said about the soot from Noranda's smelter which has destroyed all attempts at farming in the area.

Of about 50 large industrial corporations that control 75 percent of industrial and mining production in Quebec, only three (and these are the smallest) are owned by French Canadians. Of the companies, 34 have their head offices outside of Quebec, mainly in Toronto. There are even 16 who exploit the province with licences from other governments and 24 percent of the life insurance companies are under French Canadian ownership. In 1969, 85 percent of the chamical industry, 90 percent of the oil coal industry, and 85 percent of the auto factories were under foreign (ie. non French Canadian) control. Historically, foreign capital has left to Quebecois only those sectors of the economy which produced relatively limited profits, such as wholesale and retail trade. Recent statistics indicate that French Canadians control only 20 percent of the industry, 40 percent of the wholesale and 60 percent of the retail trade in Quebec.

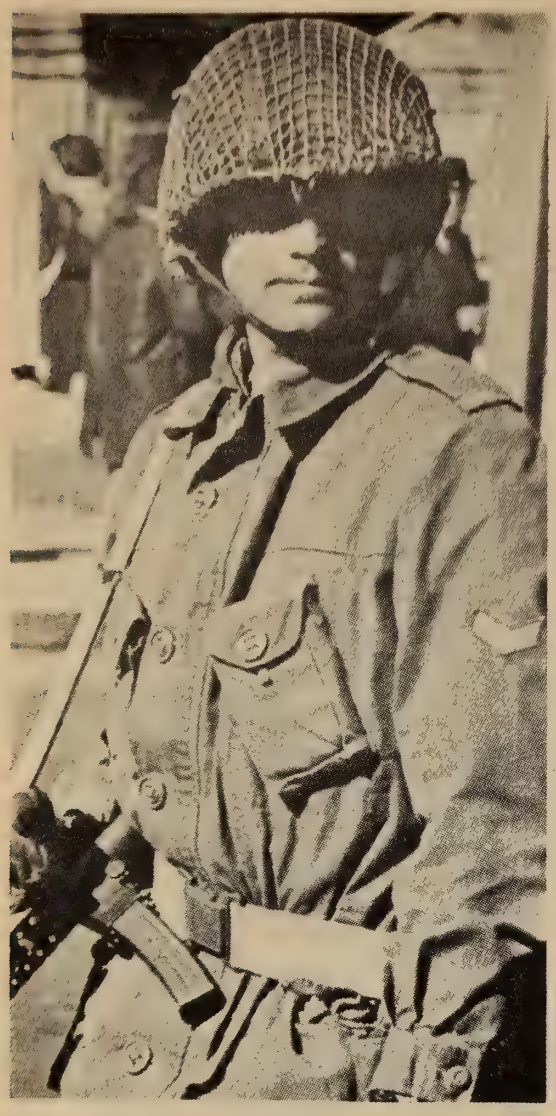
Today, one out of 11 working people in Quebec is out of a job. Quebec contains 41 percent of the unemployed in Canada (38 percent of the population of Canada is French-speaking); for the past 15 years, the number of unemployed workers in Quebec has ranged from 20-24 percent more than Canada as a whole. Quebec has always had disproportionately high unemployment rates, about 2 or 3 times that of Ontario, the other most industrialized region of Canada. The figures now, as high as 10-15 percent, are the highest in Canada.

Although forming about 83 per cent of the Total Quebec population, French Quebecois are at the bottom of the economic ladder; a study done for the ROYAL commission of Bilingualism and Biculturalism showed that of fourteen ethnic groups in Quebec, all but Italians (mostly new immigrants) and native Indians earned more than French Canadian earn in their own homeland.



The same federal government report disclosed a de facto racist policy of English Canadian and American corporations in Quebec towards French people. It is a general rule that one has to speak English to get a decent job in Quebec, but beyond this, the report showed that a person who speaks English only earns more than a bilingual French Quebecois, and that a person of English origin earns more than his French counterpart with an equal level of education and competence. Although the French form more than three-quarters of the work force, the report showed that 81 per cent of those earning more than $10,000 were of English origin. In Montreal, only 16 per cent of upper management positions are held by French, while 83 percent are of English origin.

But the situation in private industry is even more insidious than suggested by the above figures: 86 per cent of English-speaking persons earning more than $5,000 speak English only. One-half of French in managerial posts in English, Canadian and American companies thought that to get such a post, a French Quebecois had to be "more English than French".



Canadians of British origin have incomes 10 per cent higher than the average in every province except Quebec, where they earn 40 per cent more than average. The salaries of French Canadians in Quebec are 41 per cent lower than of those of English Canadians in Quebec.

The report states the obvious conclusions. "In Quebec," the authors write, "as in the rest of the country, it is better to be a unilingual English Canadian than a bilingual French Canadian . . . English Canadians have very little reason to become bilingual, even in Quebec, while for French Canadians, bilingualism is a prerequisite to income. And even if bilingual, French Canadians cannot hope to equal the salaries of unilingual English Canadians . . . In Quebec, it pays not to speak French."

What these results clearly demonstarte is the existence of de facto racist structures and practices against the French majority. The English language and the English minority in Quebec have a privileged and profitable position, and the Quebecois suffers from a cultural oppression that goes beyond strictly economic exploitation. As Michel Chartrand, Montreal president of the CNTU so clearly said: 'In Quebec, capital speaks English and the worker speaks French.'

Of about fifty large industrial corporations that control 75 per cent of industrial and mining production in Quebec, only three (and these are the smallest) are owned by French Canadians.

in the period between 1962 and 1964, a majority of workers outside the Montreal area earned between fifty and seventy-five cents an hour . . .

Development of an outlawed non-organization

The FLQ "was probably the first terrorist organization in legal history to be incorporated by a special act of Parliament," according to Ron Haggart and Aubrey Golden in their book Rumours of War. They point out that the FLQ is apparently not an organization at all, but an idea, a rubric which various groups of violent nationalists dredge up from time to time when they want to justify some bombing. Anyone could "revive" the FLQ at any time. It is a collection of autonomous terrorist cells whose members probably do not know of the existence of other cells, or certainly not all of them.

The FLQ has had a ten-year history, seven of those years as a terrorist organization. It is not impossible that none of its present members were in the FLQ at its inception. As new terrorist cells are formed, they inevitably take the name FLQ, the name of the original romantic revolutionaries of the early '60s whose bombs indicated all was not well in the Quiet Revolution.

It was in 1960 that George Shoesters, a 33-year-old economics student at the University of Montreal decided that "time had come to sow in the province a spirit of independence." He was not alone among French-Canadian students in this belief. The dictatorial Duplessis era had just ended and university radicals, conscious of the inferior status of French-Canadians in their own province, believed independence from Canada was the first step necessary in a social revolution for Quebec.

At first the FLQ, despite its militant separatism, had not contemplated violent revolution. Its members joined the Rassemblement pour l'Independance Nationale, a small umbrella group for separatists. They were quickly disenchanted with RIN and its emphasis on parliamentary methods. Instead they contented themselves with writing revolutionary slogans on walls and shouting denunciations of politicians at political rallies in the 1962 and 1963 federal elections. Finally, they decided to use bombs.

On April 20, 1963, a bomb went off in a garbage can behind the army recruiting centre in Montreal William O'Neill, a night watchman, was killed.

On May 17, 1963, Montreal was hit by an unprecedented wave of bombings. Some 15 time-bombs were placed in various mailboxes in Westmount, the upperclass Anglo-Canadian section of Montreal. An army bomb disposal expert, Sargent Walter Leja, was maimed while trying to dismantle one of their bombs. But, according to Savoie, the FLQ was then too amateurish to escape detection. Seven arrests were enough to end the first round of FLQ activity.

Nevertheless a certain romanticism attached to the first amateurish cells of the FLQ, mainly because their manifesto, written in April 1963, drew wide attention after the bombings started and appealed to some students and young workers.

The publicity which surrounded the trial of the FLQ seven brought new people into their ranks. New terrorist cells formed, taking the name FLQ. Most of the 1963 cells however were apparently broken by the police and it wasn't until late 1965 that the FLQ really returned upon the Quebec scene.

Nevertheless, in the interval, they were much discussed in the independentist press. PARTIPRIS, a militant separatist magazine, explained in September 1964 that the FLQ had turned to violence because "they wished to awaken the consciousness of the people to their colonial condition...the passage from polemics to action constituted a progression from ideological combat to political struggle."

The idea that random acts of terrorism would give the people of Quebec the courage to throw off their chains and form an independent state was thus part of FLQ ideology from the beginning. None of the FLQ cells ever saw themselves as making the revolution; they believed that they were the spark that would ignite the people to revolutionary action.

Although the early cells of the FLQ were quickly broken by the Montreal police, the cells active in 1965-66, were far more sophisticated. Many of the members of these cells had brought back information from abroad on how to work underground without being apprehended. The 1965-66 cells moved into labor struggles, planting bombs at such places as Dominion Textiles and the La Grenade Shoe Co., companies notorious for their anti-labor policies. While the FLQ saw themselves as striking out against the ruling class with their bombs, the bombs had a strange habit of only blowing up cleaning ladies and janitors. The result was that, to a large degree, the people whom the FLQ wanted to reach, saw them as indiscriminate murderers. From the 1966 cells came two heroes of the FLQ - Pierre Vallieres and Charles Gagnon, arrested in the bombing death of Therese Morin, whose "crime" was that, in the province with the highest unemployment, she took a scab job at the La Grenade shoe factory during its bitter strike in 1966.

Nevertheless, if the FLQ were still sloppy in their terrorism, their new involvement in labor struggles reflected, as Bourgault says "an enlarging of their ideological premises: no longer was national liberation their sole aim. They were more and more concerned with Quebec's social and economic problems. Independence alone, they came to see, was not the whole solution."

The 1966 cells, unlike those of 1963, were also involved in holdups to finance their activities, in raids on armories, shops and quarries to secure guns, ammunition and dynamite.

The round-up of a number of the members of the 1965-66 FLQ cells gave the Montreal police only a temporary reprieve. By 1968 the bombings were frequent again. This time, besides hitting strike-bound companies and federal buildings, the FLQ also bombed the offices of non-Quebec-owned corporations, political party headquarters and the homes of politicians and corporation executives. In a 20-month period in 1968-69, there were 100 attempted bombings.

Still, it is doubtful whether the FLQ, at any time, had more than 100-150 members. The bombings were sporadic enough that the day-to-day business of Quebec never came to a halt. Nevertheless, the mass demonstrations in the streets of Montreal - up to 30,000 demonstrators at a time - indicated growing revolutionary consciousness among Quebec's students and some of the young workers. Their discontent was too strong for democratic separatist organizations like the Parti Quebecois to contain. And, in November, 1969, Mayor Drapeau, following long-standing anti-civil libertarian traditions in Quebec, banned all demonstrations in Montreal. It would not be surprising however if the ranks of the FLQ doubled after Drapeau's arbitrary action.

That is not to say Mayor Drapeau did not know what he was doing. Drapeau hoped to prevent the workers' movement from growing militant the way the student movement had by banning the demonstrations that more and more were drawing workers and students together.

The government last October credited the FLQ with 2,000 members but the arrests made after the invocation of the War Measures Act - mainly labor leaders, Pari Quebecois and FRAP leaders - indicate that the government cannot really have any accurate way of calculating membership in FLQ cells.

The escalation of FLQ activities from bombings to kidnappings was not entirely unpredictable. The RCMP had known for some time that a sprinkling of young Quebecers had gone to Cuba and Palestine in the last few years to receive guerrilla training. An article by Patricia Welbourn in WEEKEND magazine only a few weeks before the kidnappings indicated how serious the FLQ was. Miss Welbourn interviewed two young Quebecois training with Arab commandos in Jordan. They were learning the art of "selective assassination."

Explained one of the two FLQ-ers: "For too long the FLQ has been synonymous with bombs and useless violence. We intend to pick our targets so that the people who are responsible will pay."

So there was a judgment on the effects of the FLQ to 1970: their violence was "useless" in mobilizing support behind them. Apparently however they saw kidnapping and murder as a more useful form of violence toward this end.

The FLQ Manifesto

Page 20 of this edition of The Queen's Journal was to carry the FLQ Manifesto, published during last year's October crisis in Quebec. On the advice of legal counsel we have declined to publish the manifesto because of the possibilities of libel and sedition contained therein.

In addition, we checked with the offices of the Solicitor-General and the Department of Justice to obtain a clear-cut answer on whether or not the manifesto was legal to publish. Neither department would commit itself to a decision, negative or affirmative.

In view of this, and in view of the fact that we could be held responsible for printing the manifesto should the War Measures Act ever be enforced again, we have declined to print it at this time.

Water symposium talks of resources

The Canadian government must become more sensitive to the population in the directing of Canada's natural resources if the country is to remain a viable democracy, member of parliament David Anderson said Wednesday during the day-long symposium on water resources management.

Sponsored by the Engineering Society and the W. W. King Lectures Committee, the symposium chiefy looked at the Canadian government's role in managing the water supply.

Dr. J. P. Bruce, director of the Canada Centre for Inland Waters, began the afternoon session with a discussion of government responsibility in water resources management. I. W. McCaig presented a study he had made of the water requirements of western Canada. And, also in the afternoon, Bernard Michel of Laval University told of research now being done on water resources.

The evening was more informal; Anderson commented on government policy and public responsibility in the management of water resources, and was followed by an open discussion.

The most controversial of the topics discussed were the Peace River plan and the James Bay power and light project.

McCaig said the Peace River programme was an example of government insensitivity to social costs. Many trappers were forced into unemployment when the project covered their lands with water, McCaig said.

In his address, Anderson suggested that government documents should be made more public so that Canadians could be more informed about water management activities and that wider discussion and knowledge could exist.

Dr. A. Brebner,head of the department of civil engineering at Queen's, and a member of the evening panel, suggested that an inter-faculty board should be set up to review government water projects from a variety of viewpoints.

The panel also discussed phosphate elimination and commented on the heat introduced into the great lakes by atomic power stations at Pickering, west of Oshawa, and Douglas Point on Georgian Bay.

ASUS hears arguments about course guide

Widely different opinions about this year's course evaluation guide when the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society held a meeting last Tuesday to discuss it.

The ASUS executive talked particularly about how to choose the committee which will organize this year's guide. There were objections to the de facto approach used last year; this year a nominating committee will recommend names to the executive, either for several committee members or merely for a committee head. ASUS is accepting applications for the organizing committee until Friday of this week.

A financial report for last year's course guide, the first of its kind, was also presented. An effort was made to keep costs down, it was stated, but about $1400 more than the original $6800 budget was eventually spent on the course guide.

There was general discussion of whether the course guide had achieved its purpose. Its original aim was to provide information to fill a gap which the official University calendar leaves, course guide coordinator Peter Raymont said. And Raymont said he thought the purpose had been fulfilled.

The book provided a large pool of useful information, Raymont said. And he declared that the public criticism made by some faculty members about the course guide may reflect success in bringing about necessary changes in their departments.

But the guide has faults, a number of people at the meeting pointed out. In some cases, it was agreed, the statistics presented are in error; the format in which they are printed also is confusing. Some speakers said the faculty members' comments in the book were poor, and that the book's effect on incoming freshmen is uncertain.

It was suggested that one way to overcome difficulties with the statistics would be to have less of them, and more written comments, which hopefully could show the range of student opinions.

Another suggestion was that a warning be printed, especially in the book of first year courses, commenting on the meaning and validity of some of the statistics, and the importance of the guide as a whole.

The course evaluation guide definitely will be published again this year, the ASUS agreed.

Its format has not been determined yet, ASUS vice-president Nancy Hoey said. Details will be worked out after the committee or coordinator for the project is chosen by the ASUS executive October 25.

The prize-winning float in Saturday's homecoming parade was the work of civil engineers and rehab girls. It was built by 30 members of the two groups, organized by Engineering Society communications director Bill Patterson and rehab therapy president Donna Tuck. The parade theme, "Kaleidoscope", was followed in the float's design: tricolor rainbow.

Liberal leader visits Queen's

Ontario premier William Davis is "sucking and whistling at the same time", Liberal leader Robert Nixon said at Queen's Wednesday.

The opposition leader charged that while Davis claims he is not making promises, he has announced Project Spadina (a development on the site intended for the cancelled Spadina Expressway), free medical care for pensioners, and development of a lignite deposit near Moosonee.

"When Mr. Davis accuses the opposition of being spendthrift, he is living in a glass house, and it is a pleasure for me to throw a brick at it," Nixon told an audience of about 400 at City Hall.

"After 28 years of Conservative rule, waste is a watchword in Ontario government."

Nixon, who will be premier of Ontario if the Liberals win Thursday's election, criticized the Davis government's policy on education spending and its administration of OHSIP health insurance.

A Liberal government would reduce the number of government departments from 24 to 12, Nixon said, improving efficiency of operation. Each new department would have a broadened scope.

He said tax-exempt property, which includes the Queen's campus, should pay to city government a grant in lieu of taxes amounting to 50 percent of what the taxes would be. This would be done if a Liberal government would be in power, Nixon said.

Earlier in the day, Wednesday, Nixon visited the Queen's campus, spoke with students on the sidewalk at University Avenue and Union Street and answered questions in the second-floor common room of the Union.

Principal speaks at high school

Educational facilities should be expanded only with great caution, Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch said Wednesday at the dedication ceremony for renovations to a local high school.

Such expansion is justified, Deutsch said, only if it helps students achieve the real purposes of development of the individual and self-discipline.

The principal was the keynote speaker, and laid the cornerstone, at the dedication of renovations made to Sydenham High School northwest of Kingston.

He pointed out that the wide scope of courses now offered by secondary schools is the key to individual development, and that self-discipline means the instilling of responsibility and a true sense of values.

Expansion must incorporate these goals, Deutsch said, to allow the individual to think independently, wisely, constructively and responsibly.

Ban Righ alarms go on Another fire alarm sounded in Adelaide and Ban Righ Halls Friday night, but the reason was different this time, according to Addy-Ban Righ block chairman Pat Culm.

Miss Culm told the Journal she thought the most recent alarm, which sounded at 11:15 Friday evening, was the result of electrical troubles which affected a transformer in the university's central heating plant.

Electric power in Adelaide, Ban Righ, Chown Hall and other buildings at the south end of the campus went off a few seconds before the alarm sounded and was off for about an hour.

It was this year's seventh false fire alarm at Adelaide-Ban Righ. The alarms have come from a variety of technical problems, Miss Culm said. One difficulty was a malfunction in the building's water heater, which raised the temperature of the hot water so much that when water was run in a janitor's closet steam triggered a sensing device nearby.

A few girls are not bothering to leave the building when the fire alarm sounds, Miss Culm said, and she pointed out that this could be dangerous.

"I just hate to think of what could happen" if a fire did occur after the sequence of false alarms, Miss Culm said.

"It's getting on a lot of girls' nerves," she said, but everyone must leave the building when an alarm sounds. She pointed out that when the Kingston fire department responds to an alarm firemen do inspect the building for stragglers.

One girl who slept through Friday night's alarm was awakened by firemen and escorted from the building, Miss Culm said.

ASUS elects councillors

Academic representatives to the arts and science student government will be elected tomorrow night by DSC representatives across the faculty of arts and science.

DSC reps from all departments are invited by the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society to meet in three groups: humanities and fine arts; social sciences, which includes geography, psychology and physical education as well as the strict social sciences; and natural sciences (including mathematics).

Each group will elect one divisional councillor, and the three will become members of the nine-member ASUS executive, its chief governing body.

The divisional councillors are responsible for conducting liaison between the ASUS and the departmental student councils.

The meetings of DSC representatives to elect them will be held at 9:00 tomorrow evening in the theatres of Stirling Hall.

Judy Lamarsh speaks out for women

by Rachael Edwards

Judy LaMarsh speaking at Queen's Wednesday, made a strong plea that women be accepted at equals in society.

Miss LaMarsh, who describes herself as having "my father's features and my mother's fixtures", was the featured speaker at the Commerce Society's Banquet One in the Union.

Mossman

Judy LaMarsh speaking at the Commerce banquet. She told listeners that Thursday's election will produce a three-party split, but "things haven't shaken down yet" and she would make no specific prediction.

A lawyer from Niagara Falls, she became known across Canada during her years as minister of health and welfare, and then secretary of state, in Lester Pearson's cabinet.

Women's time has come, said Miss LaMarsh, now that intellectual power, rather than physical strength, is the chief requisite for a good job.

She said the roles played by primitive people -- men as providers and women as child-bearers -- are largely responsible for the roles being played in 1971.

Miss LaMarsh noted that the contraceptive pill is the single thing which has enabled women to free themselves from the role which was forced on them. Now that they can control conception, they are free to choose their own roles -- career, motherhood, or both -- she said.

"And abortion is the natural extension of the pill," Miss LaMarsh said. But, she said, abortion should be 'a girl's private choice", based on her own personal reasons.

"If a woman is thought to be good enough to decide how to bring up her child," she said, "then should be intelligent enough to decide whether or not to bear it."

She said she had little respect for hospital boards which "look down their noses at the girl" and make her "lay bare her shame".

If abortion were made available to everyone, Miss LaMarsh said, then each child born would be loved and needed and have a special place in the family.

She pointed out that in recent years more and more women have joined the labour force and are competing with men.

By the end of this century, 90 percent of married women will work outside the home at some time, she said.

But, Miss LaMarsh said, at present it is difficult for women to enter certain professions. For example, she said, at present there are five positions open on the Supreme Court of Canada, and there are five women qualified to fill them, but only one woman will be appointed.

"And why is it that just girls are waiting on tables tonight?" she questioned, looking around Wallace Hall cafeteria. "And why is it always the male dean and his lady at the head table?"

The problem will not be easy to solve, Miss LaMarsh said. She urged men to stop thinking of women as inferior beings, and to stop telling mother-in-law jokes and jokes about women drivers.

She appealed to parents to teach their children that the world isn't limited on a sexual basis, and that boys and girls do have equal opportunities.

"It is a revolution that must come from within oneself and from training without. It has begun. It must continue because it is irreversible."

Commune meeting planned

The French and history departments will sponsor a conference, this Thursday through Sunday, on the Paris commune of 1871.

The events of the Paris commune, which lasted from March 18 to May 28 in 1871, make that episode a suitable focus for interdisciplinary study, according to Dr. Pierre Gobin of the French department, an organizer of the event. Because of its intensity and its tragic end, the commune was an inspiration to French dramatists, Gobin said, and it also raised questions of methodology in the study of revolutions by historians and sociologists.

A number of speakers will be discussing different aspects of the commune. In addition, a special graphics display, on the fifth floor of Watson Hall, will be open all day starting tomorrow

Two films will be shown on Friday: "The New Babylon", made in the Soviet Union, will be shown at the Hyland Theatre downtown at 12.30 on Friday, and "Paris au Temps des Cerises" at 9 pm the same day in a common room in the Student Union.

Co-organizers with Gobin are Dr. J.A. Leith, head of the department of history, and Dr John Meisel and Dr. Hugh Thorburn of the politics department. Much of the material being used for the symposium is from the collection of the late Dr. Glen Shortliffe of the department of French.

Alfie has supported Gaels for a century now

by Chris Redmond

The Queen's Bands have sold more than half the 1600 "Alfie sez Go Gaels Go" buttons they had in stock, bands manager Doug Romans said Sunday.

Romans said he was pleased with the enthusiasm with which Queen's students are wearing the buttons; and he asked the Journal to tell the campus where Alfie comes from.

Alfie today

Alfie, as he appears on the buttons, was drawn in 1969 by Queen's artist (and former Journal editor) John McIntyre. He was named, and brought into campus publicity, in 1971 by USI Graphics.

But the original Alfie was Alfie Pierce, trainer, fan and friend of the Golden Gaels for almost seventy years. Born in 1874, Alfie Pierce was brought to the Queen's playing field as a water boy by legendary Gaels captain Guy Curtis, who found the curly-haired black boy walking home from the Gordon Street school (where Ban Righ Hall now stands).

From that time until he died in 1951, Alfie belonged to Queen's. He became trainer and then he was just friend of all the athletic teams; in the summer he lived beneath the Richardson Stadium stands, and in the winter his home was a small room in the old Jock Harty Arena (the site is occupied now by Humphrey Hall.

Returning Queen's athletes would go to talk with Alfie, and he remembered them, their accomplishments, and the glories of Queen's teams long graduated. Present students listened to his reminiscences eagerly as well.

And each time the Golden Gaels played a home football game, Alfie would step out onto the field with the cheerleaders, dressed in a gay tricolor costume and peaked cap. Thousands of loyal fans would shout together, "What's the matter with Alfie?" and then the answer: "He's all right!"

Waving his cap, escorted by two cheerleaders, Alfie would come over to the Queen's stands to lead a Queen's yell -- the words which come at the end of the oil thigh now.

And then the football game would begin, with the Queen's crowd yelling, as always, "Go Gaels Go!"

Alfie still sez that

Residence women meet

There will be a general meeting of residence women tomorrow night, the president of women's residence has announced.

WRC president Cindy Davidson

said Sunday that proposals for coed residence will be only one of the topics the meeting could consider.

The recommendations made by the coed residence study committee were considered by the Women's Residence Council executive last night and then discussed at residence floor meetings. The Inter-Residence Council, in men's residences, will take it up tomorrow evening.

Miss Davidson said one purpose of the general meeting is to let residence women know who their representatives are and how residence government works.

Various questions which affect the quality of life in the four residences will also be discussed, she said.

The meeting is at 6:30 p.m. Wednesday in the lower common room of Victoria Hall.

AMS session cancelled

The AMS had to cancel the meeting it had planned for last night to discuss athletic policies and facilities at Queen's.

The reports which were to be presented and discussed by the AMS outer council were "boggled beyond belief", AMS vice-president Victor Bradley told the Journal.

A committee was scheduled to meet last night to get them organized, he said.

Exam period shorter

The final exam period in arts and science will be only two weeks this coming April, rather than three weeks as it has been in the past.

This decision was made during the summer by the arts and science faculty board, and approved by the senate. It means arts and science exams will begin April 17 and end April 29.

One result of the shortening is that students can begin summer work a week sooner. There was some complaint last spring that the long Queen's exam period put Queen's students at a disadvantage in competing for summer jobs.

Other reasons were considered as well, according to student senator Paul Burke. The shorter exam period will give professors more time to mark exams, and will reduce the pressure on those who are arranging convocations.

The university council, the official body which sets exam dates, approved the change to give more time for preparation of degree lists after the deadline for submission of marks.

And the shorter period, together with a better arrangement of exams, should reduce pressure on students, not stretch the pressure out over a month as has been the case in past years, the faculty board decided.

First year picks reps

Nursing Sci

First-year nursing students at Queen's have elected Carol Daigle as 1971-72 president of Nursing 75.

Miss Daigle, who comes from North Bay, represents forty first-year students in the regular four-year B.N.Sc. programme and ten more in the three-year post-RN degree programme.

She told the Jornal that, since the year is so small, her most important duty will be to build a loyalty to the year and then plan activities with other faculties to make that loyalty known.

The latest installment of nursing's publicity campaign was seen this past weekend: "Love a nurse for Homecoming!"

Engineering

Science 75 came together last Tuesday and chose Dennis Chouinard of Sault Sainte Marie as their president for this year.

Chouinard is active in other campus affairs as well: he takes part in Bews intramural sports and is a departmental student council representative too.

Representing 407 students, Chouinard said he had set as his goal the building of a Science 75 spirit that will last the full four years of the programme. Various projects already planned will make this goal easier, he said.

Vice-president of Science 75 will be Rein Raudsepp. Treasurer is Paul Roberts, social convenor, Dan Fulling; secretary, Jim Blight; athletic sticks, Steve Zelikovitz and Dave Armstrong; year scribe, Jim Dee. Section representatives to the Engineering Society executive are Pat Chance, Tim Groulx, Reinout Reilingh, and Wolter Wagter.

Phys ed

Phys Ed 75 has elected Patricia Johnson and Bob Halladay as first-year representatives to the Physical and Health Education Students Association.

Representing 30 men and 40 women, the two first-year presidents will be busy gathering information and planning events, awards and trips which affect their year.

Miss Johnson said she is looking to close association with other years in the phys ed programme to create a faculty spirit, especially through the big brother - big sister programme.

Hallady said that because PHE 75 is so active, Queen's will find it setting some new records.

PHE 75 will be responsible for putting together the phys ed newsletter this year, Halladay said.

Phys ed students are represented both through PHESA and through the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society.

Globe takes a stand

..He was the first head of government in Canada to introduce a comprehensive program-$63-million-to counteract the effects of the U.S. measures by stimulating the economy and creating jobs. At that time he urged the federal Government to introduce tax cuts, of which Ontario's share, in loss of revenue, would be $30-million. On Thursday night Ottawa did what he urged.

Yesterday Mr. Davis announced tax cuts on personal incomes to match the federal cuts, starting Jan. 1, 1972, and amounting in a year to $42-million. He did not cut corporation taxes: the 5 percent tax credit for new industrial machinery and equipment had already, in the Ontario budget, provided the stimulation for expansion which Ottawa belatedly recognized Thursday was necessary.

..This was action, strong and consistent action that tackled Ontario's economic problems where they exist—out there in the plants and shops where confidence has been faltering.

Mr. Davis has been uniformly strong in his judgments since he became Premier. Not all of the judgments have been easy or popular. It would have been easy to abandon regionalization of schools and economic regions where the growing pains have been severe; but regionalization is essential if we are to prosper; it would be cowardly to throw away what has been accomplished just as it begins to work.

It was not easy to put a lid on education spending—education was Mr. Davis's own baby—but he put a lid on education spending. It was not easy to stop the Spadina Expressway, but he stopped the Spadina Expressway. It was not easy to refuse to extend grants to separate schools, but he refused.

These decisions were all hard to make and certain to antagonize some of the electorate; but they were the right decisions and Mr. Davis made them.

We are in tough and difficult and dangerous times. We need a man who is strong enough to make hard decisions, who can have impact in affecting the sometimes maverick tendencies of Ottawa.

On the basis of the record, it can only be William Davis.

Voting doesn't ensure democracy

By Vaughan Lyon

Most Ontario voters will come from the polls on Oct. 21 feeling dissatisfied, and with good reason. Intuitively they sense that the much vaunted election rite is archaic, needing to be thoroughly overhauled, if not discarded.

The electorate's choice is circumscribed by various power-seeking elites who dominate the political parties and nominate the candidates. It is satisfying to be able to topple the "mighty" from office once in a while even if only to replace them with a quite similar group.

But we are still an enormous political distance away from a situation where citizens can routinely exercise the right to make basic political decisions affecting their lives, instead of depending on a professional ruling class.

As a means of choosing between candidates "A" and "B", the present system is satisfactory. But, because elections are the citizen's only formal means of exercising power, we try to make them do far more.

We impose so many incompatible demands on elections that they perform none well.

Consider the current dilemma of the conscientious voter who wants his vote to have an impact. He may want to:

a) shake up a government that appears complacent and inefficient,

b)support an excellent MPP who is a member of the opposition,

c) keep the present premier in office,

d) condemn certain government policies, applaud some and suggest others.

A simple "X" can hardly express a voter's views on all of these matters. He has to rank them in priority and vote accordingly.

Not only is this ranking difficult, but he knows that his opinion is likely to be lost when thrown in with thousands of others with differing priorities.

But hasn't the citizen of a democracy the right, or even the duty, to assert an opinion on each of these issues?

There exists a dangerous juxtaposition of trends -- an increasing public concern about political issues, and a growing cynicism about the vacuousness of the existing methods of consulting the citizen on those issues.

There are, of course, many ways, other than voting by which the citizen can attempt to influence political events. He can join a party or pressure group, write newspaper articles, demonstrate write his MP and so on.

dominated by pressure groups. The means of influence are so unevenly distributed that most citizens are powerless.

My democratic ideal is not a competitive free-for-all of warring factions where all organize to promote their private interests, or what they perceive to be the public interest.

This may be "participatory democracy" a la Trudeau, but a more elevating ideal system is one where the individual is kept well-informed on the issues facing the country, and regularly takes part in deciding the appropriate governmental action.

In such a system the views of all -- the rich and the poor, the aggressive and the reticent -- have the same weight; interest groups have to convince the public rather than a key politician, or bureaucrat, in order

These alternative forms of political action, however, are unsatisfactory for two basic reasons.

First, there is no equity in a system where the government is to get action by public authorities.

Second, a system which denies the citizen a direct role in determining policy puts him in a subservient relationship vis-a-vis the politician.

He must go hat in hand (between elections) to ask for government action. He is less than a complete person because he delegates an important aspect of his life to the control of others.

He isn't consulted on most decisions and accepts no responsibility for what happens. There is little incentive to "grow up" and participate in building a healthy community.

In a fully democratic system elections should be minor political events -- just the opportunity to choose between delegates who will follow the direction of their constituents.

The major preoccupation of citizens shhould be the formation of public policy.

And a whole range of new institutions is needed to connect the citizen directly to the decision-making process.

If you don't plan to vote...

It may come as a surprise to you as a voter that there is an alternative to voting for the three parties which exist in Ontario.

Under section 87 of the Election Act as amended July, 1971, a voter may receive his ballot and without making any mark on it whatsoever, he may hand the ballot back, while proclaiming, "I decline this ballot." The ballot must then be placed in the deputy returning officer's envelope marked "declined ballots' and must be counted with all the others and the total reported as "declined ballots" with the other three totals.

This seems to be a much better way of rebuking our politicians than merely abstaining, where your motives might be misinterpreted as apathy or laziness.

It is hard to be impressed with "freedom" in this country when fear of the national government's possible future actions can prevent the publication of a document, like the FLQ manifesto, without its having been claimed to be, let alone proven to be, libelous or seditious, but only contrary to the beliefs of the present ruling party.

Elrond

How happy we are to hear that the work on Elrond College is progressing apace! How lucky are we, who will have the good fortune to move into one of these reasonably priced units, reasonably priced, that is, for Kingston! If we get nothing more out of our stay at Queen's, then it will have been enough to have had this new-Living-experience, the advantages of which have been discussed so much already.

How proud, too, we shall feel to be part of Kingston's developing skyline, clearly visible, beside the twelve storied block on Brock St., from mighty Highway 401! How our hearts will swell, when Hemlock Park Dairy builds its new apartment complex roughly between Elrond and its Skyline block. What a skyline Kingston will then have! It won't be a hick town any more. In fact, we'll almost be able to imagine ourselves in sophisticated Toronto, as we view, from our windows on the southern side of Elrond, the splendid panorama of continuous apartment blocks. What a fantastic experience in semi-communal living!

Then, apart from all the good things they'll have for us in Elrond itself, we'll be able to walk out to at least three pizza parlours and two movie theatres, all, like the apartment buildings, within a block of our front door.

And as we walk the windy street, we'll wonder what new goodie they'll erect for us on the corner right opposite, where the Texaco station used to be.

Vandals?

Dear Editors:

The letter from Robin Beaudoin and Donald McGeorge was indeed an excellent exhibition of twisted ideas. They attempted to extoll the virtues of throwing colour TV's from tenth storey windows at various major hotels in Toronto under the guise of Queen's spirit. I am sure some people enjoy such activities but they are mostly suffering from sick and demented minds.

To parallet spirit with malicious destruction is illogical and stupid. Rocky and Spike)the names seem to typify their mentality) are advocating irresponsible destruction of private property for the exhibition of spirit. I am sure that they wouldn't sit back and laugh if someone threw their TV set through their window in the name of Queen's spirit.

The Journal was justified in asking for a semblance of order in the celebrations. You can raise hell and create disturbances without going to such extremes as Rocky and Spike advocate. Slackening of fibre need not be sacrificed for moderation of activities.

"When first the walls begin to crack then soon the house comes tumbling down." Yes and let's hope that the Westbury and Park Plaza remain uncracked by a bunch of vandalizing animals rampaging in the name of Queen's spirit as Rocky and Spike desire.

Mary Lloyd-Jones -NDP

Mary Lloyd-Jones was born in London, England, and is a social science graduate of Glasgow University. After World War 11, during which she was an evacuation welfare officer, Mrs. Lloyd-Jones worked for the Labour Party and ran for county office in 1946. She came to Canada in 1953. In 1960 she joined the New Democratic Party, and for the past seven years has been involved in municipal politics as a member and deputy reeve of the Loughboro Township Council.

What do you think are the main issues?

I do think the tax-exempt land is important locally, and of course, the Wolfe Island ferry. But the question of employment is important for the whole province and it is, in fact, particularly important here because the way in which the welfare rolls have swollen in the last year or two are directly connected with the depression in the economy

Then, of course, housing. That is partly a question of employment. It is true that houses are being built. The trouble is that there are a great many people who are not able to afford the houses that are being built. There is, in fact, an overall shortage of housing but more than that, there is an overall shortage of adequate housing that people can afford.

Then of course, the question of the environment. I don't really think you can separate these things. They are all part of a whole, good life. It's obvious that the environment is a matter of great concern. Some of these are part of town planning and town planning ties in which the economy and housing and some of them are a result, from my view, of a complete lack of concern on the part of the present government.

Of course, they say they are doing things. They say, yes, they have been prosecuting industries. Sure, they have. In the past few years, they have had 64 prosecutions of companies, 14 of them this year, and the average fine is something like $353. From companies like Domtar, Abitibi Paper and Union Carbide who have been making millions in profits and worse than that, are receiving the forgiveable loans from the government. They are using our money, tax-payers money, to defeat us. Here are some figures: Domtar made a profit of $17,618,000 last year and was given from the Equilization of Opportunity Fund, in 1969, $439,333 and in 1970, was given $484,008, a total of $923,541, and for pollution, they were fined $1,000. Abitibi Paper received $500,000 from the Equalization Fund in 1969 and paid fines of $350 in 1970 and $500 in 1971 and, after taxes made a profit of $5,032,000 in 1970. And then the government said that it is taking a firm line against pollution. I think the whole thing is just plain damn ridiculous.

We believe in very firm penalties. Actually, the law is there. The laws says that for a conviction, the penalty for the first offence is $5,000 - that is the maximum - and for second offenses, $10,000. So far as I know, the maximum penalty has never been applied. I believe that this is the first place to start. There are other ways to combat pollution, too, but still, in the first instance let's use the laws that are already on the statute books. And let's apply the maximum penalty.

Do you also believe that government should give tax incentives to get companies to clean up?

When they are making $17 million profit? No.

What about a company that can prove that if they pay the money to clean up, it will bankrupt them. Then do you think tax incentives or loans should be given?

No. If they could prove such a thing - and the type of company that we are talking about now I doubt could prove such a thing - I wouldn't give tax incentives and I wouldn't give interest free loans. But if it were really demonstrable that they really could not afford these measures without going bankrupt, then I would apply such money as was needed to assist in this clean up operation as share capital.

But on the other hand, I would be more constructive than that. There is great scope within our universities for a whole new line of technology. You know, an awful lot of our science graduates have been going to the States because there wasn't opportunity here and have been getting involved in the space and missiles programme. I think it would be useful if encouragement and incentives were given for a whole new line of technological development in this country, that our scientists and technologists were looking into the whole problems of such things as soot scrubbers, air purifiers, etc. so that when new factories are built, they aren't using the old out-dated methods but that they are in fact building non-polluting factories, with new methods of dealing with polluting water. One of my pet views is that there is a whole field open for the development for new methods of sewage disposal. Take Kingston. Kingston was one of the first, I think it was the first city in Canada, to put in a sewage disposal plant, and by now it is out of date. It is inadequate for the demands being put on it. All around us, Barriefield Village, Kingston Township, Loughboro Township - everywhere around we find villages that simply don't have sewage disposal systems. Sydenham, at this moment, is the process of negotiating for a sewage disposal system, which will add, if we get a water supply as well, something like $250 a year to the average property tax. Fine, we don't think we can afford it but on the other hand we can't afford not to. It isn't a project that is 20 years ahead. It is still the same sort of project that has been in operation for the last 50 years. I think that we ought to have technologists who can project themselves 20 years ahead, that we ought to be having really up to date methods.

What would you do about foreign investment?

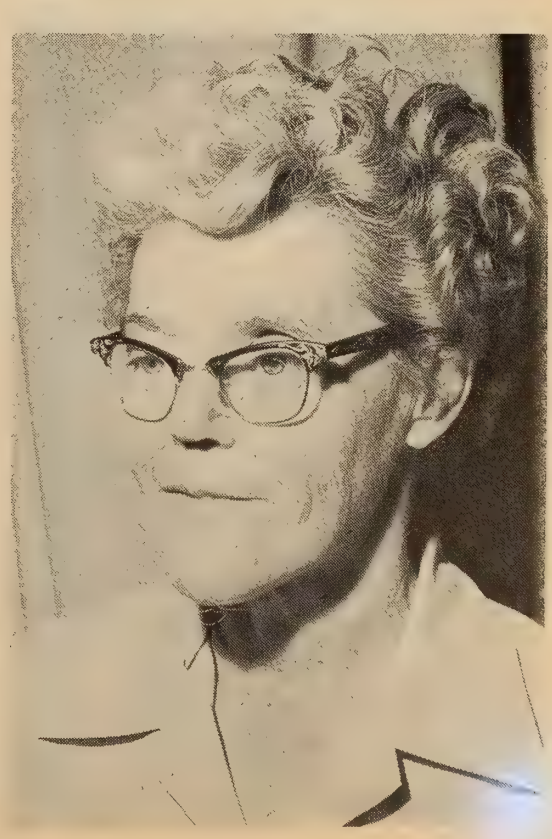
I don't think it is entirely a question of eliminating the influence. I think it is a question of entering into a partnership with industry. I have already spoken about forgiveable loans. This is money which is lost to our economy because we are actually permitting foreign companies to take over our economy with our money. I would use this money to buy equity in the companies. To begin with, of course nationalization is the term which is always used - it is a bit of a buggaboo, people are always frightened of nationalization. I don't think nationalization is all the answer, though I do think it is in some instances. Just as Hydro is a provincially owned corporation and nobody seems to object to Hydro being so operated, I think, that in the first instance, natural gas should come under the same type of control and ownership as Hydro is, because after all, it is one of our major raw materials and we have no idea at the moment what the future use for natural gas, what the future demand for natural gas, is going to be, and it does appear at the moment to be one of the least polluting fuels available. At the present time, the present government is simply permitting the full scale export of natural gas. I think we ought to establish some real control of this.

I think we view nationalization as a last resort. It is my view that nationalization need only be a last resort, because I think that it has been just too easy for companies to buy in and ship the capital out. We are sending far more capital out of the country than we are actually receiving on an annual basis.

Do you think Canada would be able to do it on her own?

Yes, I do. Not as quickly, but I can't see any reason why Canada could not have developed it's own paper industry.

What do you think of high costs and high rents?



When we come to things like high costs and high rents, I don't think this has anything to do with the students at all. I think it has to do with government policy. Queen's does, in fact, occupy a fairly large proportion of the area of the city, and because of the government policy, the cost of maintaining the services of the city has been very largely bought by the property owners. In order to keep up with our own type of living, they have increased rents and may very well have increased rents exorbitantly, and it may very well be that some of the costs in stores, (I don't say that they are), may reflect this additional property and business tax. But our party has said, has in fact, committed itself to 100 percent grants to the provincially owned institutions.

Now, it has been suggested, that in so doing, our party is committing itself to increasing taxes; but the fact of the matter is, that it is the City of Kingston that is bearing this burden, except for the $35.00 per student that the present government gives. Now, 100 percent grant from the Provincial Government, wouldn't actually involve any more money than the citizens of Kingston are already bearing. It would merely spread it. Take it off the property tax and spread it by other means, over the whole of the province, which I consider to be much more just, because after all, not only do students come from all over the province, but once they are educated and qualified, they go out to serve and to draw their living and pay taxes in all other areas of the province.

But also, I think that we are constantly needing new houses. A sound housing policy would be a very good way of reducing this animosity; because after all there is the question of supply and demand. If there are more students than there are residences, it follows that a landlord is going to rent his property to the highest bidder, and if it happens to be a fairly well-to do student, that is who gets it. If it is a poor student, the poor student will have to look for residence, if there are enough residences, or some of the less attractive accommodations in the city; and that is it.

Do you want to talk about Wolfe Island?

I think the method in which the decision was made was without consultation with local people, in spite of what our member says that has gone on in previous years. The fact is that this particular decision was announced, it wasn't discussed. I think it is another example of make-sure-of-the-convenience-of everything-except-people. I think if they put their minds to it and spend the amount of money they plan to spend, they could make a more adequate ferry to take care of more people and vehicles from Kingston to the Marysville dock. I just don't think sufficient thought was put into it, but I don't think it is one of the major issues.

John Hazlett— Liberal

Dr. John Hazlett is an orthopedic surgeon on the university's staff, having lived in Kingston for 16 years after receiving his medical and specialty training in Toronto. He joined the Liberals because he felt that it was "the party that promised some evolution and was predicated on some reform of society." He decided to run in this election because he feels it is time for a doctor to get involved in our political processes.

Would the Liberals extend aid to separate schools to Grade 13?

Yes, this is a decision which was reached by the Liberal caucus some four years ago. I think it is a sensitive issue and one to which we haven't completely addressed ourselves. In grappling with this situation personally, I have come to accept this as being the best way to proceed with regards to our school system. I think the arguments that are put forward have to do with the fact that we don't necessarily favour the waste that is connected with two large school systems in this province.

Both are operated by publicly elected boards. The separate school system has been with us for many years since the beginning of the country. It represents a sizeable minority of our population. The graduates of this school system are very satisfactory citizens and in many cases are more satisfactory than some of the output of our public school system.

If the avowed objective is to get a greater degree of co-operation and less waste in having two school systems, then I think that it is much better that we deal with two school systems as equals rather than try and have one wither on the vine, and see it come to its own end. I think it has something valuable to offer our society. In speaking towards this end with separate school supporters and separate school board members, it's possible to realize that an extension of grants with this sort of background to it would allow a considerable degree of co-operation with regard to the use of buses, the combined use of technical equipment, associated use of playground and sports areas. It is even possible that schools could be built back to back with a common heating system or other common areas. I can identify personally quite strongly with this extension of aid to separate schools. I don't really like to get involved with the constitutional aspects of this because I don't think this is really very pertinent and I think that it is also an approach which is truly liberal in outlook and truly is one with which the Liberal Party could well identify.

What would you do to help students who have trouble raising the money needed not just for tuition but for living expenses, especially when they are not eligible for the present loan system?

I'd prefer to see this approached from other viewpoints, rather than giving increased student loans and student grants. I think it must be approached in the context of the economy as a whole. I would think it is desirable to try to increase student employment opportunities. Perhaps the extended school year, with the variation in time when students would be available for employment might help to solve the student earning power with regard to contributing to their own education. In thinking about this question, you should appreciate that the student is probably only contributing about 15 to 20 percent of the cost of his tuition. This ratio is probably correct. It is probably reasonable to think that there should be some identifiable user cost to an education. This follows the taxation cost concept that the main portion of the load should be taken by those who can afford to pay for it.

How much of the education budget should be funded from general taxes and how much from property taxes?

This is a strong policy item in the Liberal Party and in the Liberal Blue Print for government. We feel that the municipal taxpayer and the property taxpayer is overburdened from the point of view of taxation of property. I think the time has come now when the majority of people in Ontario would accept the fact that a larger burden of education costs in a municipality should be borne from the other sources of general revenue rather than from property. tax. Our party is in favour of taking on 80 percent of the cost of education from the municipalities rather than the present 50 to 55 percent.

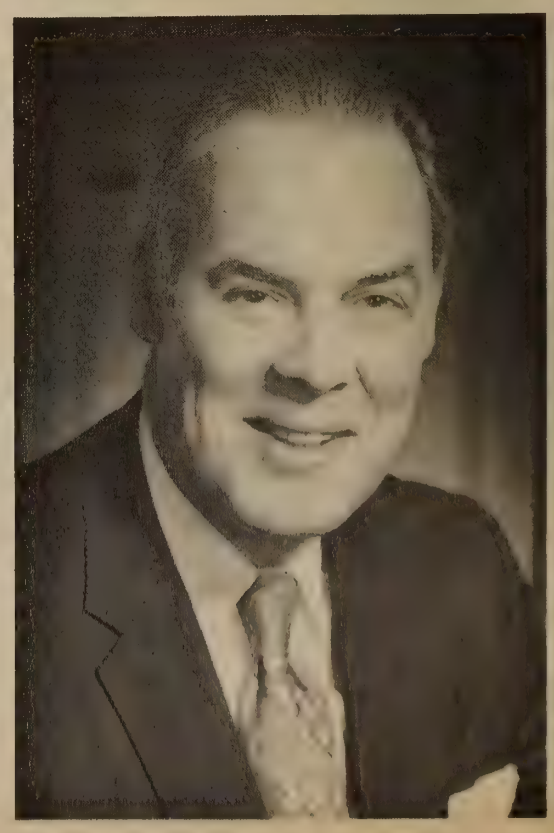
Would the Liberals increase payments to Kingston to offset the lack of income to the city resulting from the large amount of tax-exempt property here?

I think the important point to be made here is that Kingston's problem is quite unique, because it has more than 2½ times the tax exempt provincial property assessment of any other municipality in Ontario. In the reaction of the present government to this situation, the feeling has been that this can only be corrected by something that would be afforded across the province. It has taken quite a few years now to get a per capita grant by students at the university or St. Lawrence College to come the city's way and this doesn't do anything unique for the city's problem. I would approach this, as representative of this riding, by giving a 50 percent grant in lieu of taxes to the city on its present tax exempt provincial property assessment, so that this municipality would be more in line with the other municipalities in Ontario which have a high tax exempt assessment. This would be done immediately, in 1972, rather than waiting for something to happen in 1976.

What about other local issues?

In this campaign, we can identify two important local issues, not only because they are of concern to local citizens but because they reflect the things that are wrong with the present government in Ontario and why there is need for a change of government. One could decide that the lack of response in the Ontario legislature towards Kingston's specific problems with tax exempt provincial property is due to inadequate representation of the riding and due to a lack of priority items in the Conservative government. This is obviously a very popular thing and a very great wish on the part of citizens of this city and yet it is ignored.

The other issue which also indicates the same character of our present government is what we call the Wolfe Island Ferry Controversy. This is a situation where there is a need for improved transportation to this island and to the other islands in the Kingston riding. The government has taken upon itself to bring down a plan for relocation of the ferry without any real consultation with the people who use the ferry and then in the face of a public outcry which has really become quite substantial in this city, they still hold to the fact that they know best. It doesn't seem to me that this is a very good example of responsible government, of government reaction to the wishes of the people. I have challenged our present member of the legislature to retract this plan. He claims that it was conceived by experts. The experts say that it was politically orientated. It is hard to really assess this. It is quite easy to prove that no alternatives were entertained. Nothing has been done to think in terms of dredging the harbour at Marysville on Wolfe Island where the present ferry runs. No alternative has been conceived for causeways to the islands or to preserve the present crossing or to make it safer. There hasn't been any serious undertaking to plan on a new ferry boat or to definitely find out how much the cost would be to build a new ferry boat in Canada or in Ontario.



Certainly the government can have pretty rigid control of the crown land. I think that when we get into the private area, and we say that you own a piece of property, and the only buyer you can find is an American then I think we get into a pretty difficult area from the point of view of government saying that you can't do this. One way to approach this is by the foreign investment review board and the concept that on occasions, the government of Ontario may be willing to find another buyer for you or be the buyer itself on the basis of preventing the loss of this asset of land to the Ontario people as a whole. Just how far such concepts go would depend on the funds available and on the need.

Protecting the environment.

One of the points we have been making in this campaign is that, in spite of the fact that we have two pieces of legislation which have come before us in the past two months, the bill to protect our environment and another to do with pits and quarries, these give the right to the government to enact certain regulations and really are dependant on what we call minsterial discretion. It is a valid criticism of the present government that the regulations have not been fully formed and in many areas are not even in the offering. One must really go back and identify the priority areas in protecting the environment which need the attention of government and hopefully this would really be put forward as legislation rather than a lot of regulations. This bill to protect our natural environment has been heralded as a real fantasy and the number of things that are included in this, if they were really enforced in some way, we would really have a nightmare of various rules and regulations.

We have included in our Blue print for government items to do with exhaust emission controls in automobiles and after burners on jet engines.

Another example which is probably worthwhile considering is the Great Lakes basin. The province of Ontario abutts on all but one of the Great Lakes and yet across the lake, it has to deal with seven different state jurisdictions in the United States. Fortunately, this problem has been identified and the International Joint Commission has been formed to address itself to the problems of the Great Lakes basin. In spite of prompting from the state of Michigan, the Ontario government has been quite unwilling to give up its sovereignty and control over pollution in the Great Lakes so that some real action could be taken by the International Joint Commission. So it is part of the Liberal viewpoint that we would be willing to give up some of our control of the environment to the International Joint Commission in order to allow enforcement rather than just study of the problem.

Syl Apps -Conservative

Syl Apps was born in Paris, Ontario, and is a graduate of McMaster and Toronto universities in political economy. After graduation he played hockey with the Toronto Maple Leafs before becoming president of the Milton Brick Co., at their head office in Toronto. He eventually moved to Kingston to start his own brick company. He has five children, two of whom have been at Queen's.

Mr. Apps was elected to the Ontario legislature in 1963, and was chairman of the government's select Committee on Youth, and a member of the Committee on Election Law. Since the first of March he has been the Minister of Correctional Services.)

(On local issues:)

The city should be compensated for tax exemptions. Queen's an economic benefit, and cultural, but old age pensioners don't benefit. We could say to the city we'll allow you to collect taxes on the university property but you can't confine that to KINGSTON. Once you make a policy decision like that you have to do it for all the other areas of theprovince, some of whom don't have the tax exemption problem we do. Their assessment is on a much broader base and they don't need the same assistance we do. So, Mr. Davis, when he was here, said he would base the grants on the percentage of tax exempt property as compared to the total assessment, so that those people or those areas where the tax exempt property amounted to a high percentage would be receiving assistance where those areas where the tax exempt property was a very low per cent wouldn't, so that the assistance would go to where it was most needed.

I think the new ferry service will be very much better than the old one. To give you the background to that, and I think you should always look at these things in relation to the background, eight years ago the ferry running between Kingston and Wolfe Is. was owned by the township. I think it cost $1.25 per car plus 40c per passenger to go across and any deficit incurred by the ferry, and it was a considerable deficit, was split 75 per cent the province, and 25 per cent, or it may have been 80-20, to the township, which meant the township had to raise quite a bit of money through taxes to pay for their share of the deficit. Since that time the province has taken over the ferry. They've made it a free ferry, they've added another ferry, and an icebreaker in the wintertime to give the residents year-round service.

The cost of that last year was $495,000 which was paid for by the people of the province to supply this service. Last spring I received a letter from the Wolfe Island township council asking me to see what I could do to persuade the province to do something about what they called the intolerable waiting conditions that were prevalent when you were waiting for the ferry. I discussed this with the Department of Highways. They indicated they were able to get a boat, an end-loading ferry, which would carry twice as many cars as are now carried by the two ferries combined, and by moving it down the river to the narrows where it is about a mile wide, they could do this and carry twice as many cars in the same length of time as the two other ferries combined. I discussed this with the Wolfe Island council, and they agreed in principle that this was a reasonable thing to do. They pointed out that they were concerned that there should be one of the other ferries kept in case of a breakdown or to allow the Amherst Islander to come into drydock every once in a while. They were concerned about the people in Marysville who were used to riding back and forth every day as passengers, and also people who would drive to the ferry at Marysville, come across, and then go to work in Kingston. So, with that in mind, the province has agreed to not only operate the new ferry, but to keep the ferry service in operation between Kingston and Marysville during what we call the navigatible season, or the season when it can go back and forth in the normal way. The cost of the new ferry, projected to 1973, when it would be in operation, is $290,000. The cost of the old ferries, projected for 1973, are $560,000. The cost of keeping the other ferry going is approximately $100,000 to $125,000, so actually we're still doing the same thing; giving far greater service with a saving of $125,000 to $160,000. I think the only people who might be inconvenienced are the people who work in Kingston and come over as passengers and walk or take a bus from here to where they work. A solution to that could be that the city could extend its bus service to the new ferry terminal which is about 1½ miles past Barriefield, where they go now. If there is enough demand for it I'm sure this would be an economic thing for them to do.

(On Separate Schools:)

We're against the extension of aid to the separate schools. We feel that there is enough segregation in this country right now and we don't feel we should segregate people along religious lines any more than we can help, and if we're going to be a united country, work together, at least we're going to have to mingle together, and to separate people longer than is necessary is not a good idea.

We are bound by law to provide support to the Separate Schools to the grade ten level on a public-school basis. After that, if you want to extend aid over and above that, that is a matter of choice, and you can't extend it to one group of people without extending it to another. In justice, if you do something for a separate school, you must, if requested, do it for somebody else, because, otherwise, you would be discriminating very violently against these other people, and there are quite a number of them. So this would be much more costly. I think the people of the province are quite concerned with the cost of education. I don't think they are going to be prepared to pay that much more. The only thing that would result would be a lower status of education, which we don't want. There must be a better way to provide what the separate school people want, than this segregation and the additional cost.

Separate schools won't be forced to close down. At the present time in Kingston we pay 76 per cent of the operating costs of the separate schools to grade 9 and I think the overall average in the province is 80 per cent. Now, in fairness, I think we should point out that the tax base for separate schools is narrower than it is for public schools, but this is the way in which we are trying to level off the money available, so that the separate school system, as it is now, does not lack for money. Up to your grade ten level. And we have no intention of reducing that aid at all.

After that they are the same as any other private school. The possibility that some of the separate schools could not provide that service would depend on the willingness of the separate school people to pay that extra service. I think the public schools could absorb a great number of the separate school people if it were necessary, and if they felt they wanted to do this. I have a lot of sympathy for them. They're concerned about what they consider the Christian morals and Christian ethics that they feel they receive in their own Roman Catholic schools and as far as I'm concerned, the more of that they can obtain, the better everyone else is, although I'm not convinced that by the time a young person is sixteen, he hasn't pretty well determined on his own how he is going to conduct himself, and whether those extra three years are going to mean that much or not is a question, but they do have a legitimate concern on this. But there must be a better way in which this objective can be accomplished without segregating the two. In the high schools and collegiates there could be some time set aside when they could receive this Christian training that they feel they should have, at their own expense, but they would have the facilities available for them.

As far as my own department is concerned, that is, Correctional Services, we have four or five new programmes that we have initially started, like our citizens' committees, our project for yong people, our temporary absence programmes which we're promoting to a great extent. We're hoping to get into group homes for young people as well. This department is not one that is conducive to getting votes. We spend the money, really, and there are not that many people who are that concerned, unfortunately, about this department.We feel that it is a pretty important one.

A project that is a new development is the one where we have a new camp outside of Sudbury, whereby we are sending 36 of our training school boys, and it's a year-round camp, in the bush, beside a lake. These kids go up there for 13 weeks. They are given projects to do, such as planting trees, and things like that. They go on canoe trips; they go on camping trips. They get programmes that require them, in order to do the job, to work with the other people, This has been a tremendous thing for them. Many of them have never been out in a place like that and have never really learned that in order to accomplish something they have to work with one another. I plan to open another camp like that this coming spring.

We have started now for the first time in Ottawa what we call a citizens' committee, which works with the superintendent in helping him in the programmes that they are putting on in the Ottawa jail which will soon be the new Carleton Detention Centre. It will promote jobs for these people when they get out. It will give them counselling services. It will try and make them feel that the people in the community are interested in them. I think that this aspect will be a great help to a lot of these people because, in some cases, when they've been in jail for, say, thirty days, and they've lost their jobs, they have nothing to go to. Nobody seems to care about them at all. But with this particular committee there, they will be able to discuss employment possibilities with them and in many cases help them get jobs, and tell them how to go about getting jobs.

We do the same thing in our training schools done in Whiteoaks and Hagersville. We have people from the community coming into training school, and the one I saw done there a while ago was a lady from Hagersville coming in and helping a young lad of about 12 years of age in his reading. She would spend a couple of hours a day in there helping the young lad catch up on his reading. For the first time in his life, I guess, there was someone who was genuinely interested in helping him with no reason to do it other than the fact that she wanted to help him. I think that would have a great effect on him, and I think it would give a great deal of satisfaction to the lady knowing that she was helping a person like that.

In addition we have a temporary absence programme in which we're allowing the people out for certain reasons. His wife may be ill, or his child may have been in an accident, or something like that. If he is conducting himself in a reasonable manner he may have up to five days to go visit his family. We'll allow him out to apply for jobs. We'll even make it possible for him to work in the community if he has a job by going out in the day and coming back in the evening. We have over the past almost two years given temporary absences to 4600 men and we have only had 53 that we had to revoke, and only one of those has committed another crime when he was out. This indicates that is working very well.

Many students and Kingstonians think Agnes' galleries (all three of them) are filled with "modern paintings" and far out prints the majority don't understand and wonder if anyone else does. If this is the case with you, take a step inside the building, give art a second chance and take an hour off to see the Art Gallery of Ontario's travelling show "Signs and Symbols", (in technicolor). A Little Blood, Sweat and Tears

if at first you don't

by Chris Clark

Mossman

Clark

One night last week I received a phone call from the Journal Office. The soft, sexy voice on the other end made my spine quiver. "Clark!!!" she said, "You're doing the B.S. & T. concert. Have the review for Tuesday's paper." ...click.

That was the first of many surprises.

The next came when the concert started on time-al-most. Around here anything even near the advertised time is on schedule; so ten minutes late must be a record.

Probably the best way to warm up an audience is to have a folk singer. Following a trend that may have been set with David Rae last year, Don McLean stepped on stage. In his dialogue between numbers he seemed soft spoken and rather nervous. Maybe he didn't know what to say to a Canadian audience but he certainly changed his routine from the first concert, for the second time he was out there were no poorly timed jokes about an American capital in Canada or inferences to horse-riding Mounties. The second concert had more standard New York coffee house lines.

When he sang, the soft voice became strong and he picked away quite effortlessly at his guitar. When he sang about love, his voice swooned through the lyrics. When he protested the establishment, his voice hardened and the rythm became driving. He did a good job but I just couldn't help wondering after putting down status quo and money, what his share of the 22 grand was.

Blood, Sweat and Tears deserve a lot of credit. For reasons, which are known only to Murphy and God, top stage performers sometimes just can't get it together. When they started (B.S. & T. NOT Murphy and God - that's another story) the first concert, nothing happened. They tried hard, played clean and smooth and kept everything tight but it wasn't there. I was disappointed because this wasn't the B.S. & T. I knew. However, whether it was their desire to do a good concert for us, or not to start on a tour with a bomb, they changed their routing for the second set (which was more like a jam session) or just plain old Bacchus. They managed to pull together and wipe everyone at the second show.

This second show burst open with "Go Down Gamblin' " featuring David Clayton Thomas making a debut playing guitar. (Which he didn't touch again). This is a good heavy rock song but I felt that any chances for the top brass to fill were lost because of the heavy 4-4 beat.

"You Made Me So Very Happy" was smooth, sweetened with muted brass. Unfortunately the amps decided to buzz, pop, crack and just generally become a pain in the neck.

"Redemption" was where they really become Blood, Sweat and Tears. Bobby Colomby was outstanding on drums and the brass would have made Babriel take up the harp. This group at times makes the transition from rock to jazz seen awkward but they definitely proved they could do it with this song.

One great thing about jazz musicians is their ability to get off on a bridge. "God Bless the Child" exhibited this perfectly. Lewis Soloff was outstanding in his trumpet solo. You could tell everyone on stage was trying to keep this song tight, resulting in the best I've ever heard them play it.

"More and More" was a bad number to follow "God Bless the Child", and so may have suffered from too much ebullition.

A big blues sound started off "Mama Gets High". This appeared to be the change needed. However they should never have tried to do the Dixieland trio into one mike, this resulting in the loss of one of the most beautiful parts in Dixieland - the clarinet.

Jim Fielder on bass and Bobby Colomby on drums stood out in "Smiling Phases". They brought this song together beautifully after a shakey start.

The smoothest rock-jazz transition of the night was "Sometimes in Winter". My only complaint was that the muted trombone wasn't audible, only occasionally heard filling in the chords. The trombone came bouncing back in "And When I Die". He made that horn talk!

The encore "Lucretia McEvil" had everyone up Their intricate ending wasn't the one used last year which I had hoped for. This one was better. The sassy trumpet was replaced by a massive "evil" effort on all parts and it worked. People were dancing, swaying, jumping, even having pillow fights.

This group's ability to pull themselves out of trouble is superlative. If someone felt the song dragging he'd step out and get it together on his own, like Soloff did in "More and More". They broke up into almost anything they wanted using piano, flute, tuba, sax and so on giving them almost infinite possibilities if something went stale.

There are times when two concerts are a real bind for a group, but I feel this time B.S. & T. would have left a bad taste in our mouths if they hadn't had a second chance.

We're all in this together.

Extending the vote to those eighteen and over, is just one of the things Bill Davis has done since assuming power last March, one of more than 130 pieces of legislation.

But it's one of the most important.

For we are now, each of us, immediately involved in an assessment of all the other things he has done.

Consider the record.

The establishment of a Department of the Environment and the related initiatives for the funding of pollution control equipment, the banning of logging in Quetico and Killarney Provincial Parks, Project SWEEP, the Endangered Species Act, revisions to the Pits and Quarries Act, and getting tough with corporate offenders, all these things underscore an enlarged and vigorous commitment to clean up the act, ecologically speaking. Now we can begin to breath a little easier.

The halting of the Spadina Expressway, coupled with the pledge to provide greatly expanded assistance to mass public transit, is but one measure of the Davis government's involvement in a rationalized transportation system.

The Provincial conference on economic and cultural nationalism both reflects and contributes to an expanding awareness of the potential of our country and our people.

The decisive steps taken to encourage Canadian book publishing and the additional provisions written into Ontario Development Corporation loans suggest Bill Davis' readiness to use the power of law to preserve and enhance what is distinctive about our society.

There were a great many other decisions, good decisions as well: no fault car insurance, the task force for off track betting, expanded grants to day care centres, detoxification centres. Expanded housing on a rent-geared-for incomes basis. Free Medicare for the needy and those 65 and over. And lowering the age of majority.

Which is where we started.

If the notion of Democracy is to remain viable in an ever-changing society, change itself must be not only envisioned but also realized. That's why Davis is doing things. By lowering the age of majority, he brings you much more than legal alcohol — he brings you the opportunity to infuse the body politic with the ideas, imagination and the energy that youth can provide.

Change is more than believing, or hoping, or talking, or shouting. Change is acting. Davis is doing things. Help him do your things.

Davis is doing things...for people.

On Oct. 21, do something for Ontario. Support Bill Davis.

Sponsored by the Youth Group for Bill Davis.

GAELS CLINCH DIVISION TITLE

The Queen's Golden Gaels clinched their first OUAA Divisional Title here Saturday, rebounding past an injury-riddled Varsity squad in a 28-25 thriller. The game was typical of past Queen's - U. of T. meetings, both in intensity and results. Both teams played bonecrunching, brutal football, but in the end, the Gaels' ability to adjust won the day.

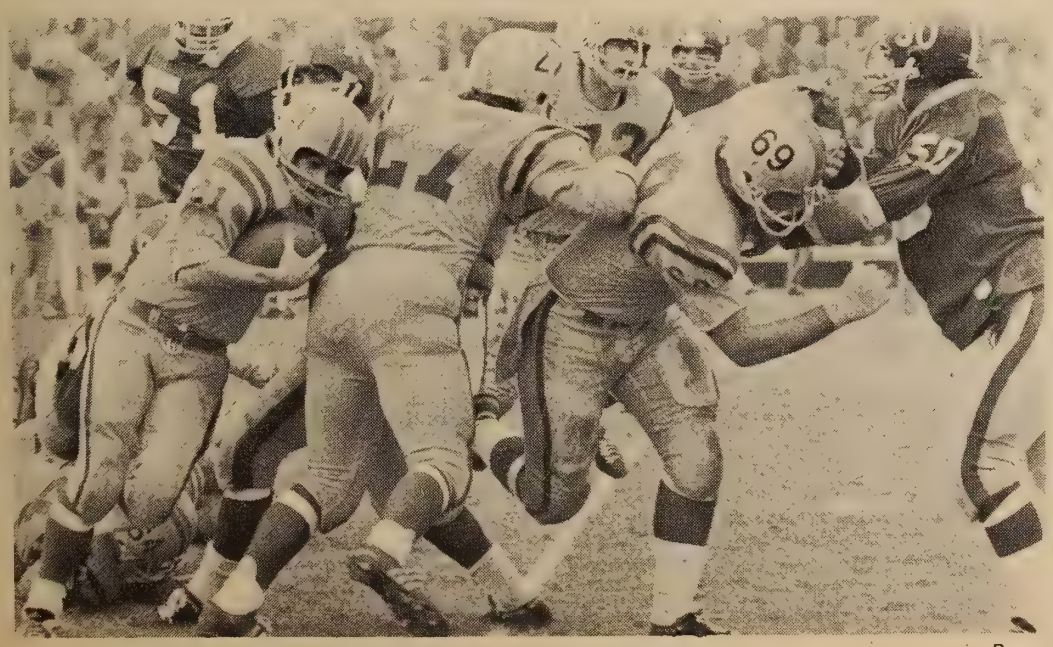
With a strong north wind at their backs, the Blues came out in a shotgun formation, in an attempt to put points on the board before QB Wayne Dunkley could reinjure a bad ankle. And, ladies and gentlemen, it worked. Despite an early interception by linebacker Mike Lambros, the Blues riddled a confused Gael defense for two quick touchdowns, on passes from Dunkley to Stu MacSween and John Chapman. One convert hit the crossbar, and the Gaels were down 13-0.

Queen's finally got on the board with a 36-yard field goal by Doug Cozac, into the teeth of the wind, points set up by a brilliant 80-yard kickoff return by Stu Lang. That return cost Toronto more than yards. Kicker Don Thomson got tangled up in a mob while trying to make a tackle, and was carried off the field in considerable pain. His absence was to have a marked effect later in the game, when a field goal could have made the difference.

The remainder of the quarter featured rough play (Paul Rose of the Gaels and Randy Myers of Toronto were thrown out for "excessive roughness") and the first offensive drive of note for the Gaels, resulting in a 50 yard punt single by Lambros at the start of the second quarter. Things didn't change much after this. The Blues again went to work on the Gaels defense. Dunkley and Chapman combined on a beautiful 61 yard passing play, and two plays later varsity scored. The entire drive was engineered through the air, as Dunkley made a shambles of the Gaels' defensive secondary.

Then the tide shifted. The Gaels, with the wind at their back, added two singles, then hit real paydirt with a Brian Warrender touchdown from the Blues 3 yard line. The score was set up by a tremendous 55 yard run by Gord McLellan, the game's outstanding individual player. Minutes later, Warrender again scored, this time in a critical 3rd-down pass from Taylor. Suddenly, the score was tied 19-19. The explosive Gael offense had again asserted itself. But all was not yet over! McLellan fielded a punt on the Queen's 33, cut across the field to his left, picked up a crushing block from Alex Morris, and sprinted down the sidelines for a touchdown. Score at the half: Queen's 26, Varsity 19.

Toronto, and the second quarter belonged to the Gaels, the second half belonged to the referees. The play settled into a brutal defensive routine marked by the traditional problem of a Toronto-Queen's game, poor officiating. The Gaels got to Dunkley early in the third quarter and put him temporarily out of the game. There was no scoring in the third quarter, as the Gael defense tightened against a weakened Toronto offence. The only other highlights were the missed calls of the referees, particularly one blatant no yards penalty and all sorts of holding by Toronto's offensive line (particularly against Gaels' defensive tackle Jim Sherritt).



In the fourth quarter, a Doug Cozac's second interception set up a single point for the Gaels, after which the Blues took the ball on the 35 yard line! Always thought it was supposed to be the 25...With Dunkley back in the game, the Blues drove from their 35 for a touchdown, narrowing the gap to 27-25. The Gaels added a single, and then held off the Blues for the remainder of the game. Despite the fact that Toronto completed 30 of 57 passes the defense should not be severely chastized. Nobody had anticipated that Dunkley's ankle would force the Blues into a shotgun attack, and adjustments had to be made during the game. Also, it is difficult to stop a passer with Dunkley's ability when he does not have to take time to set up. Even so, mistakes were made. The Gaels' tackling was still sloppy at times, and some passes were completed that shouldn't have been.

Offensively, the picture was brighter. Taylor passed well, particularly in the second half. his favourite receiver was Stu Lang, who caught 7 passes for 91 yards. On the ground McLellan led the attack with 141 yards on 17 carries, much of it on fine individual effort.

Next week's game in Toronto is officially a "nothing" game, but it could be interesting to see if the Gaels can tighten up and sharpen their play. They've got two weeks to do it before the playoffs. If they do, they will be tough to beat.

Trackmen Rewrite Records

Queen's runner Hugh Fraser, a member of the Canadian National Track Team, broke two long-standing Queen's records Saturday, bettering marks for the 100 and 220 yard dashes set by Bill Fritz in the 1930's. His times, 9.8 sec. and 21.3 sec. respectively, also set meet records. Kip Sumner, a recent import from Waterloo, continued the assault on the records, setting a new mark in the mile with a 4:11.1 clocking. Other meet records were set by standout runners Dave Jarvis, with a 54.2 in the 440 hurdles, and Brian Aiken, who ran a 1:22.4 in the 660 yard dash.

In addition, Don Price won the 120-yard hurdles, and the 4 x 110 yard relay squad of Price, Jarvis, Guy and Fraser took their event. Another Queen's record, in the 4 x 880 relay, fell to the team of Verhoeven Milne Latta, and Aiken, although they finished in second place in the event.

Despite these performances, the Gaels were forced to settle for second place in team standings, behind the host team from the U.W.O. A lack of depth, especially in the field events, hurt the Gaels badly Even so, the Gaels may have a real chance in the OUAA Championships this weekend.

Rugger Gaels Thump Guelph

In an open, fast-moving game under the lights at Guelph, Queen's Ist XV completely outclassed the Guelph's side 51-0. Brutal Tackling, incisive running and a powerful and mobile pack accounted for the Rugger Gael's complete domination of the game.

Within minutes of the opening kickoff Queen's was on the scoreboard when Ron Easteal scored his first of 21 points on a successful penalty kick. This was closely followed by the first of many tries which were to come up with monotonous regularity, when Captain Andy Page scored from a loose maul. The first half was rounded out with converted tries by Terry Graham, Andy again, and Gary Davis for a mid-way total of 29-0.

In the second half Geoff Cooper, Warren Smith and Paul Barron each counted twice. As in the first half, many of the tries came about as a direct result of the powerful rucking of the Queen's pack assisted by the excellent running and passing by the backs. Indeed Queen's not only controlled the loose play but also the set scrums and to a lesser degree, the line-outs. Notwithstanding the one-sided score, the Guelph side must be commended for its plucky resistance.

Queen's 2nd XV rounded out the doubleheader by taking the nightcap 15-6. Ross Campbell opened the scoring on a break by Peter Kopp followed by a difficult conversion by Dave Hurley. In spite of holding the balance of the play, the seconds could not capitalize on their advantage and did not score again until the 27th minute of the first half when an excellent forward rush spearheaded by Don Sykes gave Campbell his second try. Guelph rounded out the half-time score by succeeding on a penalty kick. The second half was a slow forward struggle with the only highlight coming when a fine break by Peter Kopp resulted in a try by Gary Vienneuve which was converted by Dave Murley. Guelph also scored an unconverted try to result in a 15-6 final score.

Soccer Gaels in First

Carleton soccer team came to Queen's with a perect record: three games, three wins, eight goals for, and none against. They left with an only slightly tarnished record, but left first place in the East division behind, a first place not in their power to recover. Unles 'queen's suffers a surprise upset by Trent. (I think we can safely forget Ottawa, who are still playing Stone-Age soccer) the Gaels will be division winners, and in the play-offs again this season.

Dom Zeffiro closes in vs Carleton

Not only did Queen's shut out Carleton, 2-0, they conclusively demonstrated their superiority over all other teams in their division. At no time did Carleton even remotely look like scoring, with Queen's defence cutting attacks short quickly, and moving the ball efficiently, and with good teamwork, out of their own end, and linking well with their forwards. Link man Dominic Zeffiro played an outstanding game. The strikers, too, outshone their opponents, as they continued to sweep forward with the ball, posing a continual threat to the Carleton defence. It was hard to imagine that Carleton had beaten them two weeks ago. Queen's seemed to be able to mount attacks at will, and were unlucky not to have scored more often.

The action started with Queen's immediately on the attack, and within five minutes Drysdale had broken free, but hit the bar with his shot. Queen's attacks continued to pour in: Gerry Birks down the left wing, Andy Piotrowski down the right, until finally a tired Carleton defenceman raised an arm to block a shot. Unfortunately for him, he was about a yard inside the penalty box. Carleton's luck had run out. Their goalie did well to block Gord Taylor penalty kick, but the ball hit the cross-bar and fell back down at Taylor's feet. Queen's 1, Carleton 0, after twenty-five minutes.

It was not until the fortieth minute of play that Queen's had to concede a corner kick to the opposition, but it posed such a meagre threat, that the outcome was a shot on the Carleton net by Queen's fullback Golini. Queen's kept aplying the pressure. With only three minutes left in the half, a header from Gord Taylor was headed out of the goal by a Carleton defender.

With the wind behind them in the second half, Carleton found it easier to get into Queen's half, but although they forced three corners in the first twenty minutes, they found it just as hard to score. Queen's kept breaking through, giving Gord Taylor a feast of shots. Then, in the twenty-eighth minute Zeffiro sent a curling low shot bounding in front of the goalie, who was spread-eagled just to deflect it. G. Taylor found the ball with the net empty again. John Torode at striker for the second half sent in some strong shots, and delighted an already pleased crowd by shuddering the cross-bar

Field hockey tie, lose

Last weekend,Queen's hosted an invitational field hockey tournament for intermediate teams. Participating were Toronto, McMaster and Queen's. The tournament ended in a draw between Toronto and Queen's. Individual scoring was as follows:

Queen's - 3, McMaster - 0
Queen's -0, Toronto -0
Toronto -1, McMaster -0

This weekend, both senior and intermediate teams travel to York University for Part 1 of the final tournament. The tournament will be concluded the following weekend at Western.

Queen's field hockey girls were also hard at it last Tuesday as they travelled to Canton, New York to take on St. Lawrence College.

In spite of certain unavoidable factors that made good play difficult, the games were hard fought. Queen's Seniors were beaten 6-5. Goals were scored by forwards Marilyn Innes, three from Karen Carson and one by half-back Enri Waghorn. The Intermediates played to a three-all tie with two goals from Sylvia Cameron and one from Allison Bowser.

Tennis championships

This past Friday and Saturday the Women's Tennis Championships were held at Carleton University. Due to their strong performance in the meet at Guelph two weeks ago, the entire Queen's team participated in the finals.

The first and second place teams from each of the East and West Divisions advanced to the Carleton meet: U. of Toronto and Western (West), and Queen's and McMaster (East). As well, the top three competitors from each event competed, so that there was partial representation for Waterloo, York, Trent, Laurentian and Guelph.

The Finals were dominated by the stronger Western Division competitors, the Championship being won by U. of Toronto (who's first singles player is rated number 6 in Canada). Western, with strong players at both first and second singles, took second.

On a basis of two points awarded for each match won, the overall standings were: U. of T. 38, Western 34, Queen's 20, McMaster 14, Laur. 10, Waterloo and York 2, and Trent and Guelph 0.

W.I.C. News

The standings so far have Law tied with Arts 73 (2) for first place in League A and P.H.E. (1) tied with P.H.E. (2) for first place in League B.

The track and field meet is being held Wednesday, Oct. 20 at 7 at the new track. Points are being given for participation rather than places so come out and support your faculty. Entries can still be made in the W.I.C. box in the Women's Locker Room.

The paddleball tournament starts on Tuesday, so if you are entered, check when you are to play.

The ringette clinic is on Wednesday, Oct. 20 in the Arena. It should be a lot of fun. Bring your skates and come out for a good time.

The synchronized swim meet and swimathon will be held next week. Entries close for these events, and also for ringette, on Friday, Oct. 22.

With this wide range of activities to choose from, surely there is a sport you'd enjoy. Why not come out and participate?

CANADA

Finance Minister Edgar Benson slashed personal and corporate income taxes last night as part of a $1 billion program to stimulate Canada's faltering economy.

Taxes paid by individual Canadians will be cut 3 per cent, retroactive to July 1 and with the cut continuing until the end of next year. But this year's cut will not be received by most taxpayers until after the New Year, in the form of rebate cheques.

Corporate taxes will be cut by 7 per cent, also retroactive to last July 1, with this tax cut also running to the end of next year.

Benson's tax and spending measures will produce a budgetary deficit of $1 billion in the 1971-72 fiscal year, the largest in any year since World War II. $750 million deficit had been forecast in Benson's June 18 budget.

The York University Board of Governors Tuesday unanimously voted to offer the position of vice-president for academic affairs to Walter Tarnopolsky, dean of law at the University of Windsor.

Earlier, leaders of the university's student council, student newspaper and the Jewish Student Federation made a last-minute switch to support Tarnopolsky's appointment.

Tarnopolsky was accused by the student newspaper last week of anti-Semitism and of favoring American faculty members over Canadian.

Opposition party leaders Wednesday angrily protested Premier William Davis' use of provincial public servants to estimate the costs of Liberal and New Democratic Party election promises.

Davis told a press conference Ontario treasury board officials had worked out a cost of $2,399,450,000 for recent Liberal promises, and a cost of $2,497,850,000 for the NDP platform. He declined to go into detail on how the figures were reached.

NDP Leader Stephen Lewis and Liberal Leader Robert Nixon both heatedly disputed the estimates -- and Davis' use of public employees at the taxpayers' expense for partisan election purposes.

Davis said he didn't request a costing of Conservative programs because treasury estimates are made public when each new government program is announced.

Canada's unemployment rate soared to 7.1 per cent in September, the highest level for any month since 1961.

The jump in the seasonally adjusted rate from 6.5 per cent in August creates severe new problems for the government's economic policy.

The actual number of unemployed Canadians last month was 434,000, compared with 455,000 in September a year ago.

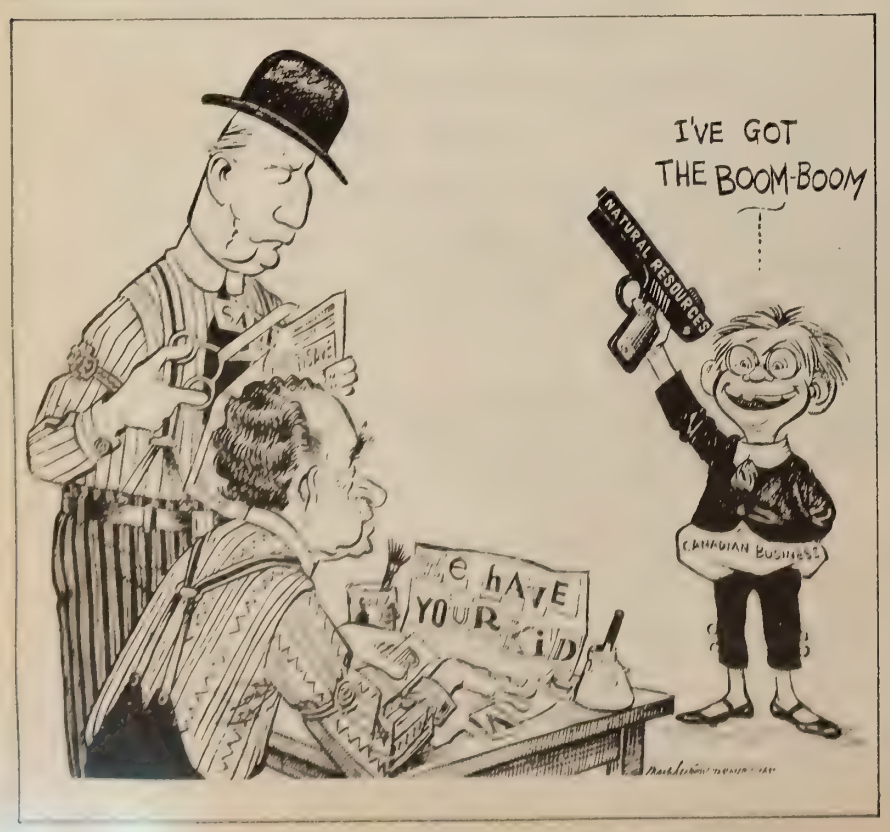
The number of Canadians with jobs was 8,188,000, an about-average decline of 329,000 from August, with many younger Canadians going back to school last month..

The seasonally adjusted rate discounts such normal seasonal developments as the effect of the entry or departure of students on the job market and shows the underlying trends in the labor force.

The sesaonally adjusted rate is the one used by economists and government as the key indicator of the health of the labor force segment of the nation's economy.

The bill for use of military forces to maintain order during the Quebec terrorist crisis a year ago is $2,717,101.

A written reply in the Commons yesterday from Defence Minister Donald Macdonald said those costs incurred in late 1970 were expenses additional to normal pay and maintenance costs for the troops involved.



Of the total extra costs, $2,109,337 was spent in Quebec and $597,764 in the Ottawa area, where troops were engaged in security duties. The Quebec Government has been released from its legal obligations to pay the extra costs.

The University of Quebec in Montreal threatened Thursday to deduct pay from any non-teaching staff members who refused to report to their jobs because of a strike by 400 professors.

Picket lines were set up Wednesday by the professors, who suspended classes to back proposals that contract negotiations be speeded up. Their year-old union, affiliated with the Confederation of National Trade Unions, is still seeking its first collective agreement.

The non-teaching staff of about 500 maintenance employees at the university refused to cross the picket lines. Their union announced that members would turn up for work but not go through the professors' pickets.

A meeting of 235 professors early Wednesday voted 83 per cent in favor of strike action.

A cheque for $62.1-million went out to the Canadian Wheat Board Wednesday, following the Government's shelving of the Grain Stabilization Bill.

Otto Lang, minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, told the Commons that the money had been paid, but stressed that if the stabilization bill had been passed, Prairie grain farmers would have received more.

The Government withdrew the legislation on Tuesday evening following the refusal of four Saskatchewan farmers to agree to an adjournment of court proceedings against Finance Minister E. J. Benson, aimed at forcing the Government to make the payments.

Three Telegram employees announced Friday they plan to publish a "bright, hard-hitting" morning tabloid newspaper in Toronto, with the first edition appearing in early November -- only a few days after their own paper folds.

Douglas Creighton, managing editor of the Telegram who will be the new tabloid's publisher, told a news conference his paper will be called The Toronto Sun and will sell for 10 cents on street corners. There will be no home delivery.

Toronto's medical officer of health has ordered the owner of a YorkvilleAve.coffee house to clothe his two nude chefs -- a man and a woman -- or face court action.

But Colin Kerr, owner of The Mynah Bird said it will be the funniest trial ever, "trying to prove my nude chefs are detrimental to someone's health."

Dr. Alvie Boyd said in a letter to Kerr that the Public Health Act stipulates that people handling food must be dressed in a clean outer garment that is washable.

"He must conform to these regulations or face charges" Boyd said last night.

"I ask them to shower before work, so how clean can they get?',Kerr said.

Premier William Davis Wednesday made public his concept for a $75 million complex of pyramid-shaped apartments, offices and stores to occupy the unfinished Spadina Expressway bed between Lawrence and Eglinton Aves.

The project -- which he emphasized depends on municipal approval -- would be built over a new rapid transit line running from the present north end of the stalled expressway, near Downsview Airport, to the St. George subway station at Bloor.

The name of Maurice Strong of Canada, at present in UN's Mr. Environment, is beginning to crop up in informal discussions on the selection of a new secretary-general.

Strong is being mentioned as a possible interim successor for retiring U Thant until a permanent choice can be made.

THE WORLD

BELFAST — Northern Ireland, the scene of 121 killings in the past two years of bloodshed, was in a state of shock today over the gangster-style slaying of two police officers in their car in Belfast Friday.

The plainclothes policemen, were carrying out a routine security check on banks and post offices. As their red car drew up at a traffic light, two men carrying submachine-guns jumped out of another car and sprayed the police vehicle with bullets, killing one constable instantly and fatally wounding the other.

IRAN — American Vice-president Spiro Agnew flew into Iran Wednesday for the celebration of the 2,500th anniversary of the founding of the Persian Empire by Cyrus the Great, and in a last minute switch, Iranian television cancelled plans to televise his arrival live and showed a couple of Yogi Bear cartoons instead.

ALGIERS — Eldridge Cleaver, the self-exiled Black Panther leader, said Friday he has decided to return soon to the United States and devote himself to urban guerrilla warfare.

In an interview in his villa on a hill overlooking Algiers, the 36-year-old revolutionary spoke bitterly of Chinese moves apparently aimed at better relations with the United States.

He indicated that his disillusionment with Peking helped to convince him that "oppressed people" in the United Staes and other countries had no recourse except armed struggle by their own means.

JAPAN — Japanese Premier Eisaku Sato's governing Liberal-Democratic party drew up a draft resolution Thursday recognizing the Peking regime as the sole government of China.

The draft maintained that there is only one China and that Nationalist China's island of Formosa is a territorial part of mainland China. It left the problem of Chiang Kai-shek's Formosa regime for the Chinese to settle among themselves.

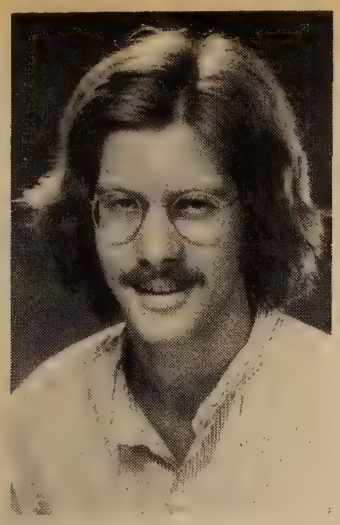
LONDON — Men searching for a male contraceptive pill may not have to do more than reachfor a bottle of aspirin out of the medicine cabinet.

According to an article in today's Lancet magazine, Royal College of Surgeons researchers have found that ordinary doses of aspirin, the age-old headache remedy, may affect the fertility of men.

PAKISTAN — War fever is mounting the border between West Pakistan and India.

Motorists are decorating their cars with signs saying Crush India. Bank officials say many people are withdrawing their money or transferring their accounts to other cities, and businessmen are sending away their families or making plans to do so. Peasant families are leaving their homes near the border.

President Agha Mohammed Yahya Khan, who heads Pakistan's military Government, has said publicly that war with India is inevitable if the Indians continue to back Bengali rebels in East Pakistan with arms training and sanctuary.



HAVANA — The Cuban Government announced Friday that two boatloads of commandos had attacked a small fishing village on the northern coast Tuesday, killing two persons -- one of them a local Communist -- and wounding three others.

A note published in the official daily Granma said the attackers sped away in a northerly direction after strafing the village of Boca de Sama Oriente province, with heavy and medium weapons.

Granma said U.S. imperialism prompted the attack and said responsibility "for these cowardly and bloody actions falls upon the U.S. Government and its cronies."

ENGLAND — Britain vowed Thursday to keep its troops in Northern Ireland until the last of the terrorist gunmen and bombers have been crushed.

At the same time, Prime Minister Edward Heath's Conservative government renewed pledges to give minority Roman Catholics a bigger voice in the rule of Protestant-dominated Ulster.

President sends message about constables

I would like to draw the attention of the community to a number of incidents that have taken place lately. On several different occasions (football games, the speakeasy last Friday), AMS student constables have been assaulted by some individual students attending these functions.

The AMS services notice that these individuals will be prosecuted in the AMS Court and that such activity in the future may lead to fines and even suspension or expulsion of convicted individuals.

This community cannot tolerate violence of this kind. AMS constables are only students and they should be commended for the restraint they have shown in the face of abuse from a few individuals. Please remember that the alternative to student constables is the presence of city police.

AMS constables are doing a great service to this community. Please cooperate with them and support them in their work.

Thank you.

Sincerely yours,
Patrick Riley
President

Freshettes light candles despite small protest

Candle-lighting: Levana 75 joins almost a century of Queen's women with the same thoughts and hopes reflected in the candle flame.

More than 600 freshetttes were introduced to Queen's tradition, and the heritage of Levana, at Monday night's Candle-lighting ceremony, which was briefly interrupted by six women's liberation demonstrators.

The demonstrators, dressed in academic robes like most of the freshettes (there were not enough robes to go round, committee chairman Pat Culm said), walked like the rest to the Grant Hall stage to have their candles lit.

But they stopped there to shout protests against the traditional ceremony. "Bow to the power of the mighty cock!"

In Candle-lighting, observed every fall at Queen's since the 1890's, freshetttes have small candles lit by upper-year women, representing the passing of knowledge and Queen's spirit from one year of women to the next.

For many years the ceremony has had other meanings as well: the candles are wrapped with ribbons in blue, red and gold, and the ribbon the outside tells the faculty of each freshette's future husband.

The demonstrators walked to the balcony of Grant Hall and sat to watch the rest of the ceremony. Women's residence council president Cindy Davidson said she met them there and asked them why they were present. "Then one girl kicked me," Miss Davidson added.

She said that since the demonstrators were no freshettes, and in some cases not even university students, they had no right to be present.

"The ceremony is an academic ceremony," Miss Davidson said. "It applies to both boys and girls."

It was started by the old Levana Society soon after it was organized in the last century, and was financed by that society and then its successor, the Arts and and Science Undergraduate Society.

Candles in the dark...

With the takeover of the ceremony by the women's residence council this year, some of the financing came from the Alumnae Association. Miss Davidson said this contribution from female graduates of Queen's added to the point of Candle-lighting, as a passing on of tradition from one group of Queen's women to the next.

She pointed out that participation in Candle-lighting is voluntary, but that most freshettes do come. (There are between 850 and 900 freshettes this year.)

Mentioning the belief that the ceremony is a "fertility rite", Miss Davidson said she thought the ribbons which indicate a freshette's future husband, and the drops of wax which count her children, are a minor part of the tradition.

A single, tricolor ribbon could keep the Queen's tradition without the marriage implications, she suggested.

Miss Davidson said she did not know who the demonstrators had been. Allaine Armstrong a fourth year sociology student and one organizer of a women's liberation group of Queen's said she knew the demonstrators, and that they represented a group which would prepare a public statement about their actions.

"Their real names aren't important at all," Miss Armstrong said.

The Journal received a statement just before deadline; it will appear in tomorrow's paper.

Speaking to a small group of freshettes after the ceremony, one of the demonstrators said the phallic symbolism of the candles, and the sexual role for women which it represents, was the most outstanding aspect of Candle-lighting.

"And what are you here for--education or fornication?"

letters to the editors

As a first-yar female student I attended the candle-lighting ceremony of Monday evening. Neither I nor my friends, were terribly impressed -- at all.

After putting on these trippy little black gowns and waiting patiently for what seemed hours, the second-year students decided to let us all file into Grant Hall ("let" is the word; I overheard discussion on whether "you want to let your kids come on in now" and "get them all in a straight line. I strongly resent being called a "kid" and treated in this authoritarian, patronizing manner by someone who happens to be a year ahead of me).

In fact the whole performance was rather pretentious. The people around me only snickered when told of the candles' symbolism for learning and valour. We were being initiated as Queen's women supposedly, but I'm tired of being initiated as a Queen's this and a Queen's that.

Queen's is not some little heaven on earth that I will remain unquestioningly loyal to until my dying day and I wish people would stop trying to ram it down my throat.

If this ceremony is supposed to bond Queen's women together, then why do the organizers create such a gap between themselves and us lowly first-year women (I mean kids)?

And then that whole shit about your husband and your lover and your children! To go to a ceremony that is "the passing on of knowledge" and to be sent home married to a medsman or whatever is really assuming a desire for knowledge that may not be quite of the variety some of us are here for (or is there a "how to get a man and keep him" course?).

I wish that someone had a higher respect for my intelligence (and for that of other women) than to suggest that I couldn't enjoy some form of discussion of what the learning experience at university can be all about.

With all those first-year women together, we could have really gotten into something on how our expectations of university had stood up to our first month here; or on our feelings about female-male relationships at Queen's and what it's like to be leered at, to be treated as though your reason for being had to do with smiling prettily and listening to some boor at a party rap about nothing, expecting you to stand there interested.

Objecting to the term "freshette" as too cute and derogatory, I sign myself,

A first year woman.

RETAIN IF CORRECT. ERRORS OR CHANGES REQUIRE AN ACADEMIC CHANGE FORM.

About 75 students are registered in courses which do not exist, arts and science administrator Peter Stokes told the Journal Tuesday.

This is one reason for the registration confirmation forms, like the one above, which were sent out to arts and science students last week, Stokes said.

He said there was no way of knowing how many students have registered themselves in courses which actually do exist but which are not the ones they are taking.

A number of the forms had been returned with corrections, Stokes said. But no one had brought in the spelling of "calender" in the second line as an "error or change", he added.

Residence vote is set

Thursday of next week has been set as the date when residence students will vote on the principle of coed residences.

The Women's residence Council, meeting Monday night, called a women's referendum for Thursday, October 28. Last night's meeting of the Inter-Residence Council was expected to do the same for the men.

There will be a general meeting of all students in residence on Tuesday evening. It will be chaired by coed residence committee chairman Doug Romans; he and the two residence chairmen (Cindy Davidson of WRC and Ian Nordheimer of IRC) will be able to answer questions about the coed residence proposal.

That meeting starts at 7 p.m. Tuesday in Leonard Hall cafeteria.

The Thursday referendum requires a two-thirds majority among women voting, Miss Davidson said. Nordheimer told the Journal that it would require a two-thirds majority in men's residence as well.

If the referendum approves the coed residence proposal presented by the study committee, it will go to the governing boards of the residences.

"I feel confident that it will be passed" by the residence boards, Miss Davidson said.

Ian Nordheimer

The proposal is that Victoria Hall house both men and women next year, alternating by room, and than Gordon House and Brockington House become women's rresidences.

Engineers build perfect car

Eight mechanical engineering students at Queen's are taking part in a contest to design, build and run the ideal city car.

The Urban Vehicle Design Competition grew out of a contest two years ago between the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and CalTech. Students from the two institutes built electric cars and raced them across the United States. Last year 33 colleges from all over North America took part in a "clean air car race"; a $100,000 car entered by the University of Toronto was one winner.

This year Queen's is one of 110 colleges taking part. The aim of the competition is to design a car which will be easy to manoeuvre in traffic and to park, and will provide "a safe, reliable form of transportation".

It is to be pollution-free and economical in terms of energy expended.

The team producing the Queen's entry includes the eight engineering students, headed by project coordinator Tim Secord of Science 72. The work put into the design project will count as credit towards the students' undergraduate theses, Secord said.

In addition, students from psychology and art education are helping with the project, so that the vehicle produced will be not only technically efficient but also aesthetically pleasing.

The art students are con centrating on the styling of the vehicle; psychology students are working on the location, colouring and design of controls in the car to make it easier and more efficient to drive.

The vehicle must be ready and iin Chicago by August 1 next year, Secord said, and the Queen's team is finding that deadline pressing.

Construction will begin in the spring, Secord added, and the car's designers welcome comments, ideas and especially skilled labour to help build it.

NOTICE
Queen's University
Parking Regulations

The demand for green parking permits has far exceeded the number of parking spaces available in the green zone. As a result some applicants accepted, as second choice orange permits, even though their place of work or study is in the green zone.

For the next month or two there will be a surplus of parking spaces in the green zone. This is because space reserved for construction later this year is currently available for parking. In order to reduce some of the inconvenience caused to those who received orange permits, rather than green, it has been decided to designate the north half of the area behind Miller Hall as an orange parking area, pro tem.

It is emphasized that this redesignation of colour zones is very temporary and will terminate when construction commences.

"If we didn't eat anything we'd be 100 percent safe, wouldn't we?" laughs one FDA official, whose stamp brings new additives onto the market or keeps them off.

Not only "convenience foods" (substitute "junk food", even though it is a contradiction in terms) are laden with additives to make them keep longer, taste almost like real food and look attractive, but every day, once-nutritious food is as well. The food industry of America has managed to introduce 3,000 different snythetic flavours, colours, thickeners, acidifiers, bleaches, preservatives, package contaminants, antibiotics, and poison pesticides into its products. Virtually no food on the grocery shelves is free from chemical additives which have no nutritive value, that are probably harmful, and whose main aim is to make eaters think they're eating something they aren't.

The United States' Food and Drug Administration is not willing to state that such additives are safe. "Long-term usage of additives can in no way be rated with safety. We have so many cases of common diseases like mental retardation and cancer, which we can't account for through epidemiological studies, for which we can't find a cause and effect." said Marvin Legator, chief biochemist at the FDA. Such diseases may, in fact, be caused by chronic poisoning from food additives -- something which may take years of research to confirm.

Even if the 93 possible different additives in your daily bread aren't bad for you (and there's good evidence that they are), it is clear that they do nothing positive. At best you pay for synthetic colour and taste, signifying nothing -- except booming profits for the multibillion-dollar drug and food industry. Food companies are beginning to devote themselves exclusively to processed, synthetic foods -- and it's no surprise. "The profit margin on food additives is fantastically good," a top food marketer says, "much better than the profit margin on basic, traditional foods."

Producing synthetic additives has grown into a $500,000,000-a-year business, putting out nearly 1,000,000,000 pounds of additives in 1970, and the producers expect this business to increase even more.

Additives owe their phenomenal success to the boom in convenience foods, the expensive frozen and dehydrated stuff in pouches and trays which turn into meals (if they can be called that) when you add a little water or pop them into the oven for 30 minutes. Because of their mode of production, convenience foods need additives to render them edible, as is stated in Chemical and Engineering News: "They are prepared under more severe conditions of temperature, pressure or agitation. Therefore they may require special flavourings, flavour enhancers, colours and additives to make up for the partial loss of flavour colour, texture and other properties caused by processing." Also lost through extremes of temperature are many of the nutritive elements, which are not properly replaced by additives. The food industry is predicting a time when all its energies will be channeled into the production of synthetic foods because of the demand for such convenience articles. In other words, safe or not, someday soon there will be no choice between the "food" that the industry offers you, and real, traditional food.

"Convenience foods have contributed more than anything else to the growth of the good industry," says Leonard Tauberman, managing editor of Food Engineering. "If you plot the dollar sales of food against the population growth, you'll find people are actually paying more dollars in the supermarket than ten years ago. And for the same amount of food. Those extra dollars the housewife is leaving behind in the supermarket are for convenience foods."

Additives are cost cutting -- for the manufacturer. Fruit juices no longer need fruit, cake mixes have no eggs. But the biggest thing on the market is spun soy protein, which can be processed to taste like almost anything. The soy protein in itself is cheap, and, after processing, is sold at regular food prices, affording the food industry excellent profits.

What do we need them for, these 33 preservatives, 28 antioxidants, 45 sequestrants, 111 emulsifiers, 39 stabilizers and thickeners, 24 bleaching and maturing agents, 60 buffers, acids and alkils, 34 food colours, 3 artificial sweeteners, 117 nutritive supplements (synthetic, to "replace" what processing takes out), 1610 artificial flavours, and these new, imitation soy foods? The way the industry tells it, convenience and synthetic foods -- and the additives that make them palatable -- are the answer to the 20th century, the domestic revolution, the liberation of the consumer (synonymous in the food world with "housewife"). "The housewife of today, who may very likely have an outside job or be deeply involved in community activites, is no longer willing to spend three hours in the kitchen preparing dinner," writes Chemical and Engineering News. No one ever asked the consumer if here might be other social means to liberate women -- and consumers never asked for additives which might poison them before they could even adjust to "liberation." But the market doesn't work that way. "Consumers rarely demand anything," says S. Allen Heininger, director of food additives at Monsanto. "The only way to find out if there is a need for product is to put the product on the market and see if consumers accept it. If the consumers accept it and buy it, then you can say they want it and therefore need it." This approach uses a very loose definition of "need", neglects to mention the massive ad campaigns that usually surround the introduction of a new product, and also neglects the fact the consumer is left unaware of exactly what she - he is getting, and the consequences of consuming these products (consequences of which neither the food industry or the FDA are sure.)

Geneticists Bruce Ames and Joshua Lederberg (Nobel laureate) are afraid that synthetic food additives may be detrimental to the human gene pool. And the final results of this damage will not show up for generations. "It's not that the food additive is a large individual risk, but it may be an epidemiological problem," says Ames. If out a million people one person's genes are mutant, that's a serious problem...If we're filling ourselves now with mutant genes, they're going to be around for generations and generations."

Although less than half the additives on the market have ever been tested they carry the FDA's blessing, labelled as GRAS -- "Generally Recognized As Safe." They are so labelled because they were in use when the U.S. Congress passed the Food Additive Amendment of 1958, and seemed okay after years of use, or because food-additive regulations restrict their use to levels which laboratory tests have shown to be safe. Unfortunately one is never exposed to just one additive, at a safe level, but multitudes of them, working collectively at unsafe levels. And the FDA, because of its poverty and lack of staff, can never test sufficiently all the chemicals on the market. This means that research on additives must be done in the available labs -- of the food industry -- where vested interests have a tendency to reduce the scientific objectivity of the testing procedures.

The slowness of food research, and the strength of the food industry lobby mean that many chemicals contaminating your food will remain exactly where they are, contaminating your food. So these are the prime offenders to watch for:

1. Sodium Nitrite and sodium nitrate:

To keep meet looking blood red (because hemoglobin in blood will turn brown on exposure to air) meat processors add sodium nitrite and sodium nitrate to hot-dogs, bologna, and breakfast sausage. (Supposedly, according to the food industry's 'motivational research' people. Americans just can't abide brown-looking meat). Sodium nitrite and nitrate hold a firm place in toxilogical literature as human poisons and as laboratory carcinogens and mutagens.

Researchers worry particularly about sodium nitrate fertilizer residues in spinach and other leafy vegetables. Intestinal bacteria change the nitrates into nitrites, which then react with hemoglobin and turn children and babies blue in fits of methemoglobinemia, an acute blood poisoning. Nitrites, which are used to preserve smoked fish, such as herring, salmon, and tuna, also react with secondary amines in the fish, and at stomach acidic levels form nitrosamines, which are powerful cancer agents. Or, warns Dr. Lederberg, if nitrite gets into the DNA in human cells as it does in laboratory tests with micro-organisms, it will mutuate the genes.

Britain has heavy restrictions on BHT and BHA - the most widely used antioxidants in America - and has completely banned them from all foods intended for babies and children. In the States and Canada, kids get these chemicals from their cereals, packaged sliced bread, and in countless other packaged fatty foods that they eat daily. Rats that have been fed BHT often show liver enlargement, and British scientists have found that BHA induces tumours. BHT poses a peculiar problem in that, while 75 percent is excreted from the body within 24 hours, the rest lingers and accumulates in body fats. None conclusive numberous tests have FDA takes the easy way out and keep out dirt. Meats, crackers, soups, cereals, vegetables, fruits, crisp snacks: they all suck up several thousand additives used in packaging. - more BHT and BHA, more sodium nitrate, methyl cellulose, and potassium hydroxide - all in the wrappings this time - - lime, zinc, chloride, soap, animal glue, shellac, peroxiades - every additive that is also put directly into the food, and more. Rest assured (by the FDA) that the package-to-food migration is very small. But remember that you get the additives from every package, from every wrapper, from every food. The levels add up.

You can start battling the corporations on your own. You can't avoid all additives and pollutants, but you can avoid paying for foods which do nothing good for your body -- and could be slowly poisoning it.

1. Don't eat foods with artificial colours.
2. Don't eat bakery products, especially bread, made with bleached flour. Go to a good local bakery or make your own.
3. Avoid dehydrated and other "convenience" foods such as boxed mashed potatoes, dry packaged soups and imitation beef stroganoff. The closest you'll come to real food is some vegetable and beef powder. The rest is synthetic.
4. Don't eat packaged snacks or cereals.
5. Don't eat imitation foods.
6. Stay away from products which contain hydrogenated vegetable oils.

Eaters will have to make certain sacrifices: eating real meats and poultry and more fresh fruits and vegetables means making dinner will take 30 minutes instead of 15.

But it's worth it.

BY DICK LONEY

If your ear was attuned to the British music scene even before the Beatles, the name of Cliff Richard and the Shadows generally bespoke the "over there" counterparts to Elvis and the Jordanaires. With Cliff relegated to semi-obscurity, it naturally followed that the Shadows most probably accompanied Andy Capp to the weekly unemployment dole wicket -- suddenly, from the midst of the plethora of albums released weekly comes an unassumingly titled release -- "MARVIN, WELCH & FARRAR". Could it be that two thirds of this new-formed trio hearkened back to the old Shadows recordings?

Indeed, Hank B. Marvin and Bruce Welch were the duo who penned many of the Cliff Richard, and Shadows hits in the late Fifties and pre-Beatle Sixties, but now, teamed with John Farrar, their music has progressed to a new dimension. To search for comparative groups which might approximate the vocal and guitar stylings of Marvin, Welch and Farrar, after the names of Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young and the Hollies, you'd be hard pressed to name rock groups of this calibre.

Acoustic guitar predominates -- in the intros to the lead number "You're Burning Bridges", and "Brownie Kentucky", the impression is that of two evenly-matched guitarists trading patterns, and as the vocals are augmented with choral-like backing its evident that old England's counterpart of America's Ventures haven't lost a thing instrumentally, but have evidently been attending voice classes!

The harmonies of this trio are superior to anything that's been done by SCN&Y, or (one is tempted to say, the Beach Boys, but that's hallowed ground!) any of the heavy-on-harmony aggregations on the market. Take note of the impeccable phrasing and harmonies of the chorus to "Faithful", or "Mistress Fate & Father Time". One is immediately impressed with the almost flamenco acoustic stylings which underplay beneath the tightly-woven vocals -- even when the string arrangements are present (by John Farrar) they don't intrude, they merely act as a layer of tapestry on which Hank, Bruce and John hang their not-to-be-believed voice-combinations.

Marvin, Welch & Farrar moved with evident dexterity from a lament in the slow, moody mode, such as "Wish You Were Here", to the up-tempo resources of "Mr. Sun" without losing a thing vocally or in feeling. In fact, the only regrettable thing about this record is its brevity (ten songs) and the fact that a lot of people are missing a great album due to the lamentable practice major labels have adopted by ballyhooing such duds as Grand Funk's next garbage-offering and ignoring the truly fine efforts of not-yet-Super-groups! MARVIN WELCH ? FARRAR Capitol ST-760.

With what appears to be a "first" album, a group called "MAGIC" has put together ten of their own compositions, added the piano of Stevie Wonder, and the aid of Canada's R. Dean Taylor to come up with a recording that separates Magic from the mediocre herds of disc purveyors. If versatility and the ability to shift from the heavier rock genre to country rock and then back to prettier ballad stylings is the key to success for a promising young group then Magic may be imbued with that particular talent.

"Absolutely Free, Absolutely Beautiful" is a ballad written by first guitarist Joey Murcia, whose other song constitutes the only two numbers that weren't composed by Duane King - the second guitar for Magic.

The opening cut on the album is "Keep On Moving On" and it sets the tone for the album -- a kind of good-time hard rock, with the vocal accomplishments that readily separate dime-a-dozen rock groups from the genuine article. On the tune "I'm Your Landlord", the piano of Steve Wonder shades in enough to offset the solo-swapping of guitarists King and Murcia, while Nick King's bass does battle with the drumming of Gary Harger.

"Our Hearts Are In Our Heads" features some witty lyric references to two of Canada's current contributions to pop song-writing:

Joni always singin' bout
She thinks she understands
And I have to compliment her on her men...
Neil is always tellin' us he knows it won't be long Before its time for us to sing out song...

The production and the all-round superior work on Magic's album should guarantee that their work gets the airplay and attention it deserves. MAGIC..Ampex-Rare Earth R527L.

Homage to Shakespeare

By Sandy Maiman

William Shakespeare is alive and well and living in Convocation Hall. Or so he was, on October 17th when "Sunday's at Eight" presented "Homage to Shakespeare" with Rod Robertson. Mr. Robertson delighted his audience with readings of some of Shakespeare's most famous and familiar speeches.

Perhaps the most intriguing aspect of the evening was Mr. Robertson's agility in being able to slip in and out of the numerous characters he represented and mingling his interpretations with a conversational and interesting monologue about the context of the speech and the character who speaks it.

The highlight of the evening was a segment of the program in which Mr. Robertson gave a historical commentary, with examples, of the various modes of acting from Elizabethan times, to the present, using Hamlet's "To be or not to be..." soliloquy. He went from the early roughly hewn speech patterns, to the elaborate and articulate gestures of the Victorian period and finally to the realistic and naturalistic modes of the present. Mr Robertson was able to imitate the leading actors of the day in his jaunt through history and to exaggerate their idiosyncrasies just enough to make them immensely funny.

The evening was completely entertaining. The audience was receptive to Mr. Robertson and he held them in the palm of his hand, from his opening lines to his final and almost hesitant bow. My only criticism of the evening was that it was too short. We'd love to have had more!

Kingston Music Club

Young musical talent from this area will be presented in a concert held in Duncan MacArthur Hall on Monday evening, October 25th at 8 p.m. The Kingston Music Club announces their second concert of the season to display the students who have won awards in the Royal Conservatory of Music examinations held in January and June of 1971. Associate memberships will be available at the door at $1.50 for adults and $1.00 for students.

A number of pianists will perform as well as violinists, trombonists, a French horn player and Brendalee Boisvert, a student in the Department of Music at Queens, with an additional display from the Community Ballet Association. In total there will be 21 award winners on the program plus some non-prize winners. During the evening the Special Award for Outstanding Achievement, 1970-71 will be given and also the Marilyn Duff Awards for participation and contribution in various fields of music.

RIP OFF: Will the person(s) who stole 50 records from our house October 18 (on Division Street) please return them. Or, any information leading to the return of said records will be rewarded. Phone 544-3201. Thank you.

Win Wayne State Regatta

SAILORS TO COMPETE IN U.S. NATIONALS

Queen's sailors made history last Saturday, sweeping to victory in the Wayne State International Regatta and earning themselves an invitation to the U.S. Collegiate Finals next month in Chicago. It marked the first time a team from Canada had been offered a chance to compete against the best collegiate sailors in the U.S.

The Queen's team, of skippers John Telgmann and Bob Lewis, with Euan Swan and Sandy Goodall as crew, face a stern test, with local water temperatures heading into the thirties. Practices could be a problem.

The Wayne State meet, held in Detroit, saw Canadian crews sweep the top two spots, with R.M.C. finishing behind Queen's. Michigan State was third. The Queen's contingent had a low 69 points, well ahead of R.M.C. with 85. McMaster and the University of Windsor were 7th and 8th respectively.

Waterpolo Wins Again

Queen's waterpolo team won their second exhibition match of the season Saturday, dumping Toronto's George Vanier High School 11-1. Earlier,the Gaels had defeated R.M.C. 7-4 at the Anderson Gym. Despite the loss of star players Darko Sturman and Chris Whatley, the Gaels have shown themselves capable of scoring goals; defensively, however, the team has suffered from occasional lapses, especially late in the game.

The TO high schoolers, coached by Queensman Len Minty, were easily outclassed by the older, stronger, and faster Queen's swimmers, but did cause the Gaels some problems late in the final period, when the defense began to get rather spotty. This tendancy will cause real problems against powers like Toronto and McMaster, who have traditionally been well-conditioned clubs with good endurance.

Gael scorers were Hurd, Chelbo, Patterson, Craig, and Archie Nesbitt, who potted three markers for Queen's.

Archers Improve

The O.W.I.A.A. women's outdoor archery tournament, hosted by Western last Friday and Saturday,saw the Queen's team place a respectable fifth after a close fought battle for fourth place with the more experienced Western team. The final standings gave U. of Toronto first place, followed by McMaster, Guelph, Western, and Queen's. High individual scores went to Anne Chalmers (U. of T.) with 1154 points, Kit Kohler (U. of T.) 1134, and Janet Spence (Queen's) 1120. The Queen's showing this year is vastly improved over previous years and the fact that four of the six team members were novice shooters raises expectations for a much better showing in the indoor meet in February.

BEAT TORONTO !

Thanks a parking lot!

By James Fitzgerald and Mark Smyka

I possess a proud, aristocratic Volkswagen of Ayran stock affectionately dubbed Wolfgang. Wolfgang possesses more inherent superiority in his dipstick than the combined charisma of an army of smokey, decadent V8's. Wolfgang is even better than a boxcar full of Japanese 29 speed bicycles.

It has been insinuated that Wolfgang is over the hill, but experience has its benefits in the daily dodging and waving in the nervous disorder of Kingston traffic.

Yesterday I was strutting home from German History class when I spied a Queen's University Pinko Parking Authority slandering, harassing, and otherwise undermining Wolfgang's integrity. Perhaps because Wolfgang's arrival has exceeded the foreign import quota, he does not have the required pink-coloured parking permit pasted to his proud pate.

Wolfgang saluted perfunctorily by cocking his antennae and beeping curtly as if to confess, "I know nothing, mein Kommandant."

Rallying to his side, I clambered inside Wolfgang to organize an honourable retreat. Intimidated by shrill cries of RAUS! RAUS! and the ominous advent of a gruesomely underfed tow truck, I prayed for a merciful deliverance from the authoritarian barbarism of the Queen's University Car Concentration Camp, a methodical exterminator of a whole race of vehicles.

A desperate, hungry voice suddenly barked, "Either you buy a pink-coloured parking permit or next time we'll break your dipstick in half!"

But parking permits cost too much. And what would you do if someone threatened to break your dipstick in half?

Rather than succumb to this grisly blackmail, I have sadly but tactfully humbled myself to the common pedestrians paths of Kingston and the Queen's campus. We have lost the battle but not the war, Wolfgang.

In the meantime, Wolfgang and I are anticipating a special grant for veterans, a place on the old Richardson Stadium team. Some benevolent administrators have granted certain Queen's cars permits to participate in sporting events on the asphalt turf. Although crowd attendance is down, the Parking Authority expects a surge of dogs and children over the Christmas holidays.

the Dormouse

BY ALAN BROADBENT

I had a dream the other night about Homecoming Weekend, 1971. As happens in most dreams, a whole series of events was compressed into one highly confusing instance, which interpreters of dreams tell us is symbolic of the entire situation.

The dream was prompted, no doubt, by the programme of events for those alumni classes which were reunited at the old Alma Mater last weekend. This programme was filled with teas, cocktail parties, dinners, coffees and doughnuts, and box luncheons, all arranged in a grueling order which would render the average student incapable of getting out of bed for the next three months.

The scene of the dream was indistinct, but there were large numbers of old folks milling around, eating, drinking, and reminiscing. Alumni association director, Herb Hamilton, was standing in the centre of the dream, talking to everyone as if he had seen them just yesterday. His colleague, Jim Wright, was marshalling alumni around Herb, making sure that no-one was left out.

AMS president, Patrick Riley, was standing just off to one side, marvelling at the age of the alumni, not to mention the group of AMS constables. Vic Bradley, AMS vice-president, was surrounded by a group of elderly female alumni who were making comforting sounds, obviously mistaking him for a homely co-ed.

Suddenly the confusion was cut by vice-principal administration Russ Kennedy, reminding everyone of the new parking policy at the university. Vice-principal (finance) Dave Bonham stood by his side, ready to collect any errant parking fees.

While this was going on, another vice-principal, Jim Courtright (information and development) scurried through the crowd passing the hat in order to bolster the Queen's Capital Campaign.

Arts dean Ron Watts and vice-principal (academic) George Harrower were standing off to one side trying to talk science dean Bob Uffen into going into films, starring opposite Ed Monahan, executive assistant to the principal.

This was interrupted by the other executive assistant to the principal, Jim Whitley, cleverly disguised as an Irish snowfall, who was just checking to see if there was anything he could do.

Whitley was lured away by medicine dean Doug Waugh and law dean Dan Soberman who were trying to start a boogaloo line. However, business dean Reg Hand and education dean Vern Ready talked them into a jive session, recommended by Padre Laverty as being more appropriate to the occasion.

At this point in my dream, two events took place which really stand out. First, principal John Deutsch arrived, and not recognizing anyone, he discovered he was at the wrong event. He stepped onto the bow of graduate dean Bob MacIntosh's sailboat which was just then cruising past, and he left.

Just as the principal sailed off into the sunset, chancellor John Stirling arrived, discovered he was at the wrong event, decided he liked the looks of the people there, and stayed. However, he was quickly talked into a game of handball by phys-ed director Don Macintosh, the winner to play dean of women Bea Bryce.

Doug Romans, men's residence council chairman, rose from the middle of the crowd and began to play his bagpipes. This was roundly accepted by the assembled alumni, except for one woman who discovered that the bagpipes were in fact her daughter, and proceeded to club Romans severely, thus putting an end to a long-standing Queen's tradition.

As one could imagine, the dream was reaching a highly confused state, and there seemed to be no egress. Flanking the entire scene now, acting as a pair of brackets, was the AMS outer council on one side, vascillating wildly, and the football team on the other side, bucking and plunging.

Everything was put to a sudden halt, however, by the arrival of Cam Jones, director of physical plant, who dissembled the entire situation with a small wrench.

Thanks to Cam Jones, I got a good sleep for the rest of the night, and was only left with vague impressions of Homecoming Weekend 1971.

The reale Chaucer

That time of the year has arrived when all the poor frosh are assaulted by English profs praising the works of Chaucer and spouting off in Middle English. But what strikes me as strange is that when each scholar makes an attempt to demonstrate "How Chaucer's English would have sounded" the results are surprisingly different. This pecularity, I am told, is attributed to the various dialects of the time. Finally I managed to find someone on the faculty who was actually fluent in the language and whose first lecture began something like this:

"Whan ye wil of Chaucer can ful well,
Ye mon see that he can ne yspell,
And is yclept the father of oure tonge,
But for myn parte, I suppose him ful of dunge.
Methinks I slepe whan he goe on and on
About everie preeste, and everie preestes sonne;
Of veritable bloode or guts he nevere yrites,
But with satyre sweete he keeps us wak at nights,
And mixes alle the Latins with the Greks
And blushes whan he dare to speke of sexe.
His charaktyres are eech ysteeped in beere,
With humoure like some yplastered engineere;
They yramble through eech dronchen monotonie
Ther tales then goe to prane ther rosarie
With a Wif of Bathe who was a grande bore,
A Pardoner who was but litel more,
A Preeste ymbarked upon a three week dronch
(And crewde and lewde caun both devise the Monke),
With Knight yclad ful like a faerie,
Hoze the Helle coulde olde Engelonde be so merrie?"

-George Raine

Celebrate!

What are we here for? In this university, I mean? Hey man, I mean it. To get an education? Hell, just what is this education that people talk about. Why, at times, it amounts to little more than conditioning. Conditioning that is both intellectual ("a very impressive abstract - I didn't understand it but it had 15 footnotes") and social (most interpersonal relationship, for example, are with other students, a situation not so common on big city campuses like McGill and University of Toronto.)

Break out of it! Celebrate! Climb a mountain in the Laurentians. Get lost in a forest in the Gatineau. Chase whores on "The Main." Talk to a junkie on Bloor. Roll in some of the muck that is life.

Mix some politics with your poetics. In a university situation, it is possible for your life to be restricted by narrow enough intellectual and social paramteres without your even realizing it. Cater, therefore, not only to the intellectual centre of your brain but also to the instinctive. I'm not telling you to get laid - no-one needs to tell you that. I'm telling you not to forget that part of you which is an explorer, a hunter, a lover a fighter.

Wake up! Celebrate!

Watch the signs at Agnes

If you drop into Agnes this week expecting to find neat rows of pictures, "do not touch" signs, or even new art forms, you'll be pleasantly (or unpleasantly) surprised. The Art Gallery of Ontario's travelling exhibit, Signs and Symbols, fills the large gallery and should, if you've got enough time and are at least a bit inquisitive, enlighten your mind and hopefully make you a bit more aware of our environment. There are a few "works of art" proper in the show, but a vast amount of material to examine; after looking, touching, listening, stamping, adding, and peering into little holes, you will realise that not all art is on walls, cut out of stone or in art galleries.

There is art in propaganda and propaganda in art. Our industrialised world does have its subtleties and it takes an exhibition like this one to bring out these refinements. Art is everywhere: in street signs, logos, at your friendly neighbourhood Dominion store, in a CN bar-car, at the church of your choice, and, 2 to 1, it is abbreviated -- in a symbol, a sign, or on a label. Isolate this abbreviation; multiply and - or enlarge it; hang it on a wall or the ceiling; photograph it and make a slide, and you have art. Change it in very subtle or not so subtle ways, add a little humour (maybe), a title or a frame (or stand), and you have the beginnings of pop art. But that's a different story altogether...

Back to Agnes! Like any A.G.O. exhibition, there is not much that one can criticize, especially if it is co-ordinated by Anita Aarons, the very able organiser of a number of travelling "shows", including that "smash hit", Sensory Perception, which was at Agnes for most of June and broke all attendance records.

The fault is not with Anita, but Agnes - cramped space forced the staff to cram all the material into one gallery, and, considering the expert displays of past shows, the space is not utilized as well as it could have been, nor is the display as tasteful and organised as it should have been. But, I'm telling you these things so that you'll expect disorganization (which could be considered fitting for an exhibition of signs and symbols, I suppose).

'All Over' Again

By Lynette Hodgson

Who are these talented actors who made Albee's "All Over" such a "dynamic exploration" for Sandy Naiman? (Journal, Oct. 15). In "All Over", a play I was unfortunate enough to see before it died its blessed death after on week on Broadway, Edward Albee cries Woolf once too often. George and Martha, the only people he knows it seems, are at it again, having become old and wound-down, with nothing more to say. Thankfully, they grind to a halt and stop talking altogether. Not all the ministrations of director Sir John Gielgud, aided by such notables as Jessica Tandy (who created the role of Blanche in "A Streetcar Named Desire"), George Voskovec (in his third Gielgud production), and Canadians Colleen Dewhurst and Madeleine Sherwood, could bring their ailing corpses to life. Yet here in Kingston, against impossible odds, without even the aid of Rouben Ter-Arutunian's exquisitely designed set, a group of talented actors (modestly not mentioned till the end of the article) have done what Sir John Gielgud's cast could not do -- created from Albee's dead script a play of "sparkling life".

Is this the same talented group who are going to rejuvenate Theatre 5's "The Homecoming", a miscast and mismanaged first edition of which we suffered this summer? (For indeed, Diane Gordon in the same issue assures us their second go at it will "add a great deal" to our fall. And surely a critic, chosen right from the Theatre 5 company itself, should be the best qualified to judge!)

Alas, my excitement is short-lived. I fear the Journal theatre critics once again have been indulging too freely in that "extra element of imagination" Sandy Naiman speaks of so glibly. With foreboding, I face another year of unnecessarily mediocre productions, productions whose poor quality reflect the stultifying directing, parochial bickering and lack of group motivation and fulfilment which are prominent features of Kingston's little theatres.

It seems scandalous that a city whose enthusiasm can support over five theatre companies (however cancerous and pathalogical such a growth seems in a city this size), which sports outstanding actors like Gordon Robertson of Theatre 5 and whose youth are eager to turn their creative energies to the theatre is not realizing its potential.

There is not one adequate theatre with suitable facilities for rehearsing and producing plays. There is not one group producing plays of consistently good quality. There is not one group outside the university offering organized workshops for training young actors and inspiring potential directors with the techniques and craft that they need. We are capable of supporting a well-organized, expanding theatre group, presenting a continuous, year-round play-bill of diversified fare -- modern, period, experimental, "safe" -- decently housed and efficiently run. We have at hand an untapped potential being held back by the static heirarchies and lack of adequate training in our theatres.

Geographically and temporarlly, Kingston theatre is in a position to create a reputation in eastern Ontario; with the right guidance it might grow to rival in a small way Stratford and Niagara (for after all, those hardy Olympic sailors descending on us in 76 can't all want to spend their evenings in the Manor?) If we are to develop into a dynamic theatre from the small-town amateurs we are at present, we must first of all learn to look at ourselves and our achievements realistically. Responsible reporting in the Journal and elsewhere is therefore imperative; for indeed, if we fall back upon the self complacent eulogies proliferated by Diane Gordon and Sandy Niaman we are deluding ourselves. We will be forever branded as amateur and professionalism for us will be "All Over".

Parade

The Queen's Bands will be a central attraction in the University of Toronto's homecoming parade Saturday morning.

The parade leads off at 9:30 a.m. from the corner of Hoskin Avenue and St. George Street on the U. of T. campus.

Here is the route:

North on St. George Street to Bloor Street.

East along Bloor Street to Yonge Street.

South on Yonge Street (the main street of Toronto) to Elm Street (halfway between College and Dundas).

West on Elm Street to University Avenue.

North on University Avenue to College Street (at the southern edge of Queen's Park)

West on College Street to King's College Road; north there and into King's College Circle.

Yet another victory, but no stains

This Saturday, the Golden Gaels will invade Varsity Stadium for would you believe, a "nothing" game; the outcome will have no effec on the Capital Division race, although some individual marks could be threatened. Don't tell the teams, though. Both Queen's and Varsity have a lot of pride and the Blues will be out for revenge, while the Gaels figure that 7-and-1 sounds a lot better than 6-and-2. Watch for another headcracker...

For those fans who make it to Varsity Stadium and are still able to see the field, here are some things to watch:

—the house - league rushing race between Gord McLellan and Briar Warrender. Both have about 700 yards on the ground and 11 touch downs. Dave Hadden is in third place; he only has 500 or so.

—Tom Taylor and Stu Lang playing pitch and catch in the Varsity hook zones. If they rest Lang, substitute Ron Cunningham and keep watching.

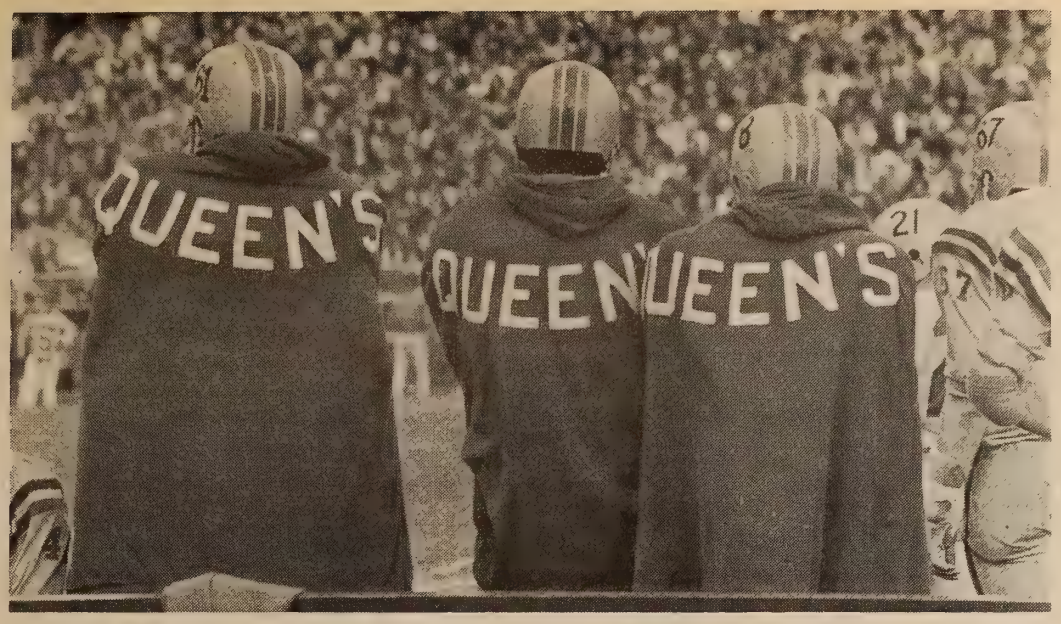
—an exchange of friendly greetings between Queen's Don Smith (65) and Toronto's No. 63.

—another fine display by big Jim Sherritt. James was double - and sometimes triple - teamed last Saturday and still got good penetration.

—many, many penalties, some deserved, not not.

—rain.

Looking beyond this next encounter, the Gales will meet Western a Richardson Stadium on October 30. The Mustangs have been erratic this year, losing to Toronto and McMaster (yup, McMaster), but have a basically sound ball club with good backs. Problem is, coach Frank Cosentino likes to pass, and you know what the weather is like in Kingston late in October. Kidding aside, Western could be troublesome. It depends.



The other playoff will see McMaster taking on Ottawa in Hamilton This is another weatherman's dream; if Ottawa has to play in the rain there could be an upset brewing. Mac has a good, big defensive ball club and can run well. And Ottawa just might not be all that good Carleton beat them 28-14 in the instant-rivalry Panda Game, an the Ravens were physically destroyed then (October 8). Apparently some key Ottawa players didn't survive the encounter, and that could also be a big factor. Time will tell.

letters to the editors

Journal's true colours revealed: red is for artsci

Dear Editors:

Rocky and Spike eh? Robin Beaudoin and Donald McGeorge indeed! (re, Feedback October 12)Well, we weren't taken in, even if you were. These two characters are either a couple of cranks who get their vicarious jollies out of writing vitriolic letters to the editors of the Journal, or more likely, and much more importantly, part of a highly organized Communist plot aimed at subversing, through an irresponsible exaggeration of the conservative stance, all those fine and noble values which members of this intellectual community justifiably hold dear.

What, however, is even more regrettable is that the Journal itself has somehow fallen prey to these pernicious influences. First of all (Tuesday, October 11) the Journal runs a front-page article which (however inadvertently) would seem to have been slanted towards giving support to those "old Victorian plants" who would presume to cry out against the gloriously colourful and creative language and behaviour widely and proudly manifested by Queen's students at public functions.

Then, on Tuesday, the The Journal runs an arrticle, "Football, the Sport of Kings", in which this game, one of our most cherished remaining links with the prehistoric age, was ruthlessly disparaged. And what, we may well query, would we have this institution noted for if not for its wonderful and illustrious football team!

We in no way believe that the editors of the Queen's Journal are to be held personally culpable for all this but would merely suggest that these incidents strongly testify to the degree of infiltration of obvious espionage groups operating within our very midst!

Again, we repeat that this campaign against obscenity, vulgarity, and barbarism is nothing but a rotten pinko plot being waged by peace-creeps and queers.

Fire burn, candle sputter, WITCH explains itself

We want women to be together. This desire for sisterhood prompted us to respond to the announcement in the Journal of the candlelighting ceremony with our at--together at all. After being herded through an entrance uu thaat the ceremony wasn't meant to bring women 'ogether at all. After being hereded througg an entrancee to Grant Hall and robed in academic garb, we were louble-filed and arranged unimaginatively through several lhundredl yards of corridor. There we stood for nearly an hour, until our overseers signalled us to move. Finally lined up against the walls of Grant Hall, we were "introduced" to the female faculty representatives, and the vice-president of the ASUS, our high priestesses for the occasion.

The significance of the ceremony, we're told, rested on the passing on from a single match the flame of "wisdom and valour". Yet, from our position on the floor, we heard mumblings and titters and comments like, "what is all this horseshit". It was clear that for most of the women present the real meaning of the ceremony lay in its more widely known interpretation. Even before the flames were lit the women were carefully examining the knotting of the ribbons on the candles to see which "MAN" they would come to be defined by at each of the accepted stages of relationships that Queenswomen are supposed to have (dating, affair, marriage). Responding to this discrepancy of interpretation, one of our sisters approached the vacant microphone and read her poem; candles of flesh

for the freshettes may they drip from the wicks
of Queensmen

It is interesting that for a ceremony supposed to 'bring the first year women together' most of the 400-odd women that were there attended because their proctors urged them to go. Apparently, in spite of the avowed purpose of the meeting, it doesn't matter that many women don't attend. No attempt is made to bring them together in a valid way.

The major part of the roughly thirty minute length of the meeting was taken up with the filing of we 400 on to the stage to get lit and then off again to count our drips -- which would indicate the number of children we'd have. The ceremony ended with the order to blow out - presumably, once you'd checked your knots and counted your drips -- thus establishing your wife and mother role, the flame of wisdom and valour could be extinguished. And according to tradition the candle is not again to be lit until you get married or lose your virginity, whichever comes first. (Like both are bound to happen). Perhaps a maidenhead puts some mystical limitations on the mental and moral faculties? We carried a blantantly phallic candle (the legitimate ones were piddling imitations) in order to illustrate the gap between the organizers' conception of the meaning of the ceremony, and that of the novices.

This gap was firmly evidence by comments overheard on leaving; "I don't care, I'm not going to marry an Artsman." "I'm going to have two and a half kids!" "Jeepers! An engineer." The comments of the organisers to our displays and statements were also interesting and brought out well the fact that they didn't understand the response of the rest of the partcipants to 'their' ceremony. They told us, insistently and constantly, that the sexual aspects of the service were irrelevant -- why then did they respond so violently (vulgar! shocking!) to our symbol of this the phallus as candle. Apparently they miss the symbols and meanings they themselves wish to perpetuate.

And, perhaps the saddest charge of all was that we were taking the whole thing too seriously -- that we didn't understand that the point of the whole thing was to have fun. We came to have fun, we like the idea of women having fun together -- but we'd rather symbolise our fun with a feminine bonfire than a phallus -- to really get together in ways in which the perpetuators of candle-lighting's conceptions of the world wouldn't allow them to understaand -- and certainly not around the men who they say will define us.

If the point is to get women together, why not do it in a non-oppressive way -- provide for a situation where people can talk -- where there are no microphones -- where people come because that's what they want too-- and where there's at least enough time to get comfortable with each other. If we really wanted to do it properly perhaps our model should be the same as that which inspired this ceremony originally -- the witches' oven. Witches have been around a lot longer than Queen's and will remain so in some form or other as long as there is a questions of the sort of definition of women by men which some of our female organisational types would impose on us (all unknowingly!) After all, witches were the first women to define themselves together.

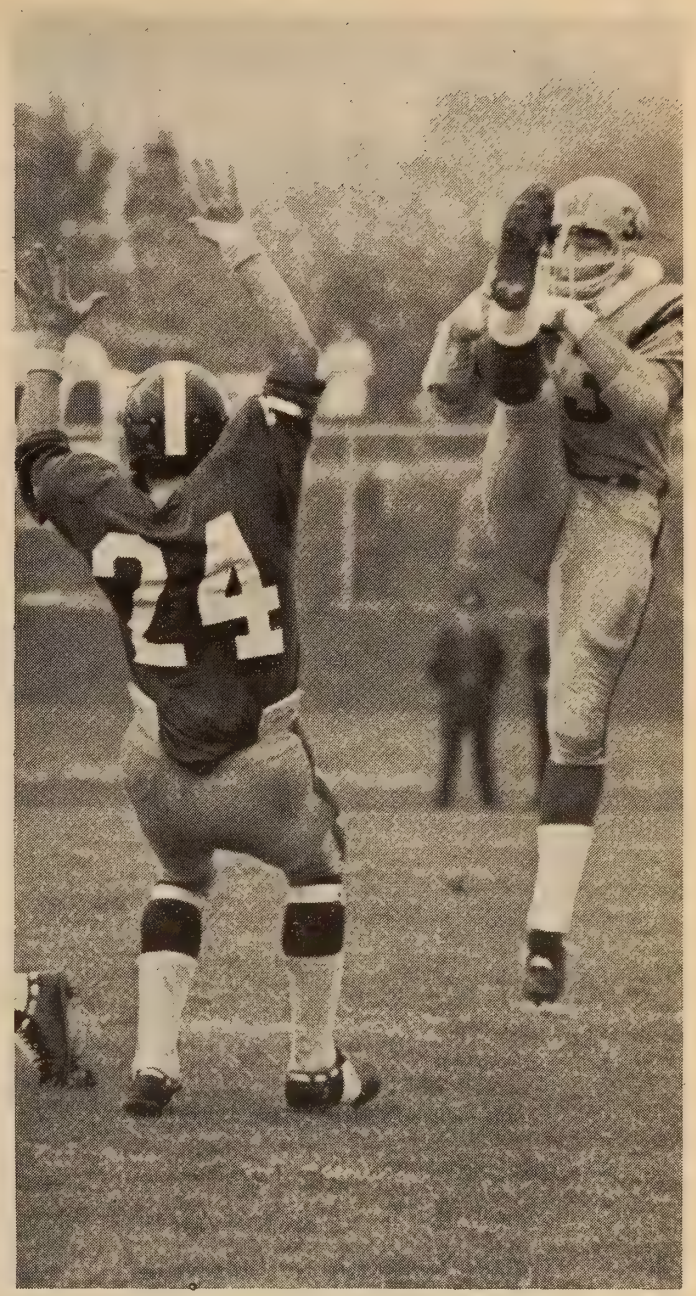
Soccer Gaels Meet GeeGees



This weekend the soccer team travels to Ottawa to take on the primitives of the league. They will win: the only question is whether they'll break into double figures or not. Our only hope for the game is that Queen's will be able to avoid further injuries at the hands of their slashing opponents. In their last meeting, Queen's lost a very valuable striker in Bruce Wormald, out for the rest of the season with a knee injury. Outside forward, Davie Robertson, sat on the side-lines for a week, also as a result of that game.

Next Wednesday, Trent plays Queen's on the West Campus at 4 p.m. Although Queen's is markedly superior in technique and teamwork, it is not beyond Trent to cause some trouble. It should be an interesting game.

Assuming victories in these two matches, Queen's will face the winners of the Ryerson-Laurentian-York-Brock division, in the first of two OUAA play-off games, a week from Saturday here at Queen's.

CANADA

OTTAWA — One year after the federal government invoked the War Measures Act to deal with the Quebec kidnapping crisis, 75 per cent of Canadians still believe it was the right thing to do, according to a CBC national poll.

Sixty seven per cent said they would approve such actions again in similar circumstances.

Among Englis-speaking Canadians, 80 per cent approved; among French-speaking, 60 per cent approved.

A gallop poll published Oct. 19, 1970 found 60 per cent of Canadians in favour of the Act, while a poll on December 12 showed the 87 per cent of Canadians favoured the Act.

OTTAWA — A lone attacker jumped on Soviet Premier Alexei Kosygin as he walked with Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau Monday between two of Parliament's buildings.

The man got both arms around the 67-year-old Premier's neck and shoulders before he was torn away and pinned, yelling, to the ground by half a dozen Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The man identified himself to reporter--spelling out his name -- as Giza Matrai, and said he was a member of the Hungarian Freedom Fighters Federation.

Mr. Kosygin was apparently unhurt. He was thrown off balance, his hair was ruffled. The coat of his suit, charcoal grey with white pin stripes, was disturbed but not torn.

MONTREAL - The anti-terrorist squad of the Montreal police yesterday confirmed the authenticity of three communiques from the Front de Liberation du Quebec. They did not elaborate.

The three communiques announce the existence of four new FLQ cells and say that two of the cells are preparing a program of "selective assassination."

All three communiques also commemorate the death of Pierre Laporte, former Quebec labor minister, found strangled last Oct. 18.

BRANTFORD - Texpack Ltd. is closing its suburban Toronto plant in Rexdale now that the three-month strike by production workers at the Brantford plant has ended.

Kenneth Dafoe, Texpack general manager, said Tuesday the company is moving its manufacturing operation back to Brantford and about 140 workers will be recalled by Nov. 1.

The company transferred about 80 per cent of its manufacturing operations from Brantford to Rexdale last month after demonstrations prevented non-union production workers from entering the strikebound plant. The company had planned to turn the Brantford building into a warehouse and operate out of the Rexdale plant.

Mr. Dafoe said 70 workers were recalled yesterday and are to report for work on the day shift today. About 40 workers will be laid off briefly next week while inventory is taken.

Eighty-four per cent of the striking workers, mostly women, voted Monday night in favor of accepting terms of a tentative agreement and to return to work.

WINNIPEG - Canada's debt-ridden postal service will either begin showing a profit in about nine years or Canadians will find themselves paying 26 cents to mail a letter, a postal official predicted here yesterday.

But which one of the predictions comes true, said the official, will entirely depend on whether the public effectively uses the Post Office's new coding system when addressing mail.

The forecase was made at a news conference here Tuesday afternoon by J. G. Fultz, federal director of postal services, and E. B. Osler, Liberal MP for Winnipeg South Centre.

The press conference was called to announce that the new postal code system will be inaugurated in Manitoba on Oct. 25 - the first to receive it on a province-wide scale.

OTTAWA - The Conservative Party is making dramatic gains in national popularity and has closed to within six points of the ruling Liberal government, according to the latest Gallup Poll.

In a survey at the beginning of the month, the Conservatives jumped to 32 per cent, up nine points from the last poll taken in August - while the Liberals and the New Democratic Party both dropped off.

Asked who they would vote for if an election was held now, 38 per cent of those polled said they would vote Liberal, 32 per cent, Conservative, and 23 per cent opted for the NDP.

The new figures showed the Liberal government down four per cent from August, its greatest dip in popularity since Prime Minister Trudeau swept to power in June 1968.

NEWFOUNDLAND - Newfoundland Premier Joseph Smallwood's Liberals and the Progressive Conservatives led by Frank Moores officially squared away for the Oct. 28 Newfoundland election as a record 108 candidates were nominated Monday. Each party field a full slate of 42 candidates by the time nominations closed at 2 p.m.

The New Democratic Party, which has never elected a member in Newfoundland, had 17 in the running while three independent Liberals and one independent.

Mr. Smallwood's Liberals won 39 of the 42 seats in the last election five years ago but defections, a by-election, retirement and death cut Government strength to 25 at dissolution, when there were seven Conservatives, two independent Liberals, one independent and seven vacancies.

"WE WON . . . ??"

BOSTON-UNITED STATES - Secretary of the Interior Rogers C. B. Morton said at a press conference here Monday that he will make a decision by mid-December whether or not to issue a permit for construction of the much-debated Alaskan oil pipeline.

He declined to say whether or not he favored the pipeline but said that "there is a need for oil" and that some system will be devised for bringing oil from the new fields in Arctic Alaska to southern ports for shipment.

U.S.A — riot-equipped police sealed off downtown Pittsburgh Sunday night after tens of thousands of surging, shouting personns mounted a wild celebration in honor of the Pirates' world Series victory in Baltimore. Officers said one person was shoot and several others injurrd in a rock and bottle-throwing melee.

IRELAND — More British troops arrived in Northern Ireland Monday, part of 1,850 extra men ordered by Prime Minister Edward Heath to help stamp out terrorism in Ulster.

The vanguard of additional troops – raising the British contingent in Ulster to more than 14,000 men – arrived as the outlawed Irish Republican Army stepped up its campaign of terror.

The weekend of riots, bombings and shootings was the worst in the past two years of bloodshed.

On Saturday and Sunday snipers killed three soldiers and wounded three policemen, bringing the death toll to 126 since the sectarian violence erupted in 1969. Two other policemen were killed Friday.

THE WORLD

WASHINGTON — United States Treasury Secretary John Connally said Sunday U.S. trading partners are being crybabies over the administration's 10 per cent surcharge on imports to help curb inflation.

"They cry about it and weep about it but the truth of the matter is it doesn't have much impact," he said.

"Because we're the largest and we're the strongest, we're the whipping boy."

Connally, interviewed on ABC's Issues and Answers, said the U.S. gets blamed whenever other nations have domestic problems. He added that when the U.S. had what he called a recession of monumental proportions in 1969, "We did not blame France or Canada or Germany or Japan."

WASHINGTON — Predicting the death of the world's oceans early in the next century, Jacques-Yves Cousteau called Monday for major nations to give 1 per cent of their combined military budgets for basic marine research.

Mr. Cousteau, at 61, the world's foremost underwater explorer, said the destruction of the oceans from pollution and other causes is already 20 to 30 per cent total.

PAROLE

CAMBODIA - Prime Minister Lon Nol declared a state of emergency Wednesday and appointed a new government to rule by "ordinance" rather than by constitutional law. He said he no longer will "play the game of democracy and freedom" since it stands in the way of victory.

The prime minister, in a nation-wide broadcast following protests against Saturday's suspension of the national assembly, appealed for unity but coupled it with a veiled threat.

"Recently, certain groups have launched acts aimed at creating confusion," Lon Nol said. "There is a fifth column at work."

He said: "Should we vainly play the game of democracy and freedom which will lead us to complete defeat or should we curtail anarchic freedom in order to achieve victory? The government has made its decision. We have selected the way that will bring us to victory."

He announced that from now on the government will rule by "ordinance" by its own laws and not by the constitution.

Queen's gives Tories victory in Kingston

The four polls on campus made the difference in Kingston and the Islands riding in Thursday's provincial election, giving Progressive Conservative candidate Syl Apps, Jr., a victory over Liberal Dr. John Hazlett.

Apps won the riding with a narrow margin of 192 votes; it was not clear Sunday whether or not there would be a recount, which could change the result.

But in the Sydenham 6 polls, held in Leonard, Morris, Victoria and Ban Righ Halls, Apps had a plurality of 257 votes.

Hazlett, who is a professor of surgery at Queen's, thus won the rest of the riding.

Hazlett also had a majority in the polling districts immediately around the campus but outside residence -- Syndenham Ward and the southern part of Ontario Ward.

In the polls on campus, Apps had 567 votes. Hazlett had 310 and the New Democratic candidate, Mrs. Mary Lloyd-Jones, had 135.

Turnout at Queen's was higher than elsehwere in the riding; 74 per cent of eligible voters on campus cast ballots, compared with 68 per cent overall.

Turnout was as follows: Morris, McNeill and Brockington, 289 out of 366; Leonard and Donald Gordon, 188 out of 236; Victoria, 314 out of 391; Ban Righ, Adelaide and Chown, 221 out of 286.

The contest between Apps and Hazlett was close from the time vote-counting started Thursday night, and the lead changed hands several times before settling with Apps.

Apps visited the Progressive Conservative student headquarters in Morris Hall late Thursday evening to see the people who put him into office. "You kids did it for me and I am internally indebted to you," he told the students there.

Hazlett's campaign manager, Kingston lawyer Michael Carty, said Friday the Liberals might ask for a recount. There had been some "very distressing things" happen, Carty said.

He mentioned the Ban Righ Hall poll, from which results were unexpectedly late arriving at the returning office Thursday night. Ban Righ was the last poll in the riding to be counted. Apps won there, 122 votes to 67.

Results in Kingston and the Islands riding:
Apps, 12, 296.
Hazlett, 12,104
Lloyd-James, 3,575.

At Morris Hall:
Apps, 151
Hazlett, 92.
Lloyd-Jones, 46.

At Leonard Hall:
Apps, 102
Hazlett, 59
Lloyd-Jones, 27.

At Victoria Hall:
Apps, 192
Hazlett, 92
Lloyd-Jones, 30.

At Ban Righ Hall:
Apps, 122
Hazlett, 67
Lloyd-Jones, 32

In Sydenham Ward and southern Ontario Ward:
Apps, 1333
Hazlett, 1427
Lloyd-Jones, 622.

Several other university ridings tended to go Progressive Conservative as well.

Winners at the University of Toronto were PC Allan Grossman in St. Andrew - St. Patrick and PC Allan Lawrence in St. George riding.

At the University of Western Ontario, it was PC Gordon Walker in London North riding and PC John White, the minister of university affairs, in London South.

Preliminary results gave the Conservatives a majority in the new legislature, with 78 seats. The Liberals had 20 seats and the NDP 19.

Recounts were expected in four ridings: Nipissing, Dovercourt (in Toronto), Ottawa Centre, and Scarborough West.

TICKETS

The Golden Gaels play a home game this Saturday, but Queen's students do not get free admission.

The game is an Ontario Universities Athletic Association semi-final against the University of Western Ontario Mustangs. Since it is not a regular season game, not administered by the athletics office here, the league charges admission and students must pay.

Student tickets cost $1.50 and are available at the arena ticket office from 11 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. every day this week. They may also be purchased at the stadium ticket office on Saturday.

The game begins at one p.m. There will be a parade from Victoria Hall.

Enrollment rises again

There are more than nine thousand students at Queen's this year.

Intramural enrollment was 9040 on October 10, according to preliminary figures from the registrar's office.

Of these, 8835 were full-time students and the rest special or part-time.

The October 10 figures are only approximate, especially in the school of graduate studies. Official figures are issued in mid-December.

Enrollment figures were as follows:

	Full-time	Part-time
Commerce	538	4
Arts and science	3864	172
Phys ed	226	2
Premedicine	48

Coed Residence vote delayed

The referendum on integrated residences which was scheduled for Thursday has been postponed until next week so the Women's Residence Council and the Inter-Residence Council can agree on the details of the proposal, coed residence committee chairman Doug Romans told the Journal Sunday.

The WRC approved the committee's basic proposal last week: that Victoria Hall be a coed residence next year and that Gordon-Brockington Houses be women's residences.

But when the Inter-Residence Council met Wednesday night it was suggested that that proposal might be too extensive. A proposed alternative would be to make Gordon-Brockington coed and turn Chown Hall into a men's residence, thus keeping the number of men and women in residence the same overall. This would mean about 170 men and 170 women in coed residence, rather than 390 of each, as with the Victoria-Gordon-Brockington plan.

The coed residence committee, which represents IRC and WRC, is collecting information this week on the size of coed residence projects at other universities. A special joint meeting of IRC and WRC executives Friday night will examine that information and try to settle on a plan both can endorse, which will then be put to referendum.

Meanwhile, a general meeting of residence students will be held tonight (at 7:00 p.m. in Leonard cafeteria) to talk about integrated residence proposals.

Coed residence also was a major topic of discussion at the women's residence general meeting held Wednesday evening in Victoria Hall. WRC president Cindy Davidson told that meeting it was important for residents to vote when the referendum is held, and also to go to tonights meeting and hear about the proposals.

In addition, Miss Davidson explained the relationships between residence government and the women who live in residence. She introduced the newly-elected block chairmen for the WRC: Deb McKay and Susan Bullock for Victoria Hall ABC wings; Kitty Noble and Dorothy Lloyd for Victoria D and E; Sheila Gilmour for Chown Hall; and Debbie Bramm for Adelaide and Ban Righ Halls.

One of the vice-chairman, Miss Lloyd, said coed residence and open hours was a major concern of the newly-elected representatives. She also said she wants to see more residence activities this year.

At Wednesday's meeting, Miss Davidson mentioned some of the activities already planned, including a Christmas bazaar and a "poor man's formal" in February. The success of these ventures depends on the participation and cooperation of residence women, whoever, Miss Davidson said.

Coed washrooms open

It isn't coed residence that has them talking at Carleton. It's coed washrooms.

Two of the ten washrooms in Carleton University's new centre (on its Rideau River campus in southern Ottawa) are now "unisex".

Rick Kyler, student vice-president at Carleton, said the unisex washrooms were set up while part of the building was being used as a youth hostel this summer. "I thought it was ridiculous that young men and women could sleep together but couldn't wash up together," Kyler said.

He said most students were indifferent to the idea. "This is in part the idea behind the experiment -- to lift people out of their apathy and get them reacting to their social environment."

He said male students would welcome the opportunity of using women's washrooms if only they knew more about them. Women's washrooms are more comfortable than men's, Kyler stated.

More of the building's ten washrooms may be liberated during the coming year, Kyler said.

"Suzie-Q Week is a male chauvinist institution!" AMS vice-president Victor Bradley told The Journal in an exclusive interview on Sunday.

Actually, he didn't. He was asked whether The Journal could quote him as saying that, and he mumbled, "Okay."

Bradley had just been informed Suzie-Q Week starts eight days from today, with a stag dance in Grant Hall.

Other events are planned for Thursday and Friday, and there is a semi-formal, "Gaslight 1890", in Grant and Kingston Halls on Saturday evening, November 6.

Suzie-Q publicity chairman Debbie Ostler pointed out that Suzie-Q Week is time when women do the asking and women pay for the dates. It is intended not as a time for man-chasing but as a week for making friends with the opposite sex, Miss Ostler said.

She looked eager when she said it.

Miss Ostler added that Suzie-Q is not precisely a women's lib event, even though it gives women a taste of men's social position, and vice versa.

At press time, no one had asked Bradley out for Suzie-Q.

ASUS orientation policy remains hazy

by Chris Redmond

Arts and science student leaders spent four hours Thursday night arguing about orientation, and settled none of the major questions.

Most matters were referred to the 1971 orientation committee, which is to be chosen this week, for specific recommendations to be made.

The executive of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society was considering two largely conflicting reports: one from the 1971 orientation committee and the other from the orientation evaluation committee.

Nancy Hoey

Besides pages of detailed recommendations on how orientation events should be run, the two reports took stands on hazing in artsci orientation.

The evaluation committee was in favour of an increase in hazing; the 1971 orientation committee was against it.

But much of the meeting was spent in procedural argument and consideration of the details involved in a $14,000 orientation week. From time to time argument was interrupted and tension broken when Nancy Hoey, ASUS vice-president, turned on her transistor radio to hear the latest results in the provincial election.

Debate began with the report of the orientation evaluation committee, presented by the committee's co-chairman, third-year geography student Brian Cromie. Besides possible improvements in course counselling and sectioning, the committee suggested that Sunday evening of orientation next year include a mass rally of the freshman class.

This was opposed by the 1971 committee, headed by Kathy McSweeney of Arts 73, who pointed out that a rally was used on Sunday of orientation 1970 and that it was a disaster. Events on the first day of orientation should be personal and low-key, she said.

Eventually the question of Sunday night events was referred to the 1972 committee to decide.

That committee is to be chosen Thursday night by the ASUS executive (plus Miss McSweeney, representing this year's orientation committee, and the presidents of nursing science and rehab therapy, Jo Forbell and Donna Tuck).

The six executive members present (there will be nine when divisional councillors are elected tomorrow) grew increasingly frustrated with administrative details. Presiding officer Paul Kennedy (the AMS speaker, borrowed for the occasion) became tangled in procedure. And the thirty non-executive members present obviously chiefly wanted to talk about hazing.

After coffee break which was mostly a lobbying period, discussion on initiation was opened. First-year student Kathy Turner spoke first, summarizing the arguments in favour of an increase in hazing.

Miss Turner said more hazing would produce an identity and spirit in artsci students. "We envied the engineers" who had a more stringent hazing programme, she said. And, she pointed out, hazing gives a gael (orientation leader) more authority, which is useful in the early and confused days of orientation.

Two members of the 1971 orientation committee disagreed with her at once. Some freshmen do not want to be hazed at all, orientation's cultural chairman, Ted Cape, pointed out.

Academics comes first, Miss McSweeney pointed out. She said the type of hazing used by commerce and engineering, where first-year programmes were relatively inflexible, is not suited to arts and science.

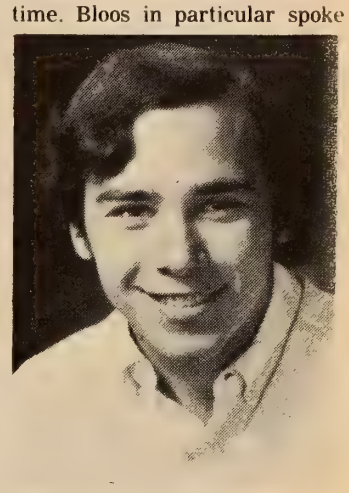
ASUS president Marvin R. Bloos spoke at length against hazing. "Sheep and cows have group spirit, too," Bloos said, and there is more to real Queen's spirit than drinks and yells.

Response to hazing is a mob reaction, Bloos said, a desperate need to identify with something. "Engineers have obvious social hangups," he said to some laughter. And, he said, arts and science students lead the campus.

Queen's spirit does not have to develop under social pressure, said second-year English student Sue Dowler. It does not appear only at football games, she added, but is shown in the number of students who take part in student government, share in club work, join committees and are involved in other activities and are involved in other activities.

Arts 73 president Derek Maclean echoed Miss Dowler saying that spirit amounts to making a contribution to Queen's. "Milk it for all it's worth, and then put something back in."

Faculty spirit can be dangerous, Maclean said. "Engineers are not necessarily plumbers, and commerce does not have to be gross.



"The day we deny that an artsman, an engineer and a medsman can do an oil thigh together, that day we deny Queen's!"

After more discussion about the pros and cons of initiation it was agreed that a meeting like the ASUS executive would never reach a consensus. The executive voted to refer hazing to the new orientation committee, which was to read the minutes of Thursday's meeting as an aid to deciding on its policy.

There was a lengthy discussion, as well, of the decision-making power in orientation, especially the relative powers of the executive and the orientation committee.

Bloos recalled last spring's controversy during which the 1971 orientation committee threatened to resign if the executive overruled them and forbade a Saturday night dance at the end of orientation week. The executive backed down on the dance issue, but such confrontation is a bad precedent, Bloos said.

Possible structures to arbitrate disagreements between the two bodies were discussed for some time. Bloos in particular spoke for the executive's right to overrule the committee members of the 1971 committee spoke for its independence.

Finally two of the committee members informational chairman Duncan Bull and academics chairman Peter Wells, conceded that the executive had the final say, but only at the risk of losing a committee which would resign if it could not accept the executive's policy.

ASUS asked its constitutional review committee to consider the structure and status of the orientation committee when it makes other constitutional amendments this year.

A humane approach to prisoners

This article is the last in a series of three dealing with the prison system in Canada. Here the writer, Ken Johnston, discusses ways in which the penal system is being made more humane and effective and he suggests a novel approach to the whole correctional system. Originally this story appeared in the Montreal Star and is an abrieviated version of his last six articles.

Increasingly, correctional experts, even those involved in penal institutions, are recognizing that if a man has failed in society, the remedy is not to he found in a walled institution where he is submerged in a subculture bitterly hostile to the society to which he must return at the conclusion of his sentence.

The test of a man's ability to live in a society must finally be made in the community, and not in an institutionalized world where he wakes, moves, eats, works, studies and finally sleeps on command.

The community contact is vital to the inmate if there is to be any hope of his successful rehabilitation in society. This contact is made and developed in two ways; through the work of release programs of the institution, and through direct community involvement with the inmates in the institution and as they prepare to rejoin the outside world.

The work release program is still in an experimental stage in Canada and is not widely practiced in the penitentiaries. It means that the inmate enters the regular community during those hours of the day which require his attendance at high school, trade training school,university or even regular employment, returning to the institution to sleep at night and staying there on weekends.

Inmates who are not candidates for parole and who have no regular employment awaiting them on release, the least hopeful prospects for rehabilitation in the institution, are being sent to the prerelease centers approximately three months before their discharge. There they live much as they would in a private boarding house, except that they are expected to keep regular hours and they work with their counsellors who help them find regular employment and readjust to the community.

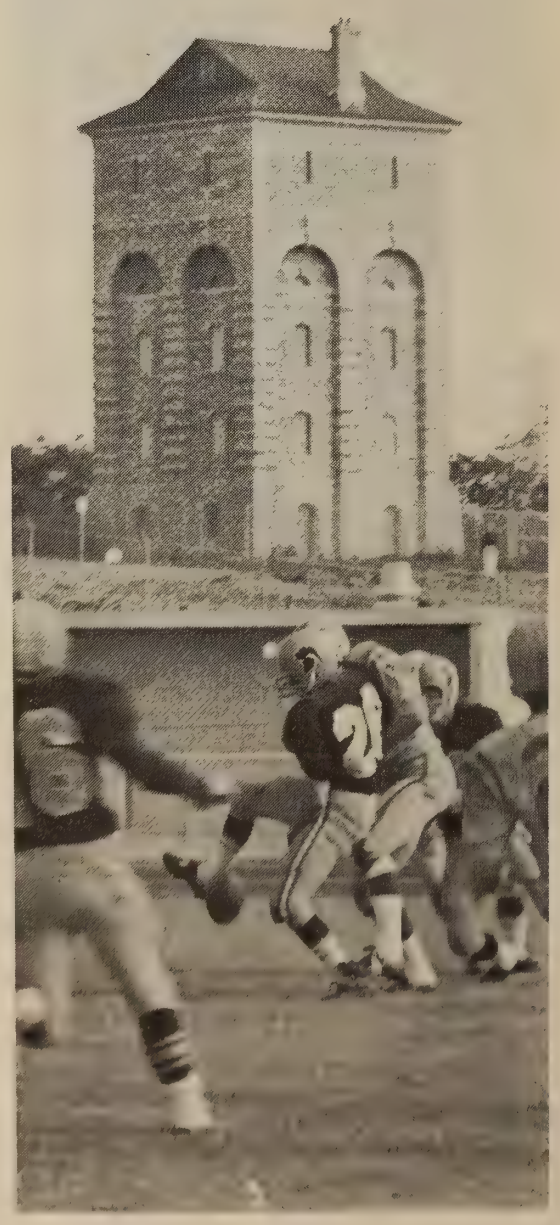
While the centers have not yet been going long enough to draw any valid estimates on their success, St. Hubert, the first to open, in Montreal, in the three years of its operation has an amazingly low recidivism rate of only five per cent.

The role of the voluntary agency as the organized expression of community involvement with the inmate is becoming increasingly important. I t enjoys a long and honorable history of fighting for prison reform. Voluntary agencies have developed in all provinces and have assumed many new functions. Today twenty-three voluntary agencies offer correctional services as their primary function, excluding those offering only hostile facilities.

In addition to those agencies which have correctional services as their primary function, many others serve offenders as part of their welfare work. In 1969, fifty-three voluntary agencies received grants from the Canadian government to assist in parole and after-care.

Today, these voluntary agencies fulfil a variety of functions, which can broadly be grouped under four headings; public education, citizen involvment, social action, and direct service.

Spearheading an "enlightened" Canadian public opinion, the voluntary agencies have a greater responsibility now than ever before to extend the horizons of Canadian penology We've come a long way, but we still have a long way to go.



Probation and parole have proved far more effective than prison sentences in returning offenders to a normal life.

Probation is defined in the Oiumet Report as "a disposition of the court whereby an offender is released to the community on a tentative basis, subject to specified conditions, under the supervision of a probation officer and liable to recall by the court for alternative disposition if he does not abide by the conditions of his probation."

Probation, therefore, rests upon the decision of the judge who must decide whether probation or a prison term is more likely to return a convicted man to society as a useful person. One measure of success is completion of the probation period by the probationer without a breach sufficiently serious to induce the courts to terminate probation and impose a sentence.

Indictative of the progress is that in 1966 Alberta reported 89per centof adult probationers completed their probation period successfully, Manitoba and Ontario 85 per cent successful.

In 1969, with more than 14,000 people involved, the total cost of the adult probation service came to $4,000,0000. Imprisonment for a year would have cost the public $98,000,000.Obviously, savings to the taxpayer cannot be the sole criterion for the success of a correctional measure. But when it is coupled with the principle that the most effective means of achieving rehabilitation lies in the community, the two facts offer a powerful argument for extending the device.

Parole tackles the alternative of prison from the opposite end. Again it is oriented towards the community. Parole has been defined as a procedure whereby an inmate may be released before his sentence expires. He serves the balance of his sentence in society under supervision and subject to return to prison if he fails to comply with the conditions governing his release.

Parole is not a device to alter the sentence of an offender. Its function is to determine the portion of the sentence to be spent in the community and the kind of control of supervision which will be needed. Parole is devised as a logical step in the total correctional process. It has long been recognized by correctional experts the period immediately following release is a time of great stress for the offender, particularly those who have served long terms.

A five-year survey of paroles showed 55 per cent stayed out of trouble whereas the success rate of those released upon expiry of sentence was only 35 per cent.

It is clear probation and parole are encouraging developments in the correctional process which offer substantially moreprospects for success in rehabilitation of offenders than do prisons and penitentiaries.

The correctional system in Canada is going through a painful period of transition. Behind bars it is marked by riots, escapes, and suicides. On the outside it is marked by serious public debate, soul searching by penitentiary staff and it is accompanied by an awakened public interest.

This period of transition was signalized by the publication of the Ouimet Report in 1969. It inaugurated a new wave of reforms, carrying the original reform movement which had begun in the late 1950's to new levels that would put Canadian correctional practices on a par with the world's best.

The first wave of reform was marked by the building of a whole new series of medium and minimum security institutions. They were built across the country to effect a division of inmates, based on susceptability to reform, from the case-hardened professional criminals with long prison records.

Even as these new buildings were going up, their function and need was called into question. The idea of building medium security institutions far from the resources of the urban community to which the inmates were presumably oriented, seemed like a piece of political sculduggery which violated the most elementary principles of modern corrections.

While modern penology calls for a closer relationship within the institution between the inmate and the correctional officer, Millhaven and Archambault maximum security institutions emphasized the separation of inmate and correctional officer and the remoteness of the relationship.

Security came ahead of sound correctional practices. The opening of the new Millhave Institution was marked by an insurrection at the old Kingston Penitentiary as the prospective inmates seemed to show they shared the misgivens of correctional experts concerning the new penitentiary. There is a growing belief among correctional workers that the penitentiary is a nineteenth century institution which should be relegated to that period; that the penitentiary is one of the most formidable barriers to effective progress in inmate rehabilitation.

Mervyn Davis of Vancouver, executive director of the John Howard Society of British Columbia, said:

"To build new correctional facilities to rehabilitate offenders when we all know that rehabilitation is not achievable in correctional institutions may not be categorized as legal fraud, but it is moral fraud."

George C. Allison, president of the Montreal association for the Comprehension and Reorientation of Ex-convicts Inc., stated:

"My experience with prisons has led me to the conclusion that those wardens and officials whom I have met are so vitally concerned with security that they use it as a level to negate any new, fresh thinking that may bring about radical changes in our prison system."

It was a paper by Rene Bertrand of the community planning council of Winnipeg which came up with a fresh approach to the problem. He proposed that an appointed review board should take over the function of sentencing once a judge had determined the guilt of the accused. The board would have the authority to place the offender on probation in any one of four units.

First of these would be a community access center, geared to the individual needs of an offender who appeared to need some temporary control and help in order to function "responsibly". Employment assistance, work and school release programs would operate out of this center, and would keep the man within society for occupational and educational purposes.

The second level would be a community orientation center, designed for the individual who needed somewhat more control and treatment.

The fourth level would be similar in structure to our modern penitentiaries but on a much smaller scale since it would be designed for people unable to function within society, who have given up trying or who represent a physical threat to the community. The program here would be geared heavily towards treatment and opportunities would be available for moving foward to level three and so on if the individual showed ability and willingness to change.

Viewed against existing methods of handling offenders in institutions, the proposal shines with good sense.

Save some money - maybe

Dear Editors:

I am addressing this letter to all graduating students in the hope of saving them some money. Every year at this time students go through the ritual of having graduation pictures taken as copies are in demand for parents, other relatives, girlfriends etc. All Tricolor portraits must be taken by Wallace R. Berry for a sitting cost of $10 for colour or $7.50 for black and white. For this you get seven or so proofs of which you choose one whose negative is retouched and from which you get one 2" by 5" print and a copy sent to the Tricolor. Up to this point I have no complaint.

However, the negative remains Berry's property and for additional copies you are charged what I consider rip-off prices. In the case of an 8" by 10" colour enlargement the price is $18 for the first print and $12 for each additional. The corresponding prices in another quality studio in Kingston are $12 and $9 for the same service.

I would like to suggest a way of avoiding these outrageous prices. Take your 3" and 5" final copy to an out-of-town photographer, back home for instance. (Due to copyright problems, Kingston photographers will not touch Berry's portraits.) Tell them this is your only copy and you would like a 4" by 5" colour negative made of the print. This will cost you $10 and from this you can get all the copies you want for $3.50 for an 8" by 10" colour print at a drugstor or $4-$5 at a quality photographer. Prices would be correspondingly lower for black and white. With a little thought you could avoid being soaked year after year by the sort of thing that makes graduation as commercial a farce as Christmas.

(Editors note: The editorial staff of Tricolor was asked to read this letter, and offered the following comment. "One does not have to pay for a sitting at Mr. Berry's studio in order to get his picture in Tricolor. He can have his graduate photo (one pose) taken at no cost by Berry and submitted to Tricolor. This is mentioned in all the information sent out about grad photos. Also, Mr. Hartling is free to choose his own graduate portrait photographer. As for getting photos copied, they are copyright anywhere; the person who gets them copied is engaging in his own rip-off, and anyway the quality will not be as high. One final note: every photographer keeps his own negatives.")

Criticism of candle lighting blasted

Dear Editors:

Re Candle lighting and in reply to the letter in last Thursday's Journal.

As a first year female student I too attended the candle lighting ceremony of Monday evening. My friends, (some of them second year students who had missed candle lighting last year and wanted to take part) and I all found candle lighting an enjoyable and memorable experience.

It is unfortunate that, because of the large number of freshettes who voluntarily turned out for candle lighting, some waiting in line was inevitable. I would like to know if "first year woman" has ever tried to organize six hundred people in such a fashion as to efficiently distribute gowns, etc. in a minimum of time. It seemed to me that, considering the numbers involved, the second year students coped very well.

I also think that "first year woman" must be very sensitive (or insecure about her adult status?) if being called a kid bothers her so much. It's much easier to say "kids" than "First year women" when you're trying to communicate ideas quickly. In my opinion, the second year "kids" should be commended for giving voluntarily of their time to help in this ceremony and also thanked for the fine job they did.

And concerning the husband, lover children aspect, as Miss Davidson suggested, a single tricolour ribbon could keep the Queen's tradition without the marriage implications.

However, I feel that the ribbons are fun, not to be taken seriously and are only an incidental part of the ceremony. Perhaps "First year woman" missed the point. Candle lighting is not intended as a seminar - aren't 600 people a few too many for a meaningful discussion? - but as a ceremony in which first year women are formally welcomed to Queen's. I like feeling welcome.

Finally, I am sure no one forced "first year woman" to attend candle lighting. I'm sure no one forces her to go to parties, I'm sure no one forces her to listen to boors - if she isn't interested, she can walk away. I'm sure no one is trying to ram Queen's down her throat. People who have no desire to be part of the university - other than academically - can shut themselves up in their rooms. I'm sure no one would miss them.

Dear Sir,

In last Thursday's Feedback a first year girl was complaining that the Candle lighting service seemed, to her, inane and boring. This prompted us to write a letter of reply to her.

First of all, attendence at the Candle lighting service was completely voluntary. The girl in question could not have been pressured into going to something she didn't want to. What's more her ideas about the service, we believe, don't reflect those of the majority. She also stated that she could feel little loyalty for Queen's which is unfortunate since Queen's, in the past, has always been noted for its fine college spirit and tradition. Incidentally, the "Oil Thigh", the true embodiment of Queen's spirit, goes back as far as 1897.

However, in the past few years this spirit has been eroded away by several things, not least of which has been the phasing out of Artsci hazing in frosh week.

More than once we have stood up at the football games to lead a cheer, just to receive the stony stares of aloof and apathetic individuals who believe school spirit is a symptom of insanity.

In conclusion, we would like to state that school spirit is not something you exhibit because you are forced to or for the sake of tradition but because you have a genuine pride in your school, whichever it may be, but it seems to us that certain individuals on this campus consider themselves too sophisticated for the "rah-rah" Queen's spirit.

(Ed. Note: To have grasped the details of the ceremony and the feeling of the majority there so well, were you guys there - in drag, perhaps? Also, if an important purpose of the ceremony was to encourage school spirit, why is there then no comparable ceremony for first year men?)

A warning

Dear Editors:

We'd like you to relay deese comments along to de AMS and de Department of Physical Plant: Your eradication of our "art-works" on de football field early Saturday mornin was not appresiated. De Boys were only showing dere sense of school spirit by writing "F.O.T.O." across mid-field. Next time de message will be more "permanent"! Beware Halloweeen - AMS!

B, S & T leave "bitter taste"

Dear Editors:

Blood, Sweat and Tears "ability to pull themselves out of trouble" may be "superlative" but I for one, do not feel they "deserve a lot of credit." It is very generous of Chris Clark to judge that an average of one good performance out of two is commendable, but seeing as 50 per cent of us hit the failure, his generosity does not sweeten the "bitter taste" in my mouth.

It seems that the policy of B, S & T is to gamble. Only they did not go down. They went way up to the tune of $9000 (allowing for $2,000 for Don McLean, who at least performs. He may have had poor dialogues between numbers, but at least he did not abandon us to chug beers or to make private jokes with the boys.)

There is no doubt that B, S & T have talent. However, technical talent is only one half the requirement of a performer. Good performers (which B, S & T must be purported to be if they can demand $18,000 for just over three hours work; must touch their audience, work with its moods, and seduce it with their music. Not only did B, S & T not get it together technically in the first show, they did not give a damn for the audience.

As a student on a tight budget, I could only afford one ticket. I did not have the thrilling opportunity Chris Clark did to give B, S & T a second chance. In the event that I have the lucky chance to purchase a ticket to see them again, I will not gamble - not even for my paltry stakes - that the one show that gets it together is the one I pay for.

Syl, the pro, dumped the rookies

Dear Editors:

A sigh of relief was breathed across the city last Thursday as once again the local arena was the scene of yet another great save by our own home-town boy, right-wing defenceman Syl Apps, who fended off repeated two-on-one rushes by the left and right forwards of the opposition, while skating and stick-handling his way to victory and the cheers of all true Queensmen. Yet another testimonial to the fact that brute force and ignorance will vanquish all opposition when that opposition is encumbered with mere competence and literacy.

There were many vindictive smears and cross-checks made during the game, but the referee proved his worth throughout. Completely untrue were charges that Smiling Syl was handing out rubber-knobbed miniature hockey sticks in Ban Righ. (The girls didn't really need them, anyway. They had just come, with candles in hand, and flushed looks of inspiration on their faces from the Levana ceremony.) Syl, however, did make one appeal to the heart of Queen's with the establishment of that oasis in the desert of Kingston night-life, the Tory Tavern. Unfortunately, he had to compete with probably the best function to be held on campus this year -- the fun-loving Speakeasy, where the campus pigs were finally put in their place. As a result our man on the white horse could address his spiritedly rustic and witty remarks only to those faggots lacking the guts to engage in the bottle-stiletto duels down below. Unfortunate indeed, for these bohunks would have provided the very rhubarb environment in which our man would have felt most welcome. Nevertheless, the establishment of yet another night-spot in the already dynamic second-floor complex clearly established the Student Union as the entertainment capital of Frontenac County.

Despite rabble-rousing grunts from the pinkos and dissidents on campus, Queen's stood by its long heritage and did not allow its endorsement to be swayed by such minor considerations as ability, intelligence, literacy or judgment. This was well shown when in the wee hours of the election night Ban Righ came through with the final deciding votes for old Syl. From his endearingly homey comments given on the radio at that time we could all tell that Syl appreciated this heart-felt response even more than he would have First Prize at the Gananoque Fall Fair.

In the face of resounding defeat at the stick of this skilful administrator, visionary reformer, statesman and true man of the Kingston people the vanquished may justifiably feel bitter, but in solace may we offer this advice (delivered in the familiar monotone of a well-known philosopher): "If you can't play a sport be one"

"Candle-lighting is a passing on of tradition from one group of Queen's women to the next."

More Witch burning

To First Year Woman:

Someone once told me "one picture is worth a thousand words." Perhaps next time if you send a photo of yourself tongue out or teeth bared it may be slightly more mature than your words.

Dear woman, I suggest you take a look at yourself. To dissent is one thing, but to express an objection in the childish (I hope not paranoic) way you have suggests a need for a bit of personal introspection.

You are "tired of being initiated as a Queen's this and a Queen's that." Why didn't you go to Toronto? The candle lighting ceremony is not obligatory. Have you ever tried to "get into something" with five hundred people? Sometimes a quiet shared moment, whether or not it is tied up with symbols and tradition, is an expressive way of communication. I contend that there are hundreds of first, second, third, . . . etc. year students who are lonely and need and want such bonds, however trivial you may think they are. You resent authority - to your eyes it takes the form of patronization. Have you ever tried to successfully organize five hundred people? If you wish higher respect for your intelligence from others, then why don't you have a little sensibility for them? If the tradition is outmoded - be constructive and organize a group to find out how students really do feel.

In closing, it doesn't matter whether I'm in first or fourth year, I'm talking to you as another person. Maybe the boor at that party was bored with you, too.

Theatre five back again, again

Dear Editors:

It is amazing to me that Miss Hodgson (Journal October 8 "All Over") whose wide knowledge of theatre has led to her outcry against "small-town amateurs" does not realize that the function of the Business Manager of a company is to inform the public of its programme, not to act as critic. Public Notice; I am Business Manager of Theatre Five not resident Journal critic.

If in my press release to the Journal I sounded somewhat complacent it is because I agree with Miss Hodgson that "we are capable of supporting a well organized expanding theatre-group" and it is precisely because I feel that such potential exists in the multi-layered and interesting group of people that now contribute to Theatre Five that I speak with some optimism about its worth. (Is there perhaps some basic misunderstanding about the interpretation about that little word "we"? To which we does she refer?)

I might note here that in agreement with her desires for a diversified playbill we are in fact doing "modern" (PINTER), "period" (WILDE), "experimental" (STOPPARD) this year, not to mention "safe but sound" (COWARD), "poetic (WILLIAMS) and "original" ANTHOLOGY FROM THE WORKS OF KINGSTON WRITERS). Not bad for one year! We look forward to an interesting and stimulating season, with or (alas) without Miss Hodgson's blessing.

the Dormouse

by Alan Broadbent

The past week has been one of confusion, mainly wrought by the media. In fact, media, and the information it represented, really ganged up on me, reducing me to the state of an imploded ping-pong ball.

The representations of the now-concluded provincial election campaign kicked it all off. Perhaps the Conservative Party was the most pernicious offender. They spent great effort and money in extolling the virtues of "Bill" Davis, who in former times was known to us all as William, the kindly education minister.

Well, the media carried all these stories of "Bill" Davis, and what he had done in the past few months, and what a typical Ontarion he is, and how informal he is. I mean, the guy just isn't arrogant, not like Trudeau is arrogant; "Bill" Davis is just a regular guy who is doing things for us folks.

This seemed to be pretty nifty, and "Bill" Davis seemed like the kind of guy who you should vote for, but then there was always this rider on the message about voting for Apps.

I found it very confusing: if "Bill" Davis is so great, a regular Ontarion and all, why the hell would I vote for Apps? Apps is just not a regular Ontarion. After all, how many Ontarions have ever been captain of the Toronto Maple Leafs. Not many. No, I wanted to vote for this "Bill" Davis, who just like the rest of us had nothing particular to recommend him.

Well, this left two other choices, John Hazlett and Mary Lloyd Jones. John Hazlett was better known as "Dr. Hazlett," and he was and may still be, a Liberal.

Therein lies the confusion; what doctor can be a liberal, and what Liberal can be other than confusing?

In the case of Mrs. Jones, an N.D.P. candidate, the confusion was entirely my own. Having been an N.D.P. fan for years (we all fanned together in 1969 in British Columbia), and missing the perennial local candidacy of John Smart, and somehow recognizing the party platform as part Prairie Proven and part Liberal Chic, I found myself torn between Waffles and Wassails.

Of course, one of the greatest paradoxes of the campaign involved the issue of pollution, or environmental control, or as grass-roots "Bill" Davis put it, making Ontario a nice place to live. This was a stout part of every platform; we must stop the polluters.

Much can be said about the cultural and political pollution involved in the campaign, the piles of non-biodegradable talk that went on. However, the physical pollution was abhorrent.

Amost daily, pamphlets and flyers from all parties were delivered to my home. Most of them were so little that you couldn't even wrap the garbage in them. All of them were so vacuous that whatever garbage you could get in would certainly fall through.They all eventually ended up in the refuse sack, destined to go to some junk yard where "Bill" only knows how long they will take to disappear.

The capper was when some of "Bill's" fellows, delegated to help this Syl chap, appeared down at the market handing out plastic shopping bags advertising their man. These clean-cut young conservatives were handing out one of the worst pollutants, permanent plastic, to promote the fortunes of a man so that he could get into office to eliminate pollution. If he was sincere, maybe he shouldn't have run in the first place.

So I was left with a big decision; who to vote for. Frankly, I couldn't bring myself to vote for any of the people who were running. However, the problem was solved for me while I was watching the last game of the World Series. A men's hair grooming advertisement roused my sympathies for an illfated chap called the Wethead. "The Wethead is dead" the ad proclaimed.

Not if I could help it, I decided, for I could remember the days when the Wethead was very much alive and important. This is no way for anyone to go, I said, and anyway, maybe the Wethead is the true Ontarion. So I wisely wrote in the name of the Wethead, who as you can see did not get elected. However, I like to think that I made a small contribution to the democratic system.

Errors in evaluation guide affect about 127 course

Some of the questionnaire results which appear in the ASUS course evaluation guides for a number of courses are wrong.

Questions 15, 19, 31, and 35 are apparently wrong in about one-third of the course sections which the guide evaluated in its 14 booklets and the first year courses book. Some other questions are less seriously affected.

The error apparently comes from a mechanical fault which skipped over many of the answers marked in the 11th column of the machine-readable answer sheets. This column represents answer "A" to a number of questions on the form.

The error was discovered last week when The Journal received from classics professor Dr. Richard Bernabei copies of letters exchanged last April between him and course guide coordinator Peter Raymont. In his letters, one of them quoted a length below, Bernabei told Raymont that the preliminary printout he had seen for his courses, Classical Studies 010 (now 100) and Latin 012, did not seem to correspond to the answers he had hand-counted from the questionnaires shortly after they had been filled out by his students.

Raymont's answer to Bernabei pointed out that the answer sheets were being tabulated by machine, which "cannot and never will make mistakes". He suggested that the students whose answers were missing had not filled out the forms properly so that they could be read by an optical scanner (the machine which read the forms' data into the computer).

Bernabei replied that on his photocopies of the original forms the marks appeared to be clear and bold. He also mentioned that of all the courses he had seen evaluations for, none was entirely correct.

Raymont apparently took no action about Bernabei's complaints.

Based on examinations of the original forms and of the computer's tape memory last week, however, Bernabei was correct.

Asked last weekend about the matter, Raymont told The Journal that when he received Bernabei's letters in April he talked them over with Peter Gulutsan, then DSC chairman for classical studies. Gulutsan "wasn't very keen about" checking into the matter and making changes, Raymont said.

Raymont said he had considered the problem, but that in late April it was too late to do anything to correct the situation.

"At the time, I thought there was something screwy," he said, "but I didn't really notice very much until the books had been printed."

Commenting recently on the errors, Bernabei said, "As far as I am concerned, this is shocking. And what is more shocking is that when I made those comments, nothing was done. It can rightly be called a hoax."

He emphasized that the principle of student course evaluation did not bother him, but that "the way they went about it was doomed to disaster".

He did, however, object to anonymity in the evaluations. It is "cow... the resu... difficult... "It is ... an anon... said "... enough ... public. ... someon... stand b... name."

Berna... course ... hoped t... didn't." ... taking it ... He not...

How the errors occurred

The course guide questionnaires were received from DSC representatives and briefly hand-checked, primarily to see that the course identification numbers were filled in properly. If that field contained errors, the questionnaire could not be read and identified later in the processing. (Obvious missing numbers were put in by hand.)

The sheets were then sent to the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, in Ottawa, where two IBM document readers were used to read the forms. The results of the reading were put on magnetic tape and brought back to the Queen's computing centre for processing.

It appears that the AUCC has had considerable trouble with their machines, and had devised elaborate means of programming the computer which controlled them to detect their errors. An AUCC spokesman told The Journal the machines were "stupid, unreliable pieces of hardware" and were no longer in use at AUCC. He said the course guide errors did not surprise him.

A special programme was written for the course guide to copy information from the answer sheets to the magnetic tape. It was decided, primarily for financial reasons (programmers for such work cost at least $20 per hour) to omit the complex checking routines which can be written, and to substitute simple checks on the validity of the codes on the tape.

Apparently Raymont did not know that the machine can make major errors, and was under the impression that the checking could be minimal since it was chiefly concerned with finding questions which had been left blank or answered more than once.

It appears from a reconstruction of the data on the tape that one of the readers did not recognize, and therefore did not transmit to the computer and the magnetic tape, an appreciable fraction of the "A" responses to questions in the third major column of the answer form -- questions 3, 7, 11, 15, and so on. Instead, these were filled in on the tape as if they had been left blank.

The tape was returned, after some misadventures, to Queen's and the information was processed. There was one section on the tape for each of the eleven thousand forms read. These were sorted out by course; the number of forms for each course could then be counted ("total responses") and the number of replies for each question was worked out. Any answer which appeared to be blank, or to be answered more than once was ignored, leading to a lower response to some of the questions.

Of Bernabei's two courses, Latin 012 was read on the "suspect" optical reader in Ottawa. This led to the overlooking of a number of "A" responses, especially in question 19, leading to the results he described. (There were only seven, rather than nine, forms considered because two of them had the course number marked incorrectly. One had 19-012-00 rather than 54-012-00; the other had the 5 filled out too weakly for the machine to read and was therefore read as 02-012-00 and lost.)

The Classics 010 forms were mostly read on the non-suspect reader; thus, the results are fairly accurate. There is a slight decrease in the "A" response for a few of the questions from the third column, representing the few Classics 010 forms which were put through the other reader.

The information on this page was compiled by three members of the Journal staff who were involved with technical work on the course guide last spring.

"They are worse than meaningless": Bernabei's first letter to Raymont

As a precaution against your committing the very blunders that in fact you did commit, I made copies of the 17 ASUS Course Evaluation Forms submitted by students in my course, Classical Literature 010, designated by the number 19-010 (01). I tabluated the results, and sat back patiently to await the opportunity to compare my results with yours.

Believing that your venture would be an appalling travesty of efficiency at the end, just as it had been a travesty of common sense at the beginning, I wished to have an accurate and unassailable record on which to base the criticisms which my bones told me would be amply deserved.

Mind you, in spite of my expectations, I wished you well; I hoped, sincerely, that the course evaluation would be successful. Accordingly, I co-operated with you in every way that you required. I allowed my students 20 minutes of class time in which to compete the evaluation forms (time which, by the way, I did not wish to waste), and, in conformity with your instructions, I duly wrote succinct but adequate descriptions of my courses for inclusion in the (perish the word, even though now it has earned the title) anti-calendar. Understand, therefore, that although I believed that the outcome of your efforts -- and mine, and of I know not how many others -- would be utterly useless, I hoped that somehow it would render some benefit to someone.

The result, as it turns out, threatens to be worse than useless...

The ASUS Course Guide Questionaire Results for Classical Literature 010, section 1, lists 39 questions in 17 valid questionnaires. After nothing but a cursory examination (by "cursory" I mean that I did not more than glance over your results and check in detail only those portions where it was most obviously apparent that you were in serious error), I detected four fundamental mistakes and multiple mistakes emanating from them. The percentages indicated in Question No. 15, for example, are based on 14 replies; in fact, there were 17 replies to that question. Similarly, Question No. 19 lists percentages based on 11 replies; there were 17 replies to Question No. 19. And so on.

Your obvious errors (never mind the ones that I failed to notice) are neither few nor irrelevant -- nor, for that matter, are they confined merely to Classical Literature 010. The results of your summary for Latin 012 are so whimsical that I can hardly make sense of them, perhaps because I did not make copies of the Questionnaire Forms, but merely tabulated the results of a few questions. Here are some of your blunders as they pertain to Latin 012 (again, my comments are based on a cursory examination, and this time I do not even have the benefit of consulting the Forms themselves, but only a tabulation of about 10 questions):

--Your figures are all based on 7 questionnaires; my records indicate that 9 students completed the Forms (that makes 2 students whose opinions you utterly ignore)...

--Here's a beauty. Question No 19 asks: "Is the professor's ability to answer questions (A) adequate or (B) inadeuqate?" According to your results, 100 percent of the replies answered "B" inadequate Surely those who read this question will notice that the 100 percent is based on only one reply. But how on earth are they supposed to know that in fact 9 students replied to this question, and that 8 of them replied "A", adequate? How?...

The effect of your willy nilly bumbling on me and my courses is infuriating, but not alarming. What is alarming is the certain knowledge that mine are not the only courses that you misrepresent by your specious evaluations. I am compelled to think that you misrepresent the results pertaining to all the courses. I have had the opportunity to examine Questionnaire Results dealing with other course than mine, and I note in them -- in all of them -- mistakes and confusions rivaling, sometimes surpassing, those that occur in the Results for my courses...

When you publish spurious results, while you pretend that they are accurate and cause others to believe that they are accurate, whom do you cheat? You cheat the incomming students who presumably will regard the anti-calendar as giving reliable accounts of students' opinions about their courses and teachers. You cheat the teachers and courses, since the data do not describe whey purport to describe. Worst of all, you defraud all the many students who sought to give honest opinions about their courses, for it is not their opinions that you intend to publish, but rather a whimsical collection of numbers that are worse, far worse, than meaningless. They are worse than meaningless because they will be regarded as meaningful, even though they are not.

If your results are inaccurate and you publish a document purporting accurately to reflect students' opinions, although you know that by virtue of their inaccuracies figures do not reflect stud opinions, then you willfully vi the faith of everyone whose faith smoothly courted - especially faith of the students who rend their opinions in the belief that were worth something, and that would do some good. By frivolity you have made them nothing -- less than nothing, re

An open letter from Peter Raymont

I write this letter in an effort to explicate several facts which were brought to my attention yesterday concerning the reliability of certain statistics printed in the Course Guide booklets with which many of you are familiar, and to apologize to the members of the community who were misrepresented by the printing of inaccurate statisticsI apologizeto faculty members whose reputations as teachers may have been shaken. I apologize to the students whose opinions were misrepresented by the faulty percentages printed in these booklets.

When I first researched the technical methods available for reading responses to questionnaires, I was assured by a number of experts in the fields of sociology and computer science that for our purposes - reading five possible responses to at least 45 questions on over 18,000 questionnaires - an optical scanner which could detect pencil marks was the most efficient, economical and accurate method. Human error, I was assured, for this many answers, would produce more potential chance of error. This seemed a sound argument to me and I searched for the appropriate machine that could read the little black pencil marks.

I was told the only one available to me in Canada was the Computel system paper reader in Ottawa. The reader was used regularly by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada to read the Ontario Scholastic Aptitude Tests (SATO, OMAT, OPAT, etc). These tests are administered regularly to Ontario high school students, the results of which often affect their admission to university.

I was assured that there would be no foreseeable problems and I had trust in the inhuman accuracy of a computer. The AUCC people wrote our program for us and (read the 18,000 answer forms we bought specially from IBM). I was confident that the results on the print out would accurately reflect the exact responses from each student.

We also took the precaution of purchasing 18,000 pencils from the AUCC so that each student filling out an answer form would be provided with the appropriate instrument.

As a further check, I personally hand-read every single answer form and corrected mistakes students had made in filling out the department, course and section number identification code at the top of the answer form. I also copied forms which were foled or creased or marked with a pen, in an attempt to minimize the number of forms rejected by the computer.

As the person ultimately responsible for the operation of this course guide program, I felt that I had taken every possible precaution to insure an accurate statistical representation of students' opinions of their courses and instructors.

Just before the booklets were to go to press, I received a letter from a professor who explained that he had checked the results from the computer print out he had just received from the class DSC representative, calculated from a personal reading of the answer forms the students in his class had filled out. This professor informed me that in fact there were several major errors with the computer-read results.

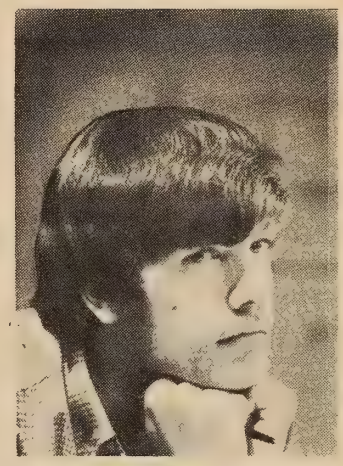
Realizing that this was a very small class and that a few minor errors by several individuals in filling out the answer form would have resulted in startling inaccuracies, I cursed the impersonality of computer use but still felt that this was one of the unfortunate prices one must pay when dealing with such massive quantities of responses.

Yesterday I was informed that the situation was much more serious than I had imagined.

By painstakingly hand-checking many of the actual answer forms, it was discovered that, in fact, the computer had, in many cases, failed to read the 'A' responses to questions in the third column of the answer form (i.e. numbers 3, 7, 11, 15, 19, 23, 31, 35, 39 and 43). This failure to read some of the responses occured in 129 of the approximately 700 course evaluated by students.

Checking with the computer expert at the AUCC, we received the reply that the paper reader we had used was, at times, unreliable that many SATO test results had to be hand-checked and that they had just begun to use a newer computer paper reader.

As the Course Guide affects so many member of the community, I felt that you should know all the facts. I recommend that you ignore responses to questions 3, 7, 11, 15, 19, 23, 27, 31, 35, 39 and 43 if the number of replies to any of these questions drop drastically. The replies to the other questions, however, are accurate.



Once again, I sincerely apologize for the printing of inaccurate statistics and for the consequent problems this may have created.

However, I hope that the concept of course evaluation and the idea of printing further information on courses and programs of instruction by Queen's students has not been too severely damaged by the unfortunate technical problems which plagued this pioneering attempt.

The potential dangers of a centrally administered and computer serviced operation have been clearly exposed. Yet I hope that this first evaluation process may have opened the door to continual revision and re-evaluation of the existing academic offerings in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

I apologize for last year's mistakes. I hope you can learn from them and continue.

An open letter from the ASUS

It has come to our attention that the Course Evaluation Guide last year contained errors in the statistical data they reported. The errors resulted from an incorrect computer tabluation of some of the multiple choice questions in only a portion of the courses evaluated. On behalf of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society we apologize to the students and to the professors in the courses affected for the erroneous impressions the incorrect evaluations created.

Last year was the first year that course guide evaluations were attempted in arts and science, and the editors were pioneering in the undertaking completely without the benefit of previous experience. We now have that experience, and in editing this year's evaluations we feel sure that errors can be corrected before they are published.

The Arts and Science Undergraduate Society feels strongly that course guide evaluations are an invaluable aid to students in selecting their courses. Incorrect data in the evaluations renders them less than useless, and we feel very badly that some of last year's evaluation contained in part such erroneous information; but an evaluation guide which is strictly accurate, we feel, is something that the students in arts and science need. We are confident that this year's evaluations will be just such a guide.

El Greco's painting "Saint Francis and Brother Léo Meditating on Death" (see Journal, Oct. 8) from the National Gallery of Canada Collection will be at the Art Centre from the 28th of October to the 9th of November.

The procurement of this painting for the art centre is especially important to Queen's, since it is the first time that this campus has been included in such an itinerary from the National Gallery.

El Greco, who was famous in his own time as a painter of Saint Francis, in this version shows St. Francis with his favourite disciple Brother Leo on Mount Laverna meditating on the meaning of death.

To coincide with the exhibition of the painting by El Greco, the gallery is publishing a booklet which goes into the background of El Greco's work and the religious life of Toledo in the seventeenth century.

The Unimportance of Being Earnest

By Sandy Niaman

The relative Unimportance of the Theatre 5 production of Oscar Wilde's "The Importance Of Being Earnest" is unfortunate but understandable.

There are so many areas of the production which are deficient it is difficult to know where to pin the blame, but to begin, it seems that any man who assumes the role of Director and Leading Actor is either very optimistic or very talented. The former is the case with Gordon Robertson, whose direction lacks unity, focus and above all, the sparkle and rhythmic dimension that Wilde's play needs.

As a director Mr. Robertson seems to have overlooked the fact that "The Importance Of Being Earnest" is a comedy, a comedy bordering on farse and solely devoted to wit. In the words of Henry Popkin, this is "the only one of Wilde's plays that is consistently written in his highest and wittiest style". With this oversight the Theatre 5 production is slow, poorly timed, boring and totally lost to this wit. One can get more enjoyment from reading the play oneself.

(A pocketbook edition can be purchased for 60 cents and you can save a considerable amount of money in passing up the Grand Theatre offering.)

As an actor one would hope, at least, that here Mr. Robertson would be in his prime, but, dear reader, it is necessary to note that not even in acting can Mr. Robertson pull his load.

He fumbled more lines, as a distressing monitone, than any of the other members of the cast. He also tripped on the train of one of the actresses, a feat that got a bigger ovation than any other moment of the play. He paced about with the grace of an armadillo and was as totally unaware of his audience. He was also decidely too old for his role. The so-called curly hair of Algernon Moncrieff, in Mr. Robertson's case, was thinning and straight. The constant referrals to him as "dear boy" were irritating, as he looked as if he could have fathered several, but never passed as one. Instead of demanding of his peers jovial almost ludicrous respect, instead he obtained the feeble, limpid variety.

But so much for Mr. Robertson.

Mrs. Valerie Robertson, as Lady Bracknell, is as equally impotent in her role as is her husband. She is too pretty, too young and too sugary to play the strong-willed, autocratic Fuhreresque matron of this Victorian comedy. She seems to lack the command of character, the iron rod of control and above all, the likeable, though atrocious idiocy, with which Wilde seemed to imbue his characters, profusely.

Theresa Sears, as Lady Bracknell's daughter, Gwendolyn, is irritating. Her voice, unfortunately an aspect over which she has little control, is so highly pitched, one wishes who would consider a career in mime. Her acting however, an aspect over which she does have control, is totally ineffectual.

One would think that in this myriad of inadequacy there would be a spark of light, a grain of hope, and indeed there is, in Daniel Buccos, who plays John (alias Earnest) Worthing. Mr. Buccos' is the only major role which has the life, the fun, the wit which I am sure Wilde intended. He knows how to move, how to stand, and how to speak with exaggerated emotion. But best of all, he knows how to have fun and to let the audience have fun, too.

Unfortunately, though, one good actor cannot carry so many poor ones. For even though the minor roles of Miss Prism, played by Diane Gordon and Dr. Chausble, played by David Switzer, were charming and refreshing, Mr. Buccos still shines as the only believable Wilderian character.

The production looked, as a whole, passive and airy, with pastel costumes and highly symmetrical, unimaginative and almost hypnotic sets. An attempt at grandeur was successful only in so much that everything looked moderately pretty, in a sweet, lack lustre, rather sterile way.

It is rather bewildering to note that in the six weeks recess the Theatre 5 Company has taken since the close of its summer season its members have not been able to tighten up, improve and breathe some life into their production.

It is the contention of this writer, anyway, that if something isn't breathed into "The Importance of Being Earnest" it, and probably the rest of the company's repertoire will remain, unimportant.

The ASUS Tale

Tuesday, October 26, 1971 | Kingston, Ontario | Vol. 3, No. 1

Hard work ahead for the ASUS: Orientation, Course Evaluation Guide, Constitutional Revision; and much more.

Letter from the President

Welcome to the first edition of this year's ASUS Tale. It is always appropriate to have a president's message in first issues and so this is mine.

This year I hope, will mark a significant departure in the traditional course followed by the ASUS. In past years the ASUS has been primarily and significantly a social, service, athletic, organization in that order. Thanks to the insight and leadership of my two immediate predecessors the ASUS has ventured into other areas where it has a most legitimate concern. I speak now of academics and all those questions naturally arising out of the concept of post-secondary education. Admittedly our efforts in this area have been less than monumental, but I do think that the ASUS Course Evaluation Guide itself a monumental task and achievement, and our sometimes unappreciated involvement with the DSC's are steps in the right direction.

This year the ASUS executive has struck a Constitutional Review Committee and it is my hope that this committee will devise a document which will reflect more accurately those concerns with which the ASUS should now be concerning itself. In the past few years students at Queen's have witnessed the growth of an extremely capable and efficient AMS which far surpasses the abilities of individual societies to render services and organize social and cultural events for the students of this university.

Thus, perhaps now is the time for the ASUS to begin considering whether it should give up certain of its traditional functions such as Orientation, the ASUS book exchange, Suzie-Q week and others, to the AMS, and start to concentrate in those areas where our talents and resources might more profitably be deployed. Whether one agrees or disagrees with the above, I think it important that these questions be asked. A self perpetuating bureaucracy is no reason for existence and I think every member of the ASUS has a right to demand that the society examine itself from time to time to ensure it is not becoming redundant and to ensure that it is performing a useful function.

It is in this light therefore that I hope the Constitutional Review Committee will approach its task and I certainly encourage as many unputs as possible into their discussion such that they might emerge with a raison d'etre which will be more responsive to current concerns than our present constitution.

Have a happy life!

Important issues affecting the ASUS

Orientation 72

Each year about this time there takes place a ritual known as the "Orientation Hassle". This ritual is conducted under the auspicies of the ASUS executive in their attempts to select an Orientation committee for the following years orientation programme. This ritual is only slightly less popular and participated in than the away game at "T.O.", and each year we witness the same debate taking place, "To haze or not to haze, that is the question!"

A meeting held last Thursday provided the presentation of The Orientation Committee's report and the Oreintation Evauluation Committee's Report. Along with these, many personal views were advanced in a meeting that proved more vehement than last year but less violent than years preceding that. It is obvious that sentiment concerning Orientation is anything but unified.

Details for this Thursday's Orientation Committee Selection Meeting are outlined below.

Orientation committee selection

Thursday, October 28th at 8 p.m. in the Red Room of Kingston Hall an open meeting of the ASUS will be held to select the Orientation Committee of 1971.

Anyone who is a full time undergraduate in the Faculty of Arts and Science and who is a member in good standing of the ASUS may be a member of this committee.

Format of the meeting of October 28th, 1971 to be held in the Red Room at 8 p.m. Kingston Hall.

The meeting will be chaired by Mr. Paul Kennedy, Speaker of the AMS, and in the event of a large number of candidates applying for the Orientation Committee, Mr Kennedy will be assisted by a helper who's job it will be to ensure that questioning and discussion of each of the applicants stays within their allotted time limit.

The committee will be selected by a secret ballot vote, and the exact details and format of which will depend on the number of applicants received for membership on the committee.

Those voting in the selection of the Orientation '72 committee shall be: all members of the ASUS executive, one representative each of Nursing Science and Rehabilitative Therapy, and the chairman or his delegate from the Orientation Committee 1971.

The ASUS executive extends a special invitation to all members of the Orientation '71 committee and to the Gaels to attend this meeting and help the ASUS executive in their selection of the Orientation '72 committee through their comments and suggestions.

All members of the ASUS are welcome to attend this meeting as is their constitutional right, but those persons attending this meeting must understand that it is designated as a "closed" meeting, that is, any remarks made during this meeting are to be considered confidential and are not to be discussed outside of this meeting under any circumstances.

Course guide 1971-72

The ASUS held an open meeting on October 13th to discuss the course evaluation guide. A very lengthy discussion ensued with many very helpful criticisms and suggestions offered. Many people present at the meeting felt the concept of a course guide was indeed a very valuable one and although realizing the many technical difficulties of the first attempt felt that the ASUS should continue with this project next year. In order to do this we need some very interested and dedicated people willing to undertake the task of co-ordinating such a project and also we need some hard working S.S.C representatives who will work on their own departmental booklets. The success of such a large project depends on the individual students who participate in producing the course guide.

Last year's course guide was plagued with the problems of any new project and next year's guide should be able to benefit from last year's mistakes. In the area of the actual course evaluation, it was felt that we needed to have some more appropriate types of evaluation suited to the various disciplines and class sizes. In this respect, hopefully each D.S.C. will devise its own method of evaluation.

The selection for next year's course guide co-ordinator and-or committee will take place at 8:00 p.m. Monday, November 1st in the Red Room. The meeting is open to all Arts and Science students, so please attend.

Included in this issue are reports from the various ASUS committees. All members of the ASUS are encouraged to join any of these committees, and will be most welcomed. You may contact the various chairmen through the ASUS mailbox in the AMS Outer Office.

Divisional councillors — another try

Last Wednesday's Meeting of the ASUS Departmental Student Councils to elect three Divisional Councillors was postponed due to a protest from the English DSC. It was their contention that not enough notice of that night's meeting had been given and that the selection of the Divisional Councillors would not be representative of all the DSC's. The meeting has been rescheduled to this Wednesday night, the place and time yet to be announced as of press time.

The Divisional Councillors represent the DSC's from the three basic areas of studies (Humanities, Natural Sciences, and Social Sciences), to the ASUS executive. They act as the liason between the ASUS and the DSC's.

COMMITTEE REPORTS

Publications

The Publications Committee is new this year to the ASUS committee structure. The committee represents a centralization and co-ordination of many functions and activities which, in the past, have been spread over a larger range.

One of the major responsibilities of the committee is the publication of what you are now reading -- The ASUS Tale. It is the basic means of mass communication to the ASUS student body, and is published several times during the academic year. Although the ASUS Tale now comes under the jurisdiction of the Publications Committee, its basic intention of informing ASUS students has not changed, even if its format has.

Another aspect of the committee is to publicize meetings, elections, referenda, and other pertinent events and data through ads in the Journal, CFRC, and posters and flyers around campus. This obviously involves an extensive and effective network. The framework for this has been set up, but positions still remain open.

The boundaries of the Publications Committee have not been strictly defined, for it is believed that as the committee evolves it will set its own limits. The committee's purpose of informing the ASUS student body, however, will be a constant guideline.

Clubrooms

The Clubrooms Committee deals almost exclusively with the Red Room, located in Kingston Hall. The chairman of the committee is, essentially, convenor for the Red Room, in that he authorizes all bookings and charges levied for the use of the Red Room, working closely, in this respect, with the University Space Allocation Office.

At the moment, the committee is working on a disply of year crests, dating from 1940, to be mounted over the Red Room fireplace. It is hoped that this will be completed before the end of October.

In addition the art centre has indicated its willingness to mount a number of works in the Red Room for the duration of the year.

It might be noted that the Red Room Committee and the Other Events Committee plan on working together in an attempt to make more use of the Red Room for the benefit of the members of the ASUS. In the planning stages are two types of events; "Poetry Nights" hopefully featuring well-known Canadian poets, the first of which will be held early in the second term, and secondly; a number of "Smokers" featuring well-known Canadian brew, to be held throughout the year.

We are, however, completely open to any suggestions concerning alternate or additional events which could be held. formal report.

Formal

The plans for this year's Formal sponsored by the ASUS, are, at the moment, very tentative. At present, all that can be said is that the Formal will be held in Victoria Hall Basement on February 12,1972. It will be a girl-ask boy formal, but the name for the event has not yet been decided. The price per couple will be approximately $5.

Inter-year

The basic function of this committee is to co-ordinate all year sponsored activities. The committee meets once every two or three weeks to finalise plans for events during the present term, and to plan those for the next term. The chairman, Derek McLean, sits on the ASUS Executive. The members of this committee are: all Year Presidents and Vice-Presidents of Arts 72, 73, 74, and 75. This year, the Social Convenors from Arts 73 and the Secretary of Artsci 75 are sitting on the committee.

Judicial

The Judicial Commission of the ASUS oversees the legal affairs and elections of the Society, as well as being the final authority on the interpretation of the Constitution, By-Laws, and Statutes of the Society. Prior to any ASUS election, the Judicial Commission appoints a Chief Electoral Officer who is then in charge of the management of that election. In past years the Chief Electoral Officer has usually been selected from one of the three members of the Judicial Commission, rather than appointing someone else. The present Commission members however, would like to see greater participation in election affairs by members of the ASUS at large, and invite all those who would like to become involved to leave their names and telephone numbers in the ASUS mailbox in the AMS Outer Office, c-o Judicial Commission.

The Commission's major task this year will be the overhauling of the ASUS Constitution so that it represents the interests of the Society's members more adequately. A Constitutional Committee is presently being formed for this purpose. Opinions and proposals will be welcomed by the Committee members, and anyone who is interested enough is invited to appear before the Committee with their ideas.

The ASUS Tale (advertising supplant to the Queen's Journal) is published occasionally during the academic year by Marmot Productions, a sub committee of the Publications Committee, Arts and Science Undergraduate Society, of Queen's University at Kingston. Opinions expressed herein are not necessarily those of the University or the Society. Thanx to Bob and Jim for perspective and living assistance, and especially to Helen "H" Kenney for just about everything else.

Suzie-Q '71

November third to the seventh marks the return of the Dickensian Era at Queen's. These dates also mark the wildest opportunity that no self-respecting female could afford to ignore. This is Suzi-Q '71! This is your "Golden Opportunity" to pick and choose amongst your male friends and to let your independence emerge. Every night has a choice of activity; every girl can exercise her feminine perogative to change her mind.

It all starts off with pizzaz on Wednesday night -- a Stag Dance in Grant Hall, entertained by UNITED POWER. Drinks will be served and the admission is the ridiculously low fee of 50c for men, 25c for women. Coffeehouses, for a more subdued atmosphere will be set up in Vic and Chown Halls, with live entertainment.

Thursday night is Flick Night when daring and unusual National Film Board films will be shown in Jeffrey 127 and 128. For the more athletic and hardy souls, a Skate is being held in the Arena.

Friday night is another knock-down, drag-out and generally uproarious night. A Super Smoker is being held in Wallace Hall of the Union. To encourage further hale and hearty mischief, a casino will be set up in the Polsun Room. As though that were not enough, hayrides at three different departure times are being provided for those who get Wanderlust in their cups.

Which brings me to the Grand Finale -- the SUZI-Q SEMIFORMAL: GASLIGHT 1890! For only $4.00, a couple can dance to the vibrant music of ATLANTIS. At last -- a place to wear that peasant dress that couldn't find a place to go! It could only add to the Dickensian theme. Again, a bar will be provided for all those who need it.

A Co-ed Breakfast, on Sunday morning at Ban Righ climaxes Gaslight 1890. This is a chance every girl should take advantage of. So much -- for so little. Please remember GASLIGHT 1890 in that special class when you just happen to bump into that special guy!

Penalties, penalties: We beat ourselves!

Gaels Drop Thriller to Varsity

By Dave Cameron

The Queen's Golden Gaels completed their regular season on Saturday, losing narrowly to the University of Toronto Varsity Blues 31-29. The loss has no effect on the division standings, as the Gaels clinched first spot with their Homecoming win against the Blues.

As the score indicates, the game was extremely close, and could have gone either way right up to the final minute. In fact, it was about the best football game we've seen since last year's Western Bowl.

The closeness of the game is indicted in the statistics. The Blues gained only 50 more total yards than did the Gaels, by no means a one-sided comparison. Quarterback Wayne Dunkley threw for 455 yards and had a 70 percent completion average, again using the shotgun formation to pick apart the Queen's defensive secondary.

The Gaels once again displayed a fairly balanced offence, and for the first time this season gained more yardage through the air than rushing.

This is a result of much sharper passing by Tom Taylor. The statistic that provides the explanation of the loss is the yardage collected in penalties by the Gaels. Queen's collected 165 yards worth, more than three games' worth for most other teams.

Many of these yards came at awkward, to say the least, times, as they gave the Blues seven first downs by penalty in the game.

Many of the penalties were of the roughing and piling on nature, and were therefore completely unnecessary. This is something that the Gaels will have to cut down on for the playoffs if they hope to advance.

The Gaels started quickly in the first quarter, hitting for a touchdown on their opening drive. The drive was aided by some very tough running by fullback Dave Hadden, who eventually gained 60 yards for the day.

The touchdown came on a Taylor sneak, and the score was 7-0. Their next drive was also profitable, and this time it was Taylor's arm which did the work.

Throwing well to end John Hollingsworth and flanker Ron Cunningham, replacing Stu Lang who was out with a sore leg, the drive reached the Blues' 22-yard line, from which point Doug Cozac kicked a field goal to up the margin to 10-0.

Later in the quarter Toronto got on the scoreboard, also kicking a field goal The drive which set it up started at the Queen's 43 yard line and ended at the 18, and consisted of 4 plays, 3 incomplete passes and a one-yard run.

The rest of the yardage was made up in Queen's penalties. Who said they weren't important? The Gaels added a Mike Lambros single, and the quarter ended 11-3.

The Blues put together a quick drive at the start of the second quarter on some fine passing and some not-so-fine pass coverage, and scored a touchdown (Dunkley to Chapman, remember them?) to narrow the margin to 11-9.

Three minutes later they came right back and again scored on a drive aided by good passing, two Queen's penalties, and some brilliant demonstrations of how-not-to tackle on the part of the Queen's defense, a problem which has been plaguing them all year.

The touchdown put the Blues in front 16-11. A timely interception by linebacker Brett Biggs later in the quarter set up the Gaels' second touchdown, a fourteen-yard run by Gord McLellan.

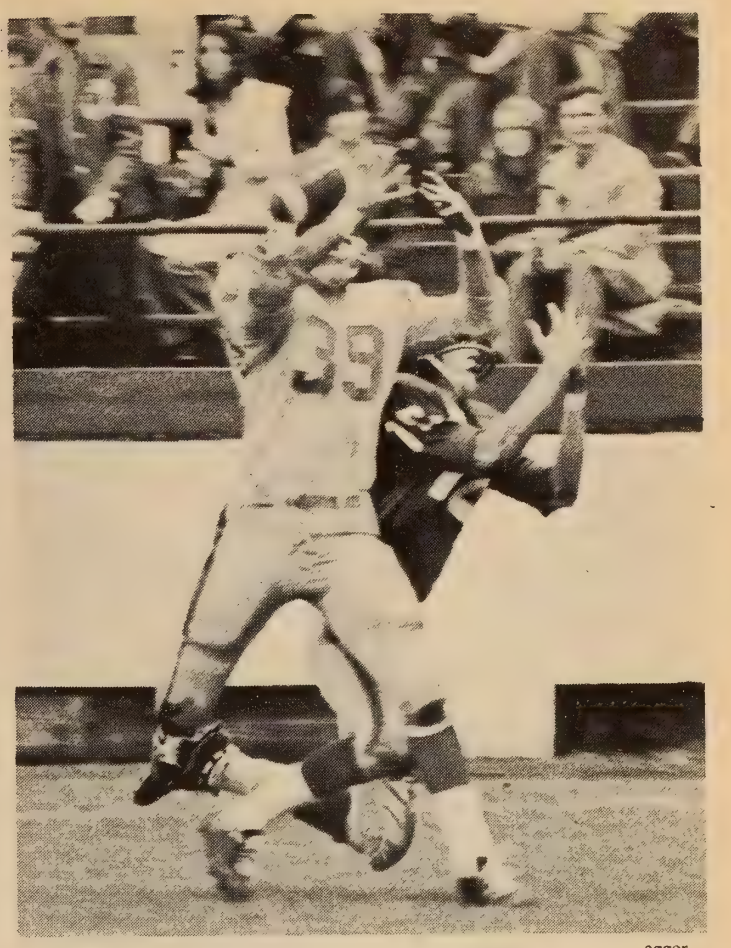
This major, along with an earlier single on a missed field goal attempt, put Queen's back in front 19-16. Two plays after their kickoff, Mike Lambros hauled in a Dunkley pass, and from center field, the Gaels drove to the Blues' 25. Cozac added another field goal, increasing the score to 22-16 at the end of the half.

At the start of the second half, the Blues took the ball, and marched 73 yards in 11 plays for an early touchdown, which put them back in front 23-22. There was no further scoring in the third quarter, but it featured good, tough football on both sides, a quality which was evident through the entire game.

The most beautiful touchdown of the season came on another Dunkley-Chapman combination, this one going for 53 yards. Chapman was ten yards behind the nearest Gael defender when he pulled in the pass.

At this point, with the Blues 8 points up, the tension began to build. Toronto added a single to make the score 31-22, and then it was the Gaels' turn. On their first play after the single, Tom Taylor, under tremendous pressure from the blitzing Toronto defense, tossed a short pass to Gord McLellan, who then put on a great exhibition of running, and went 67 yards to the Blues 8 yard line.

On the next play Brian Warrender burst over for the touchdown, putting the Gaels within two points of Toronto.



This touchdown tied the record set earlier in the game by Gord McLellan of 12 touchdowns in a single season. With just a couple of minutes left in the game, the Gaels tried an onside kickoff, and recovered the ball, taking possession on the Toronto 50 yard line.

But the Blues defense held the Gaels, and after being pushed back to the Queen's 49, Lambros punted on third down to end the late threat. From there, the Blues ran out the clock.

The Gaels played good ball, picking up a total of 436 yards in the game. Brian Warrender was the leading rusher, collecting 92 yards on 12 carries, and Hollingsworth was the leading receiver, catching four passes for 85 yards.

Except for the penalties, there is not too much to complain about in their play. If they play this well next Saturday against Western, they should win. But, oh, the penalties . . .

Trackmen Second in OUAA: Fraser named Top Athlete

The strongest Queen's Track and Field team in recent history battled against ten other universities in the OUAA Championships at Western on Saturday, and emerged in second place, with 117 points compared to U. of Waterloo's 131 and U.W.O.'s - 116½, and the Hec Phillips Trophy winner, (the meet's outstanding athlete) Hugh Fraser.

Fraser struck double gold in the 100 and 220 yard sprints. In the 100 the battle was against Mike Murray of Waterloo, Canada's third ranked speedster, but Fraser's wind-aided 9.5 time left him all alone at the tape. It was a repeat performance in the 220. The Queen's star knifed in front of the pack at the 110 mark and remained unchallenged to the finish. The time of 21.0 seconds was a personal best, an

Hugh Fraser - 2 new records

OUAA record, and the second fastest time for the distance in Canada this year. Queen's Archer Guy grabbed 6th place in the same race with a personal best time of 22.9.

Kip Sumner and Brian Aiken dominated the pack of 880 yard runners. Sumner took an early lead and held it to the end, winning in 1:53:4. Aiken ran slowly during the first quarter mile and had to really move out near the end to take the silver medal in a time of 1:55.5 Sumner also made a bid for a gold in the mile, but had to settle for the silver behind Western's Grant McLaren, who won with 4:12.7.

Canadian Junior Hurdles Champ Dave Jarvis continued to perform consistently. Jarvis racked up a gold in the 440 yard hurdles in an OUAA record tme of 53.8 seconds, and a silver in the 120 hurdles in 15.0. Bob Warner took 4th in the 440 yard hurdles (56.9) barely missing the bronze on his dive for the tape. Don Price of Queen's picked up the bronze in the 120 yard high hurdles, (15.5 sec.), and bolstered the team's standing with another bronze medal in high jump (5'11") and a 4th in triple jump (41'9½).

Keith Berriman made an impressive performance in the 440 yard dash. As planned, Berriman flew through the first 220 in under 23 seconds. The first five runners were moving side by side until the finish. Berriman took fourth with a personal best time of 49.8 seconds.

Unfortunately, Queen's track power lacked corresponding balance in the field events. Jack Ongarato, a husky six-foot freshmen, took 5th place in both the Shot Put and the discus. His discus throw of 132'3½" ranked as a new Queen's record. Long Jumper Axel Becke also captured 5th place points with a 21'6" effort. Becke and Glen Milligan, both freshmen, are two highly ranked long jumpers and should provide Queen's with a one-two combination in years to come. Milligan had trouble with fouls on Saturday.

The mile relay was slated as one of the tighest events of the meet. However, Jarvis, Warner, Berriman and Aiken blew it wide open. Jarvis and Warner held on to U. of T. who ran their best men on the first two legs. When Berriman took the baton, it was all over. He surged past Toronto, opening up a ten yard lead which Aiken increased to 15, giving the team a winning time of 3:21.3 and a new Queen's record.

Track and field finals

Led by stand-out sprinter Irene Harris, the Queen's Women's Track and Field team placed 5th in the O.W.I.A.A. championships. Irene won the 100 and 200 metere dashes. In doing so, she set a new meet record in the 100 metres and soundly beat a member of the Canadian Pan-Am team - in the 200 metre event.

Kiava Caldoma was Queen's number one field performer placing 3rd in the high jump and 4th in the long jump. Unfortunately, Kiava fouled 4 out of 6 attempts in the long jump, two of which were better than the winning jump.

Aileen Kirby, the Calgary Flash, placed 6th in the 440. Sue Foster ran a personal best in the 1500 metres of 6:03.7 and also placed 6th in a fast field.

Karen Murphy was a very pleasant surprise in the Discus grabbing 5th place with a throw of 88'10".

Queen's relay team of A. Kirby, B. Thompson, M. Soence and I. Harris placed 3rd and were only .4 second off the record despite poor passes. The team could be a real contender during the indoor season.

Next year the men's and women's track and field meet will be held together. This year at Queen's the men and women are joining to run as one team.

The first meet will be in the middle of December at the C.N.E. track. Any women interested in competing indoors can get in touch with Brenda Mackie at the P.E.C.

Field hockey

The Field Hockey girls played three of their seven opponents in Part I of the OWIAA Senior Finals at York last weekend. After taking an initial loss from York, they came back to defeat McGill. However, the powerful Toronto team, featuring two players from Canada's National team, were successful in overcoming the strong Queen's effort. U. of T. almost certainly has first place clinched, however, a good showing by Queen's against McMaster, Waterloo, Guelph and Western next weekend could secure second place for them.

Innumerable plea

By Doreen Howes

Despite innumerable pleas to coaches, team members, friends and strangers (we try to shanghai anyone who looks like they may be headed towards the Journal office) it seems impossible to acquire a Women's Sports staff. The Field Hockey team, unable to appoint a publicity officer, decided that the job would be passed around from player to player for coverage of their events. The major problem with this solution was that they frequently forgot to find a writer for that week's game. Also they lost out on the more in-depth coverage which could have been theirs. Many other teams are just beginning practices and will probably meet a fate similar to what of the Field Hockey girls.

There is an interest in Women's sports. Last year approximately 600 people were involved in the women's sports program -- competitors, coaches, managers and administrative personel -- as well, there were real, honest-to-goodness fans at many home games.

The push that women's sports need to bring them to notoriety is good reporting. Queen's lacks a journalism course, so any newspaper writers are hidden in the masses -- apparently fearful of stepping forward and exhibiting their skills to the campus. Finding ourselves without journalists to produce our copy - what we really need are people with a basic knowledge of the English language and an interest in sports.

W.I.C. News

Participation in W.I.C. activities so far has been relatively good and most of the faculties are doing well.

In basketball, the first place teams are Law in League A and P.H.E. (1) in League B. Commerce, Rehab (1), Arts '73 (1) and McArthur were the only teams who couldn't muster enough support and defaulted. Games continue every Tuesday night until the end of November. Badminton and paddleball are also continuing - schedules are posted in the Women's Locker Room.

The ringette clinic last Wednesday was a big success. One more clinic will be held on Wed., Oct. 27 at 8 p.m., before scheduled play begins. It's not too late to sign up and the game can be a lot of fun. Team members are especially needed from Arts '72 and '73, Education and Meds.

The one disappointment was the track and field meet, which had to be called off - but it is expected that this lack of enthusiasm won't be repeated in the indoor sports.

Waterpolo: threeinarow

In their hardest game so far this season, Queen's narrowly defeated a tough University of Guelph squad 4-3 in a contest played in the Queen's pool Friday night. Queen's played well defensively, with the exception of one glaring lapse that produced a Guelph goal, but lacked the smooth offensive rhythm sought by coach Simon Beirler. Part of the problem stemmed from the Guelph goaltender, a member of the Ygoslav National team. Queen's tended to take long shots that were easy prey, rather than passing the ball to often-open teammates.

Queen's took an early lead when Howard was left unguarded in the four-metre area, and enjoyed a 3-2 margin at the half. The two teams exchanged singles in the final half, Queen's scoring in the third quarter and Guelph in the hard-fought fourth. Other Gael scorers were Nesbitt, Craig and Gossin.

Can Clinch Division Wednesday

Soccer Gaels dump GeeGees

No doubt Queen's is the most generous of the soccer teams in the East division. Not only did they give Carleton a one game start in the race for first place, and Trent a one goal start in the game that might have meant the end of that race, but they have also been the only team to permit the floundering flappers from Ottawa to score.

Of course they have amply demonstrated that they can afford such generosity, by shutting out Carleton on their return engagement, and pounding in four goals for Trent's one, and thirteen for Ottawa's two.

Nevertheless, although they have conditioned their supporters so well to this cat and mouse game that none of them were particularly perturbed by Ottawa's scoring of the opening goal of their game last Saturday after just six minutes, nevertheless, we do hope that they will adopt a more ruthless stand when it comes to the play-off games, where the mice tend to be rats.

Wednesday on the West Campus at 4 p.m. would be a good time to practice this policy of quick dispatch on Trent, and incidentaly clinch first place officially.

Saturday's game saw Ottawa not only score the first goal, but dominate the midfield for the first fifteen minutes, and very nearly score again when a second shot hit the post of Flood's goal.

Finally goaded to action Queen's scored a copy-book goal with Andy Piotrowski heading in across from Dominic Zeffiro.

With the wind at their backs, Ottawa continued to drive the ball into Queen's half, but the Gaels were now retaliating. Piotrowski found the action again several times, and Drysdale, Zeffiro, and Torode all got in shots at goal, but the score remained 1-1 at the half.

After only three minutes of the second half, Davie Robertson eluded his full-back to centre the ball, again, to Piotrowski's head, and Queen's led 2-1.

The wind now in their teeth, Ottawa were at a loss as to how to clear the ball out of their end, and there it remained for most of the half.

When it did stray into that area, either Golini would cut it off, or Birks would give Flood some practice with passes back to the goalie.

In the nineteenth minute Robertson, the outstanding player of the game, again turned in a neat centering pass, but this time Piotrowski was seeing his hat-trick (but not the ball), and Andy Pipe behind him nodded in the goal. Pipe joined in again at the thirty-one minute mark sending a pass from his wing to Tony Lohman, who sent a glancing shot into the Ottawa net. Spiro Kanellos joined in the fun to make it 5-1 for Queen's.

Bell Canada operators across Ontario and Quebec walked out Friday to protest against delays in reaching a new collective agreement with the company, delaying long-distance service to many points.

Mary Lennox, president of the Traffic Employees Association which represents about 8,500 Bell operators, office staff and dining service employees in the two provinces, accused the company of secretly setting up switchboards before the walkout in buildings outside Bell offices in order to bypass the company's main switchboards.

Mel James, a spokesman for the company, said no outside switchboards had been set up. He said that supervisory personnel had been trained in the operation of normal switchboard facilities.

Mr. James said supervisory staff are manning boards that operators have left and service will be provided, though it will be slower than normal. He adivsed subscribers to use direct distance dialing and to check numbers in the directory rather than calling information. Bell management personnel continue to man switchboards in Kingston after about 100 operators here walked out Friday.

The operators want parity with British Columbia operators who will be getting $135.45 a week starting January. At present the highest paid Kingston operator gets $93.75 a week.

HALIFAX - Nova Scotia is to have a new legal aid service operated by the Nova Scotia Barristers Society and financed by the provincial Government.

In the first stage of what is expected to be a progressively expanded system one-man legal aid offices are to be opened soon in Halifax, Sydney and New Glasgow.

All forms of civil and criminal law will be covered by the service and legal aid will be available for actions at all levels of the courts, including appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada.

TORONTO - Police should have the power under proposed new legislation to fingerprint and photograph juveniles who commit a serious crime, says Insp. Fern Alexander, director of Metro Police youth bureau.

About half of Metro's crime is committed by persons under 20 years old and such identification would help police control rising teenage crime, she told the Ontario Association of Corrections and Criminology Wednesday night.

The Young Offender's Act, still before Parliament, would give only juvenile court judges the power to order juvenile fingerprinting. Critics have charged that such records could affect a person's civil liberties.

ONTARIO - The number of students helped by the province ranged from about 24 per cent of University of Ottawa students to 60 per cent of students at Laurentian University of Sudbury.

The annual report of the Department of University Affairs, released Monday, notes that $36.9 million in loans and $35.6 million in grants, or an average award of $1,079, were paid in 1970-71.

The awards went to 61,482 students who received loans and grants and 5,564 who received grants only.

OTTAWA - National objectives for air quality were proposed Thursday by Environment Minister Jack Davis as a first step toward a national air-pollution control program.

The objectives, if adopted after a 60-day period for public discussion and criticism, would provide the framework for establishing emission-control regulations backed by fines of up to $200,000.

The proposed objectives issued yesterday set maximum acceptable levels for concentration in the atmosphere of five major air pollutants: sulphur dioxide, particulate matter - particles of dust or grit - carbon monoxide photochemical oxidants and hydrocarbons.

Maximum tolerable levels, indicating immediate danger and requiring immediate control action, are to be proposed later when means of control have been established.

Dr. S. O. Winthrop, chief of the air pollution control division of the Department of the Environment, said the air quality objectives will provide the framework for a series of regulations setting standards for emission of pollutants into the atmosphere.

With the winter sports season just two months away, an estimated 750,000 snowmobilers across Ontario are planning weekend jaunts into the wilderness on roaring snow machines.

But an army of safety experts, ecologists, government officials and even snowmobile manufacturers and club officials are warning that the fastest growing winter sport could mean disaster if restraint isn't shown and the environment is ignored.

OTTAWA - Soviet Premier Alexei Kosygin sharply criticized the United States for its new economic policies and its involvement in Vietnam in a toast to Soviet-Canadian friendship at a luncheon Tuesday.

His criticism of the Nixon Administration's economic moves, made without direct reference to Washington but unmistakeably directed at it, referred to the job-killing impact of the U.S. measures on the economies of other countries.

"Both the Soviet Union and Canada, like any other nations engaged in international trade, are naturaly concerned that this trade should be on a stable footing and that it should expand as the economies of other countries involved grow.

"This means of course that it must be based on a stable system of exchange rates, on a system which does not compel some countries to pay for it by slowing down their economic development, by curtailing their commercial operations, by increasing unemployment on account of the economic miscalculations of others.

"This is all the more unacceptable when these miscalculations are not due to chance circumstances, but are in fact rendered inevitable by the pursuit of policies creating focuses of tension and conflict in various parts of the world."

OTTAWA - The government is hiring "analyists," not spies, to help it assess security problems in Quebec, Solicitor-General Jean-Pierre Goyer told the House of Commons Friday

The new recruits - with backgrounds in law, economics, sociology or psychology - would be paid between $13,400 and $15,200 annually to sift through information supplied by RCMP and other police investigations.

"It's better than just waiting for things to blow up, isn't it?" he asked.

THE WORLD

PORT OF SPAIN, Trinidad - Twelve Black Power leaders were rounded up Wednesday during the second state of emergency imposed on Trinidad and Tobago in 18 months.

Those held in jail include Geddes Granger, Clive Nunez, Rolston Granger and George Weekes, all of whom were detained during the last state of emergency in April, 1970, which followed Black Power demonstrations.

Prime Minister Eric Williams invoked emergency powers Wednesday in the wake of labor disputes which have stopped work on a $160 million desulphurization plant being built by Texaco (Trinidad) Ltd.

USA - The operation was a success but the patient died. And what he died of might have been something he picked up in the hospital.

Even if he survived, his hospital stay may have been lengthened by the infection he acquired in the hospital.

The problem of hospital cross-infection is a major, if not critical, problem in the United States, in the view of many medical authorities.

No one really knows how many such infections occur in the US or how many people die as a result - there might be as many as 100,000 deaths a year. It has been called "the greatest problem of the day in hospitals."

W. GERMANY - West German Chancellor Willy Brandt, winner of the 1971 Nobel Peace Prize said Wednesday, "It may have come too early.

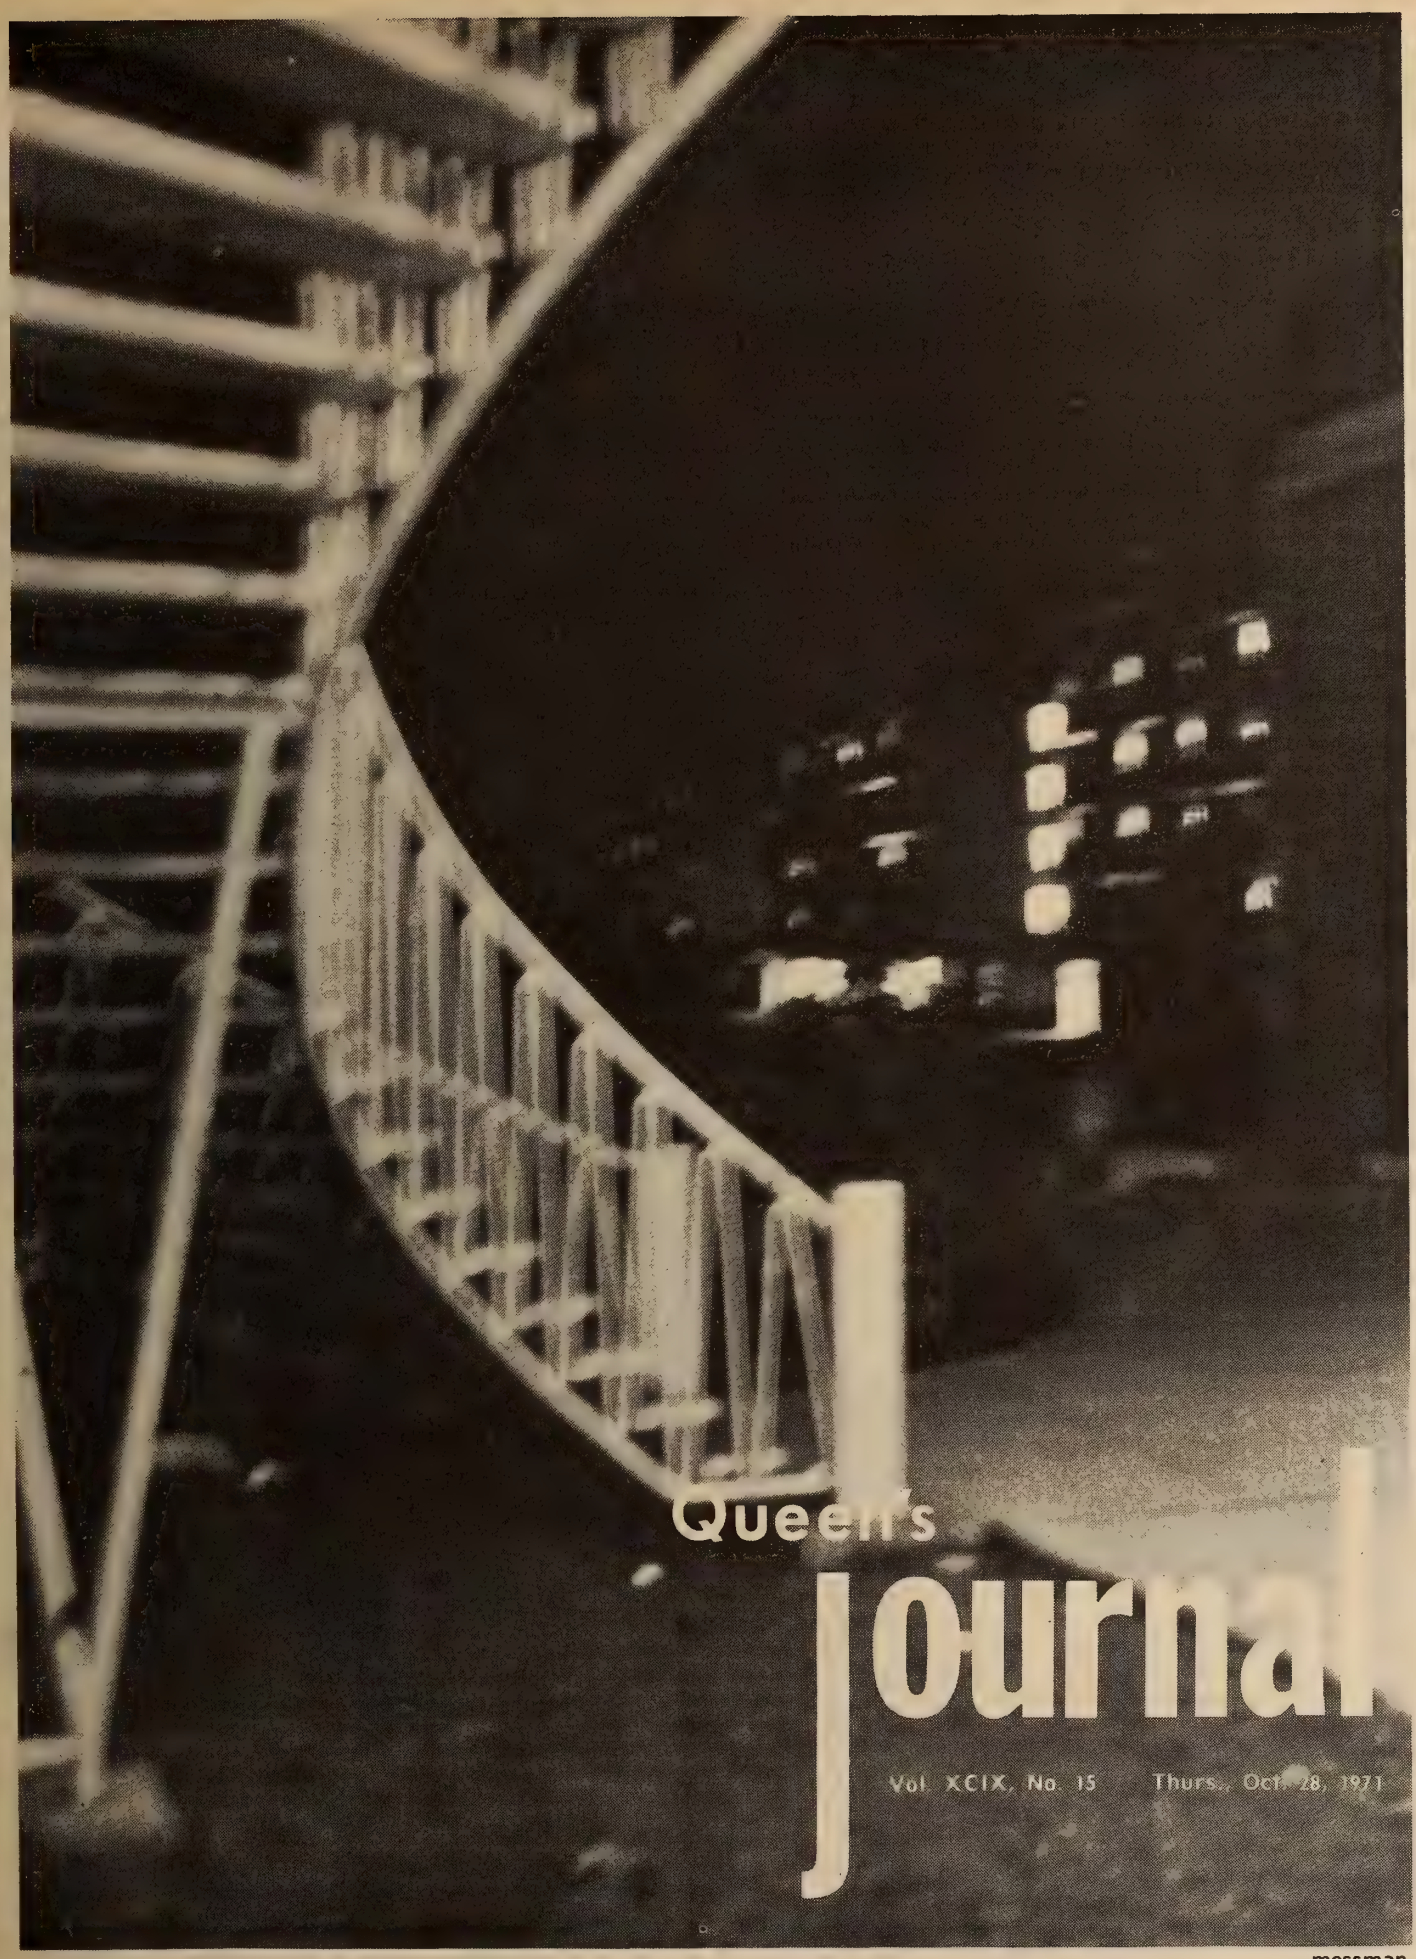
"I am still in the middle of my work," Brandt told his cabinet after receiving the plaudits of the world and a standing ovation in the Bundestag (lower house). The 57-year-old leader said he accepted the award with "deep emotion and great gratitude."

The awarding of the Peace Prize to Brandt crowns West German's emergence from the shadows of Nazi aggression to the role of European peacemaker.

When he came to power in 1969 as the first Socialist chancellor in West German history, Brandt immediately broke with the political tradition of his conservative predecessors by proceeding to acknowledge the division of Germany into two states and the loss of former German lands to Russia and Poland after the last war.

WASHINGTON - Panamanian officials report that the United States virtually has agreed to give Panama sovereignty over the Panama Canal, although operation of the waterway will remain under U.S. control.

State Department spokesman Charles W. Bray confirmed Tuesday that negotiationon a new Panama Canal treaty were progressing well. But Bray also pointed out that "a number of key issues remain to be decided."



However, negotiations for Panama delcared most major issues were already decided.

INDIA - India mobilized its military reserve Saturday to strengthen its forces along its borders with Pakistan, where both countries have massed their troops in a show of force.

An Indian defence ministry spokesman said all army reservists and air force and navy reservists with specialized skills were being called to active duty.

Amchitka protest planned

A group of Queen's students met recently and agreed to join the protests which are going on across Canada against the scheduled Amchitka nuclear test.

Late in October, the United States plans to test a 5-megaton anti-ballistic missile warhead on Amchitka Island, one of the Aleutian islands which lie west of Alaska toward the Soviet Union.

The proposed blast has roused a number of Canadian protests, partly because of a similar test two years ago, made despite border protests and an objection from the Canadian government. The 1971 test has brought out protestors in Vancouver (ten thousand of them), Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal, and the governments of Canada and Japan have complained as well.

A meeting in Macdonald Hall heard several students describe the proposed test, its possible environmental effects, and possible ways to protest it.

Helen Bradbury of the biology department spoke about the test's possible geological and biological effects. She pointed out that besides local and short-term effects the Amchitka blast could have a long-term influence on the ecological balance of the Pacific Ocean.

Law student Howard Cohen, who with Dave Walker, also a law student, organixed the meeting, spoke about the reasons for the test. He said it was a test of a defence system which he considered to be obsolete already.

Students at the meeting decided they should do something to show their disapproval of the Amchitka blast. But since the test's date is still uncertain, it was agreed that the first effort should be to inform students on what the Amchitka explosion actually is and how it affects Canada.

Therefore, a leaflet was planned at a second meeting, held early last week; it will be distributed on campus this week. The protest group also agreed to publicize its activities in The Journal.

Athletic budgets argued at AMS meeting

The AMS executive held its annual roast-the-jocks session Monday night, questioning athletics staff about their facilities and budget, and narrowly turning down a proposal to ask that "training table" -- $10,000 worth of free meals for athletes -- be abolished.

Most of the comments the executive members made were about the athletic budget. Several members said they were upset about the "large part" of the $167,000 athletics budget which goes to men's intercollegiate sports, and the smaller share which pays for recreational sports and intramurals.

The budget breakdown is as follows: Men's intercollegiate $102,784
Recreation 16,447
Women's intramurals 3,170
Men's intramurals 5,400
Women's intercollegiate 39,000

Victor Bradley, AMS vice-president, moved that the AMS reject the idea of the training table as "prejudicial in favour of athletes". He pointed out that students who participate in government, drama, journalism and so on are not subsidized for meals.

Bradley added that he questioned the validity of intercollegiate activities.

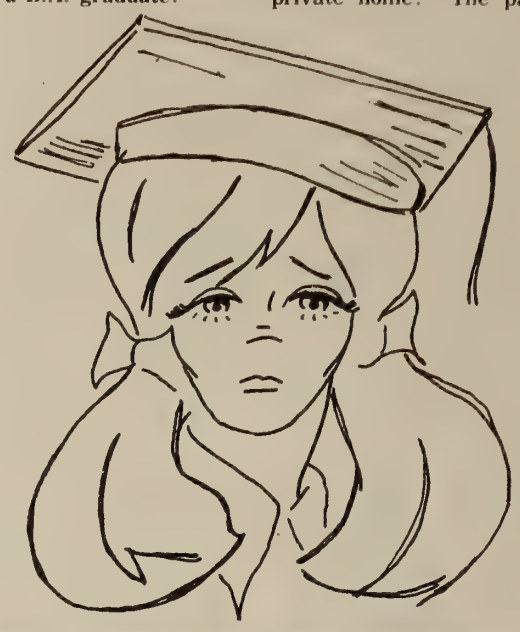
The motion was defeated after considerable heated debate. But speaker Paul Kennedy announced later that, since the vote had been taken while the meeting was in committee of the whole, he had allowed several non-executive members to vote. Kennedy said he would have to consider his ruling later; the result of the vote is therefore in doubt. '(Bradley, saying that he thought he could win the vote among executive members, indicated that he would raise the question again.)

Later in the meeting, the AMS dissociated itself from athletics by striking athletic clubs out of its club-grant budget and urging them to seek financial help from the recreation office of the phys ed complex.

In other action, the AMS
- approved, after lengthy debate, seven club constitutions, including one for the Fun Club, whose purpose, artsci representative Kathy McSweeney explained, is "to have fun" at things which don't cost money. The AMS granted them $200 for this purpose.

- debated, and finally tabled to consider later, a pay raise for AMS constables.

- adjourned without getting around to a discussion of Queen's Student Agencies.



Counselling service never leaves you blue

by Robin J. Nunn

Susan Q. was always sucha happy, well-adjusted girl. She'd bounce around campus with a bright, sparkling smile, her long silken hair flowing in the breeze. Her mother thought she was the sweetest daughter in the world -- she always did just what she was told. As for her father, well, he just couldn't stop boasting about her at the office. She had the highest marks in her class and was the most popular girl in residence. Susan was even a talented musician and well-rounded athlete. Everyone thought,"- Susan has life by the tail," so to speak. Everyone, that is, but Susan.

Oh, she liked being popular and all that, and being all those other things. But she'd be graduating next year and was worried to the last bitten fingernail about what she'd do afterwards. All through high school they had painted rosy pictures covered in parties and dollar signs about those years at university. "The best years of your life," they said.

But "Is that all there is?" said Susan. "I mean, does it all stop there, all of a sudden?"Susan was very, very bewildered. The shrinking job market was no light in the distance, either. Where could Susan turn? Who could help? All of her friends were in the same predicament; they had a hard enough time getting summer jobs. Who wanted u B.A. graduate?

Fortunately for Susan, it was Tuesday. The Journal is published on Tuesdays. Reading carefully through the exciting articles in The Journal (Susan really was a good girl!) she found the following piece on the newly-formed Student Counselling Service:

When you go into 165 University Avenue, your first reaction may be, "I thought this was a counselling service, not a private home!" The panelled walls and soon-to-be-acquired carpeting and furniture are comfortably different from the previous business-office atmosphere in Watson Hall where the SCS was situated last year.

Downstairs are a number of people areas where meetings will happen, and where hopefully people will just happen to be if one needs them. There is always someone in the kitchen rapping over coffee, knocking over coffee, or discussing the plight of mankind.

If you're interested in the services of the SCS go upstairs and see the receptionist. She will gladly explain what services are offered and make arrangements for you to get involved.

Individual counselling is always available for any social or personal problems. There is a full-time counsellor, as well as other professional counsellors, professors and psychologists with whom you may make appointments.

Vocational counselling is used by a large number of students who are bewildered by the shrinking job market and growing job competition. Individual and group testing is available to provide information about interests, aptitudes and abilities to help you choose a career.

There are also several "self-help" programmes for personal discovery and improvement. One of them is a study skills programme or perhaps the reading skills programme can help. Vocabulary, comprehension and rate can be tested and improved as you work throuth the exercises.

Speaking of studying and exams, are you ever tense? Are your muscles relaxed right now? The SCS has a new relaxation training programme where the user increases his awareness of certain muscle groups by tensing and relaxing exercises. Complete relaxation aids in eliminating the effects of anxiety. The sessions take only an hour or two once in a while, and do a great deal to increase body awareness.

A basic interpersonal relations course provides the opportunity to learn to relate openly to others, to be freer in personal interactions. The creative problem solving programme consists of five one-hour sessions with an instructor who leads the participants through group and individual exercises involving basic ideas of creative problem solving.

For anxiety concerns, nervous habits and irritating mannerisms, you might inquire about the behaviour modification programme, which uses techniques of experimental psychology to correct such problems. There is

Queen's runs all year round, submission claims

Queen's is a year-round university: that was the message university leaders took to the Ontario government on Tuesday, when Queen's had its annual hearing before the legislature's Committee on University Affairs.

Responding to increasing popular opinion that the university should hold a session in the summer to use its buildings on a 12-month basis, the Queen's brief said university space is utilized about 91 per cent of the time on a year-round basis.

It pointed out that office space, which amounts to 20 per cent of all floor space in the university, is used every month of the year, and that research laboratories (16 per cent) have heavier use in the summer than at other times, when faculty members are free to do their own research and supervise graduate students' projects.

Undergraduate space is used an average of seven-ninths of the time, the brief said, since it serves 2600 "full-time" equivalent" students during the summer -- about a third of the enrollment during the eight-month winter term.

The report commented that space use figures to not really show active in the university is, either in summer or in winter.

"Informal contacts between students and staff may occur in the campus pub as well as in the faculty member's office or in the corridors," it said.

"We believe that the more events held on university premises the better. Sense of community is something we have been lucky enough to enjoy over many years and we shall continue to foster it in every way possible."

Such miscellaneous uses of the university buildings include evening speakers, films and meetings, the report said, as well as athletic and social events.

Conferences bring more than 200 people a day to the campus from May through August, the university's brief said. In addition, faculty members and graduate students are active on the campus. Faculty have to do research for which there is no time during the school year, the brief said, and to supervise graduate students' work, as well as carrying on the administrative work which takes much of the time of some professors. Senate and faculty committees meet year round, the brief pointed out.

The large majority of professors stay in Kingston all summer, the brief summarized, and this is borne out by records of the library and the computing centre. Library circulation to faculty is almost as heavy in the summer as every other time; and use of the computing centre is higher from April through November than during the other half of the year.

The conclusion reached by the brief was that it is not necessarily desirable to change the university's cyclical year significantly.

"Education is not unique in being cyclical," it said, pointing out the cycles of farming and in automobile manufacturing.

"Intellectual progress requires periods of intense concentration alternated with periods of reflection, discussion and diversion."

Year-round operation of the university was endorsed by Monday night's AMS executive meeting as well, in a different context.

That student government session was considering the fees charged in the summer for undergraduate use of the physical education facilities at Queen's.

The executive voted that, in its opinion, intramural undergraduates are students year-round, entitled to use university facilities in the summer as well as the winter.

This past summer several hundred students were on campus either working in Kingston (often for the university itself) or relaxing part of the summer an taking six-week courses during the summer school session.

There were some nonacademic facilities for them, including an address directory published by the AMS, but most services were closed except during the six-week summer session.

Commerce pick rep.

Commerce students have chosen third-year student Glen Wakabayashi as the first student representative to the commerce faculty board.

As faculty board representative, Wakabayashi said he hopes to provide better communication between students and faculty. He promised to make sure that issues students consider important are raised at faculty board.

"More power should be granted to students by the faculty board," Wakabayashi said.

He suggested that pre-registration be allowed in commerce so that students could choose their courses more carefully. Fewer mathematics courses should be required, he said, since they are not necessary in such fields as marketing and industrial relations.

"The commerce curriculum is too programmed," Wakabayashi said, adding that he thinks there is not enough opportunity to take courses from other faculties.

Money shortage described

Queen's repeated its financial laments when university officers met Tuesday with the province's Committee on University Affairs, the body which recommends to the Ontario legislature how much money universities will get.

In its annual meeting with the committee, the Queen's delegation, led by principal Dr. John J. Deutsch, said the university wants to keep its educational programme at its present quality, despite rising costs and decreasing government support.

Last year the increase in government support was 6 per cent (based on the Basic Income Unit, an artificial figure representing one artsci student or one-sixth of a medical student). This year it rose by 4.85 per cent; and next year's increase will be 2 per cent, considerably less than the increase in the cost of living. Hence the university's income is falling behind what it has to spend.

(The Basic Income Unit this year is $1730.)

To deal with the reduction in the amount of money available, a special university committee has recommeended that the university budget be cut by $743,000 (out of about $32.1 million).

But, the university's presentation to the committee said, "real cuts in administrative and central services cannot continue year after year without beginning to affect seriously the services which faculty and students require."

One immediate effect of the university's stringency programme will be smaller pay increases for faculty members, as well as greatly reduced hiring and major cutbacks in the number of sabbatical leaves allowed.

Classes may also be bigger, and professors could have to teach more hours, if it becomes necessary to keep the faculty at its present size, or to decrease it as professors retire or move away.

Biology head lauds dept.

Queen's University is "the best in Canada in the field of plant physiology and the field of biochemistry", not "second rate", biology department head Dr. B. N. Smallman has told The Journal.

The "second rate" charge was made against most Canadian university biology departments, by Dr. Peter Larkin of the University of British Columbia. Larkin said recently that very few Canadian universities have any real potential in biological research.

Larkin was co-author of a report for the Science Council of Canada, in which he stressed the need for more emphasis on biological science to face the growing challenges of population growth and pollution.

Smallman said, however, that Queen's is not "bush league". The flow of research grants into the department, to a total of $300,000 last year, shows the high confidence which sources of funding have in the department, he said. This is twice what biology department operations cost Queen's last year, Smallman said. He concluded that Queen's must be one of the "few" Larkin meant which has "real potential in basic biological research".

Rating biology departments is a risky business, Smallman said, since there are many branches of biology and a department could be outstanding in some areas and not remarkable in others.

Smallman said he agreed with one point made by Larkin: that the federal government should pay close attention to quality when research funds are being allotted, so that money goes to the research centres which will put them to the best use.

St. Patrick turns over in his grave

Orangemen may park in some of the green parking zone until further notice, the university has announced.

Some space intended for construction, south of Miller Hall, is now available for parking. Although it is in the green zone geographically, the heaviest parking demand is for orange permits and orange parking places.

Accordingly, half the parking lot south of Miller Hall has been designated an orange zone.

The university's announcement emphasized that the designation is temporary, lasting only until construction starts on the addition to Miller Hall.

AMCHITKA- more nuclea

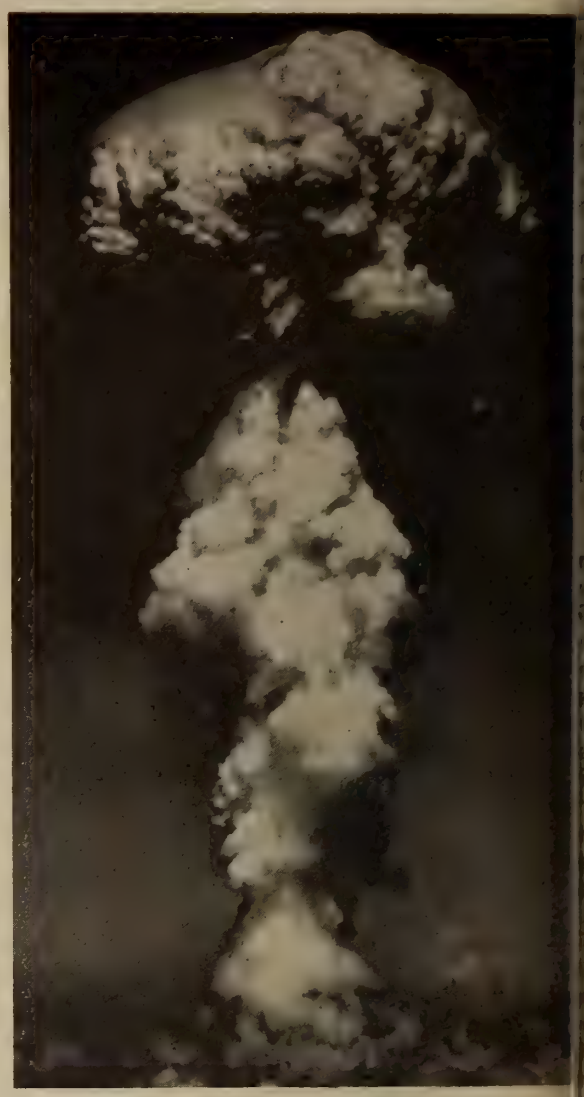
Towards the end of October or early November, the world will witness the detonation of a 5 megaton nuclear bomb beneath the island of Amchitka off the Alaskan coast.

The last Amchitka test, conducted in 1969, was followed by a severe earthquake in Asia and a quake of somewhat milder proportions in California. As reported in the editorial page of the New York Times on August 2, 1971, the possible ramifications of the pending test, which will be five times larger than the earlier one, are essentially three-fold:

1. The contamination of the surrounding waters with consequent damage to commercially valuable fisheries.
2. If venting should occur as it has in some Nevada underground tests, radiation would escape into the atmosphere.
3. Possible triggering of an earthquake which might in turn produce a disastrous tidal wave.

The American government's decision to press forward with the Amchitka Test has incurred the wrath of people in numerous countries. Visible protest, however, has taken place primarily in Japan, Canada and the Western United States. On September 24, in Vancouver, almost 3,000 people blocked the U.S. border crossing. On the same day, 1,200 students from Burnaby B.C. marched more than 5 miles to the American consulate, and subsequently, on the sixth of October, over 10,000 Vancouver students gathered at the U.S. Embassy to protest the Amchitka A-bomb. In a bold action to dramatize public opposition to the impending test, a group of scientists and peace-niks have launched a fishing boat (The Greenpeace) into the North Pacific near Amchitka Island. In the likely event this symbolic gesture of protest fails to impress those accountable for the blast, then the Greenpeace will be used to test the water and atmosphere for results harmful to the ecology of the area. (It should be noted that the ship had great difficulty getting underway. Federal government officials threatened to cancel the vessel's insurance and fishing licence qualifications. Coincidentally though, Prime Minister Trudeau has expressed sympathy for the expedition in the wake of vociferous protest activities.) In addition to student protest, opposition to the test has come from labour organizations, community groups, municipal bodies and even the Vancouver Real Estate Board.

Curiously enough, opposition to the test in areas not immediately adjacent to the blast area (Ontario and Que. etc.) has been dismally weak at best. Is this a local issue that only seriously effects the people living close to the St. Andreas fault or does the prospect of this blast raise the spectre of numerous other and perhaps more significant issues that are not readily apparent to the rest of the population? In order to answer the larger question it is necessary to examine the purported purpose of the Amchitka Test, and to analyse the nature of the America Political system and its junior partner here in Canada.



Ostensibly, the Amchitka test is a major step in the process of deploying the Anti-Ballistic Missile Defence System (ABM) in the United States. Paradoxically however, the ABM will have little more than a limited value in the face of an onslaught of Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles (ICBM). According to the arithmetic of megamurder, the effectiveness of the ABM, as stated by U.S. authorities, will be to possibly preserve 30 million lives from the 120 millions that will perish in the event of an all-out first strike. Needless to say, if the second-strike doesn't take care of the human residue from the initial assault, the fall-out will. Furthermore, nuclear scientists are immersed in technical polemics as to whether it makes any sense to use high-yield warheads for the ABM. Many contend that the brand of war-head that the Amchitak test would produce could saturate the atmosphere with radioactivity and knock out the radar interception system on which the ABM is totally dependent.

The predominant reason, however, for the negligable utility of ABM is the colossal and unrelenting technological pace that has given birth to such entities, as MIRV, FOB's, and the SS-9. MIRV or Multiple-Independently Targeted - Re-entry Vehicles are ingenious little nuclear devices that can be mounted on the tip of ICBM's. When the missile reaches a designated point, three or more warheads will leave the booster and then proceed to three different and pre-determined targets. Not only would the ABM be unable to destroy the 2nd and 3rd warheads, but it is also possible to conceive of a situation where enough MIRV's could saturate the AMB's defences before the bulk of the opponents firepower had been delivered. No wonder the Office of Science and Technology in the U.S. believes that Spartan warhead for the ABM is obsolete and not worth testing.

In addition to the technical absurdity of constructing a useless animal, the building of the ABM also represents an unnecessary and threatening proliferation of the nuclear arms race at a time when prospects for detente between the superpowers are increasingly hopeful. American threats to the possible achievement of a stabilizing balance of fire-power between the two contenders is by no means peculiar to the decison to erect ABM. Indeed, it has been a basic American policy, initiated in the Truman years and most notably espoused by John Foster Dulles, to deal with opponents from a preponderant 'position of strength'. Within this context, any development of Soviet weapons is perceived as a threat against American military superiority and therefore it must be met by a hardware response of overwhelming proportions. The danger of this underlying assumption of U.S. foreign policy is of course exacerbated by the uncertainty that ABM creates vis a vis the effectiveness of opposing forces to penetrate the opponents defences. Without certainty as to mutual destructive capability, deterrence will fail, creating the possibility of upsetting the fragile balance of terror, according to the Rand Corp's nuclear theorists.

It should also be noted that the mutual suspicion and anxiety created by ABM has already turned the (SALT) Strategic Arms Limitations Talks into a fraud. SALT once held out the possibility of bilateral control and regulation of the arms race. Now both sides are using SALT as a mere 'sop' thrown out to world opinion, which shamefully conceals the real and feverish nature of the arms race.

Given the volitile and de-stabilizing nature of ABM, and its nebulous rationality, is it conceivable that there is a reason for the American government ding this thing? Pause for a moment and consider following. The economy of the United States, by he richest in the history of the world, spends 80 n dollars a year (three-quarters of the national get) on weapons and military hardware such as omb shortly to be tested at Amchitka. Estimates e cost of ABM system already run as high as 50 n. As I.F. Stone has pointed out in his Bi-Weekly, the past five years the military, with its in- ial and scientific allies has worked to make V and ABM a fait-accompli." When questions of rity' are concerned, spending for the military es first priority. Just as President Nixon ex- ned to the Senate; I will not hesitate, "to take 12 n in funds appropriated by Congress for tals, sewers, food" and put them in escrow. ever, when Hubert Humphrey suggested a stop be o the arms race by embargoing the present year's s, the proposal was met by gasps of horror.

deed it would be sheer hypocrisy to look at the ent and long-run prospects for American ism and overlook the fact that the U.S. ntially is comprised of a militarized economy. 65 cents of every American tax dollar is spent for ary purposes. The constant bogey of communist ession and the threat to the 'free-world' is still d by cold-war politicians to keep Pax-Americana uge profits from armaments alive. The cold war er, yet the arms race continues. The drive of the tary-Industrial' complex for power and profits purposely and systematically characterized any cal shift in the international system as poten- threatening if the shift did not fit with the rican national interest and its corresponding view e international arena. Is it not ironic that Gen. D. Eisenhower was among the first to warn of angerous coalition between the military and the trial sector and yet he has stated: "We face a le ideology-global in scope, atheistic in character, ess in purpose and insidious in method...To meet ssfully, there is called for, not so much the ional and transitory sacrifices of crisis, but r those which enable us to carry forward ily, surely, and without complaint the burdens of prolonged and complex struggle..." The un- ored phrase, of course, begs the acquiescence of people in the arms-race and their committed dination to the values and goals of American ty as conceptualized by a small and omnipotent McCarthyite politicians and corporate mandarins could once convince themselves and the Western World of the "ruthless Purpose" of the Eastern bloc. Today, however, any serious analysis renders the foregoing conclusions fallacious. The once monolithic bloc of fragmented polycentric arrangement. Relations between Russian and China have assumed a state of virtually continuous conflict. Tito's Yugoslavia has been free of Russian domination since 1947. Hungary and Czechoslovakia continue to fight for their political independence and to loosen the grip of Russian control. Moreover, the Eastern European states are steadily gravitating toward more traditional alignments with Western Europe.

Rumania, for example, has recently entered into discussions with the Common Market countries.

Perhaps one of the many valid contemporary arguments to refute the plausibility of aggressive revolutionary communism is that raised by men like Maurice Duverger and Erich Fromm who believe that the dream of Lenin has evolved into a tightly centralized, bureaucratic police state, authoritarian in character and conservative by its very nature. Russia seeks mainly to preserve the gains made since 1917 and to not encourage a protracted conflict with the West which would necessarily endanger their future economic viability. In a word, the U.S.S.R. is a status quo nation, with designs no more threatening than any other state of equal size and stature.

If you accept these statements re the Soviet Nation, it would appear that the U.S. government has completely ignored the realities of our time. Just as NATO's an America's unilateral Policeman role in the post-war years may be interpreted as a measure to protect U.S. economic expansion and domestic capitalism, so it may also be seen that American militarism is a calculated effort to perpetuate the fantastic and immoral arrangements that profits by making, selling and constantly revising war materials. In such a world there can be no limit to military budgets and military power. Perhaps that is the reason why the military men on both sides prefer it.

How then do these gargantuan problems affect us in Canada, notwithstanding the obvious interested all people and nations have in strictly limiting the possiblity of a nuclear holocaust? Our situation is made unique by our role as junior partner to the American corporate state. A million dollars a day in arms are shipped from Canada to the U.S. for use against the people of Indochina. Billions of dollars worth of resources - nickel, iron, gas, oil, etc. - go directly into the U.S. war industry.

American control of Canada's economy has made our country an instrumental increment of the U.S. society. Because many Canadians Labour under the erroneous assumption that American investment and foreign ownership is beneficial to Canada's growth, (a percept which has been thoroughly refuted by Melville Watkins, Kari Levitt and others) we have reached the point where the colony of Canada has unconsciously lost control of our affairs and has unwittingly, (save for the indigenous bourgeoisie who get rich from the sell-out) contributed and become immeshed in a society that has developed ideals totally repugnant to a significant sector of Canadian society.

How can Canadians seriously protest the Amchitka Blast, while Canada remains a member of NATO, NORAD and other such cold-war alignments that utilize nuclear weapons? How can Canadians protest the threats of American militarism when 60 percent of the manufacturing resources of this country are owned by U.S. interests? The uncontested Silent Surrender of this nation has gone on since the turn of the century. From the U.S. vantage point Canada is just another country ripe for exploitation in every sense of the word. Rather to assert our collective desires for control of our own economic and political affairs is a universally recognized requisite of a viable nation-state. Canadian assertion of our specific and peculiar identity might serve to disentangle this country from the humiliating relationship between Canada and the U.S. It is a healthy and outward looking Nationalism that should be seriously contemplated and widely encouraged. (This writer would suggest that leadership for an independent Canada should not be left to the same Canadian business types who sold out the land in the first place. A Canadian brand of socialism is preferred as the most viable alternative.)

When we speak of asserting and protecting our identity it should be construed to mean denying the similar and popularly recognized cultural aspects that in large measure are shared with the people of the U.S. On the contrary, the assertion of our particular identity should be the vehicle which would enable us to presevere our desirable differences and hence prevent this country from indentification with objectionable American values.

Contributor honoured

Principal Dr. John J. Deutsch saluted Harry Abramsky's contribution to Queen's at a testimonial dinner last week sponsored by the campus Hillel Foundation.

Abramsky, a Kingston businessman, has for many years assisted students with scholarships and awards, chiefly in the field of physiology. He was a major contributor when the physiology building was erected in 1957.

Addressing more than 200 Kingstonians, Deutsch pointed out that contributors like Abramsky have made Queen's "a leader in the field of medical research". (Queen's will be the site of a $50 million medical complex to be started in a few years.)

He added that the Jewish community has played an important role in the development of Canadian culture and education. The Hillel Foundation, he said, have provided valuable cultural and historic links.

And he mentioned that contributors to Queen's have kept it a privately-operated university. It is to preserve cultural links with the past, Deutsch said, that Queen's has "steadfastly remained private rather than become a state organization."

From the Sidelines ...

Most of the big team sports are moving into their final weeks now, and, as usual Queen's teams are still involved. The football Gaels meet a tough Western ball club here on Saturday in what could well be the first step towards a national title. More about that later. Gavin Reid's rugger teams appear headed towards yet another undefeated season -- they have three games to go, two against, and I quote, "jokes", and the real test against once-beaten U. of T. That game will be held here November 6th, and a good helping of fan support would certainly be in line. Soccer can formally lock up first place in the east by dropping Trent here on Wednesday. By the time you read this, they probably will have. Their opponents from the west (the Central Division) will probably be Laurentian, but we're not sure yet. At any rate, the playoff is scheduled here on Saturday. Be there.

Back to football 'it's not that I dislike rugger or soccer, but I don't know very much about them., and the up-coming playoffs. Western has a strong defensive team, led by linemen Steve Derbyshire and Dan Dulmage (late of McGill) and middle linebacker George Hill. Hill is very quick, and hits hard. Lot like Mike Lambros, actually. Offensively, the 'Stangs show good balance, with flanker Terry Harvey doing most of the catching (26 of 45 total receptions) and halfback Dave Kerr outside running. Fullback Bruce MacRae is their heavy-duty inside runner, and a good screen-pass receiver, and we all know how well the Gaels have been covering screens lately. (That's a hint, boys.) Their weak spots appear to be the offensive line, which has had trouble against good defensive teams, and the defensive backfield (Dunkley struck again). If the Gaels stop getting stupid penalties, and at least half of those collected last Saturday were in that category, I'll say Queen's by a touchdown or better. If not, it could be a toss-up.

There could be some changes in the defensive backfield on Saturday, and frankly, I am inclined to say that there should be. The Gaels' deep umbrella has been punched full of holes by Toronto, and some patches are due. Specifically, the side with Dave Campbell at halfback and Ross Arbuckle at corner has looked rather anemic. Both Toronto's bombs were thrown against this coverage and Arbuckle is a rookie who hasn't seen much running coming his way. Western likes to run wide sweeps and quick pitches, and a corner can have his hands full under those conditions. Possible replacements would include Brian Casey and Gil LaBine, both of whom are good hitters with football sense. Otherwise, the Gaels had better be prepared to stuff Harvey before he gets off the line - Stefanko doesn't throw often, but he has the best completion percentage in the league, and Harvey catches most of them.

Looking beyond the Western game, there are a number of possibilities. If Queen's wins and Ottawa wins, then we play Ottawa in the final game here, on Nov. 6th. If we win and McMaster upsets Ottawa (actually, I don't think it would be that big an upset), then we will travel to sunny Hamilton to play the Marauders. If, after that game we are still on top, the mass exodus to Halifax can begin. If CNR will give us a train, it could be a good trip.

Queen's backfielders Brian Warrender and Gord McLellan turned out to be the golddust twins when league scoring and rushing stats were released here Wednesday. Warrender led the entire OUAA in rushing with 809 yards while McLellan finished second with 720 yards. Both players had a record-breaking twelve touchdowns, one better than the old mark set in 1958. Fullback Dave Hadden rounded out the ground game with 477 yards.

On Amchitka, radioactive fish, tidal waves and earthquakes are just a test blast away

When and if (?) the United States conducts its mightiest nuclear test ever sometime late in October or early in November, the ecological results could be catastrophic.

The bomb, with an explosive power of 5 megatons, will be detonated at the bottom of a 6200-foot hole on Amchitka Island and will create a shock wave about equal to a 7.0 earthquake-reading on the Richter scale. The explosion will produce a cavity about the length of two football fields which will contain the radioactivity produced by the bomb for 1,000 years, at least according to a statement of environmental effects produced by the American Atomic Energy Commission (AEC). However, at a public hearing on the test held in Alaska, Dr. Jerold Lowenstein, an associate clinical professor of medicine at the radioactivity research Centre at the University of Califnroia, noted:

"We are told that nearly all the fission and fusion products from this proposed 5-megaton 'event' will be contained far underground. Admittedly some tritium and other long-lived isotopes will be dissolved in the groundwater and find their way to sea, but thanks to the magic of dilution in an infinite ocean, these concentrations will immediately drop to negligeable levels! Never mind that some aquatic organisms can concentrate radioactive zinc or cobalt by factors of a hundred thousand or a million! Never mind about the findings of Polikarpov, who has shown that very low concentrations of strontium-90 cause abnormalities - especiallly in the spinal cords - of developing fish eggs.

"In his book Radioecology of Aquatic Organisms, Polikarpov concluded that 'further radioactive contamination of the seas and oceans is inadmissible, because it entails great risk of

(a) producing irreversible changes in the hydrobiosphere,

(b) disrupting the resources upon which the fisheries depend,

(c) producing dangerous levels of contamination in the marine organisms consumed by man.

To avoid these radiation consequences, it is essential to end all nuclear weapons tests and the dumping of liquid and solid radioactive waste into the seas and oceans.' Radioactivity is cumulative, and its effects on human and other life are slow to emerge. The only cure is prevention, and the time to start is now!"

The AEC has also noted that there is "an unlikely possibility" that the water in the cavity created by the blast might flow through a system of interconnecting rock fractures, coming to the surface in two or three years and introducing into the ocean concentrations of radioactivity 1,200 times the level considered safe. This process could continue for 130 years. The AEC suggests that the possibility of this happening is slight and that the damage it could cause if it did would also not be too severe.

People are upset because this test is a hostile act against the environment in a time of rising environmental concern.

However, Amchitka Island lies in an area which is used extensively for commercial fishing, particularily for salmon fishing. Testifying at a public hearing in Anchorage, Alaska, US Senator Mike Gravel commented:

"The risk of error is taken seriously by Alaskans and others who have an enormous economic stake in the resources of the sea. In these days when the nation is deeply concerned about mercury poisoning, and the market for seafood products has fallen off sharply, even the suspicion that radioactive water is leaking to the surface could devastate the market for all fishery species of the North Pacific.

"It is not at all certain that radioactive waste is diluted by seawater. Radioactivity reconcentrates in seafood. Those who dumped mercury told us it was safely diluted; but now we find that larger fish concentrate mercury at levels dangerous for those who eat them. Comparatively, certain radio-nuclides have fabulously greater reconcentration features in the food chain."

Nor is it possible to place much faith in the predictions of the AEC on what the likely results of the test will be, as Gravel pointed out at the hearings:

"One may accept without question the AEC's assurances that all will go well. But all too often, such forecasts have not been borne out by circumstances.

"Last December 18, Project BANEBERRY was detonated at the Nevada Test Site. The earth at that location had an unexpectedly high water content. The explosion ruptured the ground and sent radioactivity spewing over many states, contaminating hundreds of workers.

"Project Longshot, the 60 kiloton test conducted at Amchitka in 1965, was not expected to leak radioactivity for hundreds of years. But only a few months after the test, radioactivity had surfaced in at least two small fresh-water ponds.

"The AEC did not expect its 1964 test in Mississippi to cause $600,000.00 in property damage.

"The AEC did not expect its 800-kiloton test in January, 1968, in central Nevada, to rock as wide an area as from Salt Lake City in the east to San Francisco in the west - but it did!"

The severest risks from the nuclear test arise out of the possibility that the blast might touch off earthquake activity and perhaps accompanying tidal waves. A committee of eminent scientists, brought together by the President's Office of Science and Technology to consider the questions of safety relating to underground testing, concluded:

"The Panel is seriously concerned with the problem of earthquakes resulting from large-yield nuclear tests. Small earthquakes do actually occur both immediately after a large-yield test explosion and in the following weeks. The largest of the observed associated aftershocks have been between one and two magnitudes less than the explosion itself. However, there does not appear to be any basis for eliminating the possibility that a large test explosion might induce, either immediately or after a period of time, a severe earthquake of sufficiently large magnitude to cause serious damage well beyond the limits of the test site."

Now it so happens that Amchitka Island lies in one of the most seismically unstable regions on earth. Suppose there is an imminent earthquake very near Amchitka, for which CANNIKIN is the trigger. The confident arguments of the AEC regarding containment of radioactive wastes are not based upon such a contingency! The movement of unsuspected subsurface faults could provide these wastes with a passage to the surface.

Nor is this the only danger. Large subterranean earthquakes often give rise to huge, destructive "tidal waves" known as "tsunamis". Tsunamis resulting from natural earthquakes in the Aleutians have caused extensive damage as far away as California and Hawaii. Most of the deaths resulting from the terrible Alaska earthquake of March 17, 1964 were caused by sea waves generated by the earthquake, rather than the earthquake itself. Quoting again from Senator Gravel's testimony:

"A vast body of scientific opinion views the earthquake itself as a triggering mechanism. The great Alaska earthquake of 1964 began with a shock of about 6.5 and triggered itself to a peak of 8.4 The Aleutian Islands earthquake of September 11, 1969 began with a shock measured at 5.2 and peaked at 6.6

To go ahead with this test is courting a risk of magnitude we cannot determine. Alaskans and the people who live along the Pacific Rim should not be asked to accept such a risk for so questionable a purpose.

"CANNIKIN (the Amchitka test) may provide a trigger of between 6.8 and 7.2 What type of energy can be released with that kind of trigger? Non one knows.

"We may discover that the predictions of the AEC will be borne out. I would say, in all fairness, that the odds are on that side. The possibility of an accident is only that - a possibility, not a probability. But the risk is there because the test is a gamble with the unknown.

"And suppose there is an accident, a mistake. Would CANNIKAN'S 7 point Richter scale reading, combined with a 7 point natural earthquake, remain a 'harmless' 7 point event?

"At 7 points on the Richter scale we are already courting the birth of a tsunami wave. If 7 and 7 add up to 7.5, such a wave is a certaintiy; the AECS own literature lists 7.5 as the level of shock at which a dangerous Tsunami is certain to occur!

"And, keep in mind, the Alaska test site was developed only because the planned explosions were found to be too big and too dangerous for Nevada."

On top of the possible problems from eathquakes, tidal waves, and radioactivity released into the ocean, conservationists are also concerned that the shock of the blast and radiation could damage the wildlife of the island, which includes sea otters, seals, sea lions and two rare birds, the American bald eagle and the Peregrine Falcon.

Moreover, the people of the islands, the Aleuts, have become concerned that this and previous testing will cause them to suffer numerous ill effects. Already, as a result of earlier testing, the delicate ecological balance of the northern food chain has been disturbed and many Eskimos and Indians of the north carry radioactivity to a level well above that of people in the mainland US.

Dr. Lowenstein perhaps summed up the dangers best: "People are upset because this test is a hostile act against the environment in a time of rising environmental concern.

"It will add to the radiation burden of life on earth and in the ocean.

"It is a massive military gesture at a time when the people of the U.S. are hungry for peace and searching for alternatives to nuclear war.

"It is an insult to native island peoples resentful of having their interests considered as secondary to those of the testing powers."

Whether or not the Amchitka test goes ahead now depends on President Nixon as a result of passage of a Senate bill authorizing funds for the AEC which stipulates that no funds shall be obligated or expended for the test blast "unless the President gives his direct approval for such a test."

To date, Nixon has not announced any decision of the fate of the test. The world is waiting.

Four cases for AMS court

The AMS court will be faced with at least four cases when its justices are appointed.

All four cases involve assaults on AMS constables. One is a holdover from the party held in the Union on the last day of classes last April; a student is charged with hitting a constable after he was prevented from carrying beer from room to room.

The second case occurred at the Queen's-Carleton game here October 2, which, according to constable Terry Flahiff, was "the roughest event this fall". Flahiff said he was assaulted by a student whom he asked to get rid of a beer bottle the student had been carrying.

There was a similar assault on a constable at the homecoming football game October 16, when a student was prevented from coming into Richardson Stadium by the visitors' gate at the west side of the field.

The fourth case arises from the homecoming speakeasy the same week; again, a constable was struck by a drunk student.

The speakeasy was closed down an hour early by the constables on duty, after a number of students threw beer bottles and lighted cigarettes at waiters and constables, and refused to leave when asked.

Chief constable Glen Agar told The Journal that despite these incidents -- the first to come before the AMS court in almost two years-- it has been relatively good year for student behaviour.

Agar said, "The student community at large is understanding more and more that they must maintain a mature behaviour as adults."

He stressed that the constables' policy is to reason with students, avoiding unnecessary use of force.

Graduate student Leo Hutchinson, chief constable from 1968 to 1970 and a senior constable this year, said he was nevertheless alarmed about the assaults and the tomato- and bottle-throwing which has taken place at football games.

These incidents, have only one precedent, Hutchinson said: the events of Horrorama during Snowball Week in 1969.

Students throwing beer bottles and old records destroyed a $400 movie screen in Dunning Hall auditorium and did considerable other damage to Dunning and Ellis Halls. Half a dozen students were charged in AMS court as a result of the horror show, and fined heavily. The all-night horror movie event was discontinued as a result.

Agar has pointed out that, as shown by that precedent, constables have the authority to close down any student event at which they cannot keep order.

The ghosts of old loves and the goblins of midterm exams haunt Queen's at Hallowe'en. Trick-or-treating in Kingston will happen Saturday evening, the city council has decided.

Pep rally

The Bands and the Golden Gaels will be at a pep rally beginning at 7:30 p.m. tonight on the Outer Field. Tomorrow's game starts at 1 p.m.; the parade leads off from Victoria Hall at noon.

Meeting held on coed res

The "ask yourself" flyer about coed residences, which was circulated in women's residence on Monday, contains many inaccuracies, coed residence committee chairman Doug Romans said Tuesday night at a general meeting of residence-dwellers.

And he told The Journal later that the mimeographed flyer, which is subtitled "Proposal on Co-ed Residence: Some Pros and Cons", tells only the unfavourable side of the story.

Both Romans and women's residence president Cindy Davidson said they did not know where the flyer came from. It is signed just "A Concerned Resident".

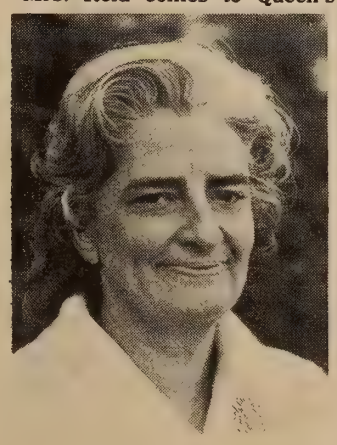
The flyer contrasts facilities in Victoria Hall and Gordon-Brockington Houses, as they now are, with the arrangements which will exist if the coed residence proposal is adopted. But, Romans told Tuesday night's meeting, some of its statements are incorrect.

For example, he said, it is not true that there will be no night men in coed residence.

Romans said women are not being railroaded into voting for coed residence. They are free to vote for or against the proposal in the referendum on it next week, he said.

The referendum date will be set Friday night by a joint meeting of the Inter-Residence Council and the Women's Residence Council. The IRC and WRC are meeting then to try and agree on the details of a proposal to bring to referendum.

At Tuesday night's meeting, held in Leonard cafeteria, Romans began the discussion with a short history of the coed residence proposal. The study committee was set up, he said after a proposal by Alma Mater Society president Patrick Riley was sent to the IRC and the WRC last spring. The current report was prepared during the summer and made final in September (with some additions very recently). It was approved by the WRC last Monday and first



The delay is the result of a request by the IRC to hear details of how coed residence works at other universities, Romans said. As of Tuesday night information had been received from four Ontario universities; only one of them allows first-year women into coed residence, he said. Freshette participation is a major part of the proposal which is being considered at Queen's, and the only totally new idea. '(There are several coed living areas at present, including the McArthur residences and the Science 44 Co-op, but none of them admit freshettes.)

New dean of women takes office

The new dean of women, Mrs. Evelyn Reid, took office Monday and is settling into her new position this week.

Mrs. Reid comes to Queen's from Columbia University, New York, but is originally a native of Ontario, and has worked at McGill university in Montreal, Nova Scotia, the University of Saskatchewan, and the University of Toronto.

Mrs. Evelyn Reid

Her husband the Rev. Douglas Reid, died last year.

Mrs. Reid succeeds Mrs. Beatrice Bryce, who has been dean of women since 1959 -- the year Chown Hall was opened.

In 1959 there were no open hours; houses stood on the site of Victoria Hall. The enrollment of Queen's was less than half what it is today. Women students were members of the Levana Society, not of the ASUS; they studied arts or, if they were exceptional and had five years to spare, nursing science.

By contrast, Mrs. Reid finds a residence system whose biggest controversy is the establishment of a coed residence project, and a university close to reaching its goal of 10,000 students enrolled.

Since university senate meetings were opened to the public two years ago, the visitors' gallery has only been full once.

That was at the meeting February 26, 1970, when the special committee on the Chuck Edwards affair was presenting its controversial report.

The 35 students seats were filled on one other occasion, also at the height of the Edwards affair, but that time the ten faculty seats were empty.

Figures presented in the agenda of today's senate meeting show that students have been more enthusiastic about attending meetings than faculty have been.

Aside from the Edwards case regular and special meetings, the largest attendance for students was at the January 1969 regular meeting, the first during academic term when visitors were admitted.

That meeting had 23 student visitors.

There have been no other meetings at which the number of students in the gallery went into two digits. By comparison, the number of faculty visitors exceeded two only during the Edwards affair.

Commerce 75 chooses head

Carl Lavoie has been elected president of Commerce 75 for the coming year.

Lavoie is an active participant in campus life, having already become involved in Bews football and in residence activities (he lives in Morris Hall).

With 162 men and women in first-year commerce, Lavoie plans to weld Commerce 75 together into an active unit which will be remembered on campus for many years.

He said his job will be easy, because his class already is putting a real effort into commerce activities. Commerce 75 built the Commerce Society float for the homecoming parade, Lavoie said.

considered by the IRC two days later.

One question raised concerned residence fees. The proposal is that women would pay the same fees no matter what residence they lived in, and that men in coed Victoria Hall would pay the same fee as men on Leonard Field, but not receive the maid service which is provided in the other men's residences.

Romans said he thought the better accommodations in Victoria Hall, including common rooms and laundry rooms, would offset the loss of maid service.

The proposal does not imply a rise in residence fees, Romans stated. The money to pay for modifying Gordon-Brockington washrooms to suit women would come from the accumulated earnings of the men's residence system, he said -- the same fund that pays for normal repainting and refurnishing of men's residences.

After the meeting there was a tour of Gordon-Brockington for women, to let them see the accommodation they would be voting on. Some women said they were surprised to find Gordon-Brockington in better condition than rumour claims. A similar tour for men was led through parts of Victoria Hall.

Enrollment figures given

The enrollment figures carried in Tuesday's Journal differ considerably from figures issued this week by the registrar's office. Apparently the difference came from misinterpretation statistics.

Following are the October 10 preliminary enrollment statistics, in detail, as issued by the registrar's office.

Staff asks to form union

Employees of the Queen's public relations department have applied for certification as a local of the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

If the certification is granted, it would be the fourth labour union on campus. CUPE local 1302 includes non-professional employees of the library system, while the Canadian Labour Congress has two on-campus locals: local 229 represents maintenance workers and local 254 represents technicians.

The bargaining unit at public relations has five members: PR director Larry Moore, information officer Brian Flynn, two secretaries, and former information officer Cathy Perkins, who is still on the payroll but is in exile from the department after recent staff conflicts.

All members of the unit except Miss Perkins supported the application. A hearing on whether the unit should be granted union status will be held by the Ontario Labour Relations Board in Toronto November 18.

Moore said the major issues involved in the staff's application for union status do not include salaries.

He was chiefly concerned with the status of support staff (non-academic employee) of the university, he said. He pointed out that they have no voice in university government, and said representation on the university senate might be appropriate.

Moore said the recent report on grievance and discipline, whose recommendations were adopted by the senate last month, did not improve the ambiguous position which support staff have.

They are sometimes treated unfairly by the university, he said. "If they're going to run this place like Shell Oil, the employees are going to start acting like employees of Shell Oil," he said.

Vice-principal (development and information) James M. Courtright, to whom the public relations department is responsible, was a vice-president of the Shell Oil Company of Canada until he came to Queen's last year.

There has been tension between public relations staff and Courtright since soon after his arrival, Miss Perkins told The Journal, as well as discord within the department.

An example of the discord is that Miss Perkins, who moved out of her office last week after a confrontation with Moore, was not told ot the unionization application until The Journal asked for her comments Wednesday evening.

University personnel director Bill Wright said it would not be appropriate for him to comment on the application while it was pending before the Labour Relations Board.

Wright was the university's chief negotiator with CUPE when a contract settlement with the non-professional library staff was being worked out last spring.

Learning groups fizzle

By Jennifer Grass

The programmed of student learning groups in first year arts and science, set up last February, has been discontinued this year.

Learning groups were supposed to reduce the impersonality which results from large first-year classes and the fragmentation that comes from unrelated courses in a first-year programme. Students with at least three courses in common were placed together in small groups with the aim of integrating information coming from many directions. They might help students learn to use the library, do research, study, and write essays according to the committee which originally proposed them.

But these aims were too ambitious, according to Dr. Clint Lougheed, associate dean of arts and science. The learning groups did not actually fail, he said, but they are in the process of "evolving into something".

"The interdisciplinary nature of the groups was perhaps too demanding for first-year students," Lougheed told The Journal.

Alan Broadbent, graduate student, rector of Queen's and leader of one of last spring's groups, said the project had two major problems. It failed to capture the interest of many students because it was started so late in the year, Broadbent said. And, more significant, there was lack of motivation: it is difficult to get students to put effort into a project when it offers no academic credit of the kind students are conditioned to throughout their school careers.

Broadbent said he hoped to introduce a series of seminars on various topics at Elrond College next year. They would be open to all students, not just those in first year, he said, but would have something in common with the learning-group idea.

Lougheed said the arts and science faculty board would be considering at its November meeting a motion to set up learning groups of a different kind. They would be based on a particular subject area, announced in advance so students could prepare for them, and would have the same interdisciplinary scope as last year's attempts.

Speaking of the new proposal, Lougheed said, "I do not guarantee that the motion will be successful, but I am hopeful."

A French Canadian monologue

What've the unions ever done?

The following is a translation of a monologue which was recorded on Polydor records by French Canadian comedian Yvon Deschamps. It was translated by Prof. S. E. Peterson from a transcription which was being used in the Public Service Commission's French language training programme to acquaint civil servants with Quebec French. He felt that it portrays not only a humorous but also accurate picture of a French Canadian. "When I heard it (the recording), I felt I knew this man. He used to be our neighbour when my family and I lived in Montreal North. They occupied a three room flat in the triplex-part of the basement. I being an up and coming English speaking middle management type naturally occupied the whole main floor. My neighbour drove a truck for the city.

"At the time that I first heard this work, I was in the middle of Pierre Valliere's Les Negres Blancs de l'Amerique du Nord and I felt that my former neighbour had something to do with Vallieres book (or vice versa). In the belief that it might be helpful if more Anglos could make his acquaintance, I have attempted to translate the spirit of the man."

No, but it's true y'know, when ya think about it - the unions - what've they ever done? They've done nothin'. It's true, you know.

You've got a union down at the shop, you guys?

You don't have one.

Y'know, I've worked for fifteen years down at the shop. It's been 15 years 'n' we never had a union. What'eve they ever done? We got no union but that didn't stop us from gettin' the 54 hour week last year 'n' y'know, we get a holiday at Christmas 'n' New Year's too, 'n' in summer we get a week's paid vacation.

We don't always take it but we got it all the same.

Y'know, I mightn't look it, but some weeks I make sixty, sixty-two, sixty-three bucks, 'n' you add to that the overtime - I can get as much as seventy-three bucks...not clear...

Y'know, when I left school I was thirteen 'n' my old man, he was in his bed dyin', 'n' he said, "My boy, I got nothin' to leave you."

Well, I didn't doubt that a bit the way the ol' man drank.

He said, "Just this before I go - I want to tell you that in life there's two things that count.

"A steady job and a good boss.

"All this God-damn union crap, what's it get you?

"A steady job an' a good boss."

'n then he was gone.

So I set about gettin' myself hired down at the shop. I said to 'em, "That job that you advertised, that's a steady job, eh?" They said sure. "Oh boy," I says, "You're sure goin' t'be a good boss!"

Well sire, I sure wasn't mistaken. If I'd ever had to find a boss smarter 'n that, I never could've done it.

One time my wife too sick, all of a sudden, 'n' when the hospital telephoned it was around two o'clock, two-fifteen, 'n' so it was the boss who took the call. He comes to see me and says, "You're wife has taken sick all of a sudden - they've taken her back," he says. "Now look here. Don't upset yourself about it, just act as though it was nothin'. Keep on with your work. If there's anythin', I'll let y'know."

Now it ain't every boss who would've done that.

Well along about a quarter to six, ten to six, he comes to see my 'n says, "I think you'd better go to see your wife in the hospital."

"O.K.", I said, "boss. But I don't finish until six."

He says, "That don't matter. I'll punch out for you, you'll only lose a minute."

Well sir, I'll never forget that, no sir, I'll never forget that day, that's for sure. I got to the hospital, ah, it was aroun' half past six, twenty-five to seven. There was a big black nurse there, she says, "I think you've come too late."

I says, "How's that?"

"Well," she says, "your wife went about ten to six-quarter to six."

"Well, says I, "did she go straight home? Did she leave a message?"

She says, "You don't understand me. She is gone."

I says, "yoi, yoi, yoi. Scram out of here you!"

Oh Jesus, she sure went quick.

There weren't nothin' for it but to go home.

When I got home the kid was bawlin' per usual, so I give him his bread and butter and then his glass of milk and then I didn't feel so good. I don't know why, but I didn't feel so good. But the kid, y'know, he could sure see that there was something out of whack. He ain't big but he's no fool, so he comes towards me 'n' he looks at me with his big fish eyes 'n' he says, "What's the matter poppa?"

"Shut up kid, shut up eh! Scram! Get into bed!"

I can tell you I was in no mood to be pestered by a little brat like that.

But it's not his fault, eh! He don't understand. He's too small. He's just a little guy. He's really small, y'know. He's three years old but he only looks two anahaf. He's growin' fast all the same. Y'know, he's already gone through the shoes that his Mother bought for him for Christmas.

Well, y'know, after a while when I saw that the kid was alseep I went walkin'. Just walkin' all over the place 'n' then it came to me why I wasn't feelin' GOOD. I said to myself, "Holy Christ, how's the boss gonna take this?"

Well he took it pretty good. He didn't cry at all, not a tear. Then you know, at the burial, he was there.

My brother-in-law wouldn't believe me. I said to him, "Listen Bud, I know my boss. If he can come, he'll come." And by God he came. Yes sir, he was really there.

My God, supposin' it was me that was lyin' there?

But him, he was right there. He'd put on his dark suit, his grey hat, he was rigged out like he was goin' to a weddin'. He was there, really there, 'n' not ashamed at all. He looked everybody right in the face. He was there. He looked y'know, like he was sayin', "Look at me! Look at me! I'm not ashamed to be here! I'm not ashamed of him there."

(That was me who was there.)

But when everything was all over, well, he even took me by the arm, 'n' says, "Hey, hey, come on now. What's the use of mopein'? Come on along, let's go to work."

So we went to the shop - both of us together 'n' he went there too. Yea, 'n' when we got there nobody'd taken the time to change or nothin' 'n' then we got to work. Me - I was workin' and him, he was lookin' at me. I dunno, you might have thought that he knew that there was something goin' on. He stayed with me all afternoon - never left me. 'N' me, I worked like a good 'un and him, he looks at me like a good'un and me, I was real happy that he was there.

But him, he was a little upset because there was a big job that had to get out that night but when I'd finished my job around ten to eight, five to eight, before leavin', I says, "Boss, I don't know how to thank you."

'N' he says, "Don't worry about it, what I did for you I'd have done for anybody."

Well, Sunday morning I was sitting on the gallery, on it was about 11:30, me and the little guy. We're there, you see rockin'. Oh no, no, not the little guy. The little guy, he don't rock. He used to rock, but it made him sick.

Then all of a sudden I see comin' at the bottom of the street, yeah, a big '56 plymouth, salmon colored, with the boss inside. He gives two or three honks on the horn, parks his car in front of the door, gets out. Everybody come out on their galleries. The woman next door says, "He sure looks elegant, that man there."

Well, of course I couldn't go back inside, eh, because the place was crawling with people.

But before he went inside he'd been smart, he says, "Maybe this will temp you! If you'd like to play around with it, don't be shy."

Well right away, y'know, I wouldn' dared, y'know, bein' shy. But after that, I said to myself, I says, "Well, if he said to do what I want it's because he wants me to do what I want. If he hadn't wanted me to do it, he would've said so."

So I started up the lawnmower 'n' I mowed a small piece of the lawn 'n' finally I mowed all the lawn.

But I gathered it all up, y'know. Oh yeah, I gathered it all up. I put it in a plastic bag which was on the side of the lawnmower. When the boss came out, oh, around four-thirty, I tell you I'd done the job so good that he didn't notice nothin'.

Because he came out again, y'know, this guy. He just left all his pals inside there to come on out and have a beer with me.

He gave me it 'n' says, "You'll have to excuse me but I've only got one cold one left."

Well, it was the end of the afternoon you see, we was stretched out there, me 'n' the boss and we're sippin' our pint bottles of beer peaceful like. Him, he takes his pint a cold beer 'n' me, I take my pint a warm beer.

Ah, I've never been happy like that before in my life. I had some kind of stomach ache. Warm beer don't agree with me.

Then all of a sudden the boss he gives me a deuce and says, "Ah, you'll have to find your way home again on the bus. My friends are staying to supper so I can't drive you back again."

"O.K.", I says, "boss, no trouble. Before leavin' I'd like to tell you how..."

He says, "No time! No time! There's the bus!"

So I left runnin' but before gettin' on the bus, I turned aroun' 'n' gave a holler to him, "Hey, boss! What've the Unions Ever Done?"

I says, "Yeah, I think so. That's my boss."

Well, he was wearin' his scotch plaid bermuda shorts, he had on a shirt and socks which went with the car, he shooed away the little monsters who were playin' around and he comes t'ward the gallery.

He says, "Would you like to come to the country with me?"

Well I tell ya, I didn't lose any time, no sir. I took the little guy, I went inside the house, I locked the door so that nothin' would happen an' then away in the car, 'n' the boss says, "Put some newspapers on the front seat so it don't get dirty. Come and sit beside me."

But I says, "Boss, it's today's La Patrie!"

He says, "Doesn't matter if it gets torn, it's for my wife."

So I took the newaper which was in the back seat 'n' I put it on the front seat so's I wouldn't get it dirty and then the two of us took off. Yeah, like men, I'll tell ya!

Well, I've never seen the like of it. That was a real car. It had everythin'. It had a big motor, a big transmission, a big hi-fi radio, big mirrors on the sides, a small box of kleenex, seats covered in white leatherette with transparent plastic over top.

Pretty soon we arrived at his camp at Pine Beach. I just stared at the baby. It wasn't a camp. It was a mansion! No foolin! Yeah, a great big house in natural stone in all colors like I'd never seen before in my life with plastic awnings and aluminum windows and aluminum door with flamingos in a big lawn - not a tree on it - full of small animals cut by hand from plywood and then all around the lawn some pretty little white rocks all the same size.

So he takes me around to the side of the house and he shows me his new lawnmower and it was some baby, too. He got it started, y'know, just to show me how it worked, 'n' then he goes back inside the house.

Public funds used to hush up US opposition to Amchitka

BY GORDON EDWARDS

Senator Mike Gravel has charged the Atomic Energy Commission with squandering public funds on massive propoganda campaigns designed to stifle opposition to the two Amchitka nuclear tests code-named MILROW (1969) and CANNIKIN (1971).

He cited a number of examples to substantiate his charges:

1. Before the public hearings held in May of this year concerning the 1971 test, glamorous all-expense trips to Las Begas were financed by the AEC for Alaska State officials and legislators;

2. Movies were produced and shown widely, publications were prepared and distributed by the thousands, and public relations headquarters were set up in an expensive hotel suite in Anchorage (where the hearings were scheduled to be held).

3. At the hearings themselves the only ones testifying in favor of the test were AEC officials who had been flown in; those opposed to the test had to pay their own way, and the AEC refused to make transcripts available "because of the expense";

4. Before the MILROW test, a party of AEC public relations men toured Alaska to discredit those who opposed the test; Gravel has a tape recording of the comments of one of these men "which completely distorts the position of those opposing the test, and infers quite strongly that such opposition is Communist inspired."

Acting on a request by Senator Gravel, the U.S. General Accounting Office uncovered a secret report confirming the fact that the AEC has engaged in illegitimate public relations tactics to "sell" its underground nuclear testing program. However, the GAO pointed out that its authority to prosecute for misuse of funds is strictly limited; it can only do so if funds are used "for publicity or propaganda designed to support or defeat legislation pending before Congress'. In short, GAO's hands are tied, since no legislation is involved.

Throughout the report, which deals with the 1969 test, the AEC describes its public relations activities for MILROW in terms of "good guys" vs "bad guys". Nowhere is there a recognition that opposition to the test may be based on scientific accuracy or that it may be honestly motivated.

Here are some excerpts from the report:

"The Alaskan Office of Information was established in Anchorage on July 14 1969, with instructions to make information about Project MILROW available to the people of Alaska...The activity included meetings with government, civic, and conservationist leaders...talks before Chambers of Commerce, civic and women's groups, appearances on radio and TV, and showing of films...Free exhibit space was obtained at the State's two biggest fairs...AEC movies were shown on a virtually continuous program...thousands of AEC publications were distributed...

"On August 4 and 5 a news media trip to Amchitka was arranged...Fifteen reporters, representing newspapers, radio, TV, and magazines made the trip...The 12-hour trip stretched to more than 40 hours...This worked to AEC's advantage as it provided many hours of extra time for briefings, individual interviews, and becoming better acquainted with the newsmen...Resultant news coverage was favorable to the AEC..."

"A visit to Amchitka by governmental, civic, and conservationist leaders and interested news media was scheduled for Saturday, September 13. About 80 guests made the trip by chartered plane. Briefings were given on the plane en route to Amchitka, on the island, and on the return trip...A representative of Governor Miller was flown to La Vegas...On his return to Alaska, he made a report to the Governor which is believed to have influenced the Governor to continue his support of MILROW..."

"No effective means seemed available to prevent individuals and organizations from getting wide publicity through their attacks on the AEC and its programs...Conceivably, closer personal contact with reporters and editors, and speedy and convincing denials of false statements, could have been advantageous had news media been interested in fully responsible journalism..."

"The fortnight before detonation was the most intensely active of the MILROW public information program...The September 29 briefing of the Alaska State Legislative Council became AEC's most important Alaskan pre-event public forum...Questioning from the Alaskan and Hawaiian legislators ranged from apparently sincere seeking of knowledge and additional information to "loaded" or openly hostile inquiries from members who had publicly opposed the test...It became apparent that a number of the legislators who were listed in the "opposing the test" group were motivated by political considerations...Some Democratic office-holders said privately that they did not "really" oppose MILROW but "went along" with the MILROW - oriented criticism of the Governor as a matter of political expediency."

"The primary opposition expressed to MILROW appeared to be based chiefly on anti-testing, anti-ABM, and anti-establishment ideology, politics, and a desire to get publicity. The opposition leaders curtained their real motives and staged a campaign designed to promote fear - fear of earthquakes, fear of tidal waves, fear of economic damage to the fishing industry, fear of damaging foreign relations, and to a minor extent fear of radioactivity...There appears to be no method for morally or instinctively inspired to voice this opposition have their minds firmly made up, will not listen to facts, arguments, or opposing views, and are determined not to let their minds be changed."

The report implies only bad faith and questionable motives on the part of those who expressed opposition to the test. It accuses Senator Gravel and others of blowing up "items of minor importance from other parts of the world...out of proportion to make anti-test headlines."

It is implied in the report that Karl Armstrong, editor of the Kodiak Mirror, was manipulated by a slick campaign to say what the AEC wanted him to say. "By associating Editor Armstrong with distribution of the sea otter film and setting up the exhibit, providing him with informational materials, and keeping in contact with him by correspondence and telephone, he was converted from a vociferous foe of the AEC and project MILROW to a friend of the AEC...willing to accept and print AEC statements that the Alaskan public would not be endangered." Senator Gravel replies: "I know Karl Armstrong very well. He says what he believes - always - without fear or favor. I resent the inference..."

Marty Farrell, a well-known Anchorage attorney, was opposed to MILROW for a variety of legitimate reasons and was motivated by the highest purposes. The AEC report prefers to slander him with spurious charges: "The reasons motivation for Farrell's activity remain unknown...There was no indication that his opposition was founded on moral or ideological grounds, or that he was actually concerned about the dangers...It appeared conceivable that Farrell was working as a paid representative for a client and spoke as directed rather than from personal convictions."

The report does not confine itself to activities within Alaska, or even within the USA. "The opposition expressed in Hawaii, and the hysterical anti-test campaign in British Columbia and other parts of Canada could be a valuable subject for research. Currently we know little of the motivation or the types or numbers involved. It seems unlikely that the activity in Canada was spontaneous...A study might reveal how the protests were inspired or financed; by whom; whether they resulted from a generally anti-U.S. attitude; or were centred entirely on AEC...Some agency of the U.S. Government should seek to learn the motivation for the MILROW opposition engendered in Canada as a means of judging whether similar opposition is likely in the future, and perhaps to find means to counteract such opposition!

On September 15, 1971, Gravel issued a statement which included these comments: "It is degrading to people in Alaska and California and Hawaii...who oppose underground testing to have their efforts dismissed and ridiculed...with tax dollars by an agency of the Federal Government...The opposition has only the strength of its convictions to support its campaign...

"The investigation...confirms my worst suspicions about the dangerous attitude within the Agency which discounts all legitimate criticism of its programs...

"The AEC propaganda effort was explained in detail in the report; explained, justified, and virtually institutionalized by publication of a How-To-Do-It manual for 'next time'. 'Next time' is here. The CANNIKIN test is scheduled for next month, and the AEC is selling again - on a larger scale than ever before.

"I just don't about young people these days...they talk about changing the world before it's too late . . . don't they realize that things just don't happen overnight?!..."

Amchitka is on!

Wednesday, the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission announced that President Nixon has agreed that the Amchitka test should go ahead as planned. The blast will take place sometime next week, and there is only a slim chance this decision can be reversed by court order.

The decision to go ahead with the much opposed blast was made because just too much money, about $200 million, has been spent on the test so far, and also because the cold of the approaching winter could damage the existing preparations causing them to be wasted.

The Canadian government was informed of the decision just two hours before the official announcement, and a phone call from Mitchell Sharp protesting the decision was answered by US Secretary of State Rogers, who said that the decision was irreversible.

Bews News

By Ross Feldman

The Bews competition warmed up this week with the conclusion of the regular season for the outdoor sports and the beginning of playoffs in rugger, soccer and football. Participation in the championship rounds is almost exclusively dominated by Law and Commerce units with Economics providing the only Arts representation, (in Football and Rugger).

This week's activities were highlighed by the decisive re-emergence of PHE teams (from 5th place), which dominated the intramural track and field meet and also swept the team championship of the Harrier -- the traditional 2½ mile jaunt around the Glen Lawrence Golf Club. About 215 entrants finished the cross-country run which was won by Peter Verhoeven with a time of 13:21.

But perhaps the most action was generated off the field at an emergency MIAC meeting Wednesday, convened to discuss the council's unprecedented decision to accept six late entries to the volleyball league. The concern was touched off by the fact that PHE was one of the teams involved. In the end the entrants were allowed (the season is already in progress); however, no participation points are to be awarded to the latecomers.

Next week will see the beginning of doubles squash and doubles paddleball, as well as the start of the hockey season. So remember fans, if you can't play a sport, play a piano.

Oh, That Defense

By Ron Pratt

Most hockey coaches would be overjoyed to have the high-scoring returnees Bob Carnegie has in camp. Morris Mott, Colin Loudon, and Murray Douglas head the list that includes Stan Galt, Bob Kindon, Doug Barton, John Smith, and goaltender Clyde Harris. Carnegie's woes start at the blue line. Only Graham Closs returns from last years' crew, and while he possesses good speed and can move the puck well, there is a major rebuilding job ahead if the Gaels are to improve on last year. This lack of defense experience was clearly reflected in the 7-5 score of Tuesday night's intrasquad game. Rookie winger Dave Nuttal scored three times for the Blacks, with team captain Morris Mott and rookie Bill White adding two each. First year man Don Cameron pumped in two goals for the Golds, with singles coming from Murray Douglas, Doug Barton, and Tim Bryant.

Despite this abundance of pointscorers, there could be problems, particularly in replacing all-star Dave Field, who has run out of eligibility. Carnegie has shifted soph forward Mike Lynch back to the blueline, and his agressiveness, strength and strong shot could be a big help, while rookie Rick Chown hasn't looked out of place. After that, pray for a thaw.

Returnee Clyde Harris gives the Gaels excellent work in goal as long as he's healthy, but the depth is gone; rookies Bill Minnis and Al Brown are adequate, but lack game experience. If Harris is hurt, the Gaels could be in big trouble.

In spite of the woes from the blueline back, the Gaels should be an exciting, powerful club, and a contender even in the much stronger OUAA. Mott, Loudin, Douglas, Kindon and Barton are guaranteed goal scorers, and the power play could be awesome. Combined with Harris' winning tradition (he has yet to play for a club which missed the playoffs) and good goaltending, the Gaels will give every one a lot of headaches. If the defense can jell soon enough, they may prove that last year's resurgence was more than coincidence.

Here Come The Mustangs

By Dave Cameron

On Saturday afternoon the Gaels play what hopefully will be their first of four playoff games. This week the opponents will be the Western Mustangs, who finished first in the Western Division of the OUAA. Actually, they finished the season tied with the Windsor Lancers (both had 5-3 records) but the Mustangs get the nod because of the point difference between the teams.

The traditional strongpoint of the Western team has been defence, and this year is no different. Tackles Steve Derbyshire (64) and Dan Dulmage (63), middle linebacker George Hill, and defensive half Dave Clarke (24) form the nucleus of the defence. Derbyshire and Hill had tryouts at the Ottawa Rough Rider training camp, and Dulmage and Clarke have been drafted by other CFL teams, so they look like a tough foursome. (For anyone interested, Hill and Derbyshire were OQAA All-Stars last year.)

Western's offence is spearheaded by quarterback Steve Stefanko, probably the league's best backup quarterback. First stringer Joe Fabiani has been hurting this year (much like previous years) and his availability is questionable. Stefanko, by the way, is the leading passer of the Western Conference of the OUAA. The two other persons to watch on offence are halfback Dave Kerr, who has over 500 yards rushing this year, and flanker Terry Harvey, who is the west's leading pass receiver. Not to be forgotten is the leading scorer in the west, punter and place-kicker Paul Knill.

The Gaels are going to have to play well once again this week against the Mustangs. The offence will have its work cut out for it against the tough Western defence, but don't be surprised if they put on a strong performance. The last couple of games have seen a marked improvement in the Queen's passing game. With Taylor throwing the ball better than earlier in the season, the deep threat of Stu Lang, who will be back in the lineup this week, and John Hollingsworth is always present. If Taylor can open up the passing game against Western, our ground attack should be able to finish the job. Brian Warrender and Gord McLellan, each with a share of the OUAA scoring record under his belt, are healthy, and either of them (or both) can pile up 100-plus yards any time they feel so inclined. Can't forget Dave Hadden either. So the key to cracking the Western defence should be more of the balanced offence which the Gaels have been displaying throughout the last couple of ball games.

Defensively, the Gaels are obviously, after the Varsity games, going to have to be on the lookout for the pass, perhaps even the occasion shotgun formation (can't think where we've seen that before) from quarterback Stefanko and the Mustang offence. They have had plenty of practice on it, however, and should look a bit better. Stefanko is a good passer, but he isn't a Wayne Dunkley. And with people like Doug Cozac and Mike Lambros in the defensive secondary (each has collected 5 interceptions this year) his inclinations to pass could easily backfire.

The game all comes down to a battle between the Gaels' offence and the Western defence. Whoever wins this battle will win the game. I'm picking the Gaels. Remember, game time is 1:00 p.m. on Saturday. It should be a good one.

Gaels Meet Laurentian in Soccer Playoff

Perhaps 4-0 was a sufficiently humiliating defeat to hand out to a team that had travelled all the way from Peterborough. To do them more damage would have spoilt their trip home, and Mein Hosts, Lohman, Robertson, Pipe and Co. doubtless had this in mind during the second half of the game against Trent. Had it not been for no-nonsense Spiro Kanellos setting up an embarrassingly easy shot for Rob Prince, the score might have remained 3-0 as it was at the half. Nobody can guess what the score might have been had Queen's continued to play as they had in the first half, for Trent rarely ventured out of their end in the second.

Below: Action against Trent Wednesday Afternoon.

Playing their best football of the season, Queen's outclassed their opponents in the first half. Captain Gerry Birks provided a solid last line of defence, and Mac Murray and Stan Taylor turned in strong games, as did Joe Golini, who, moving up in attack in the twenty-second minute, unleashed a powerhouse drive that surely would have split the net had it not hit a defender. Queen's first goal, a header from Gord Taylor came a minute later. It was perhaps the prettiest goal of the year, as Taylor, high in the air, delicately turned a strong cross pass from Zeffiro into the distant top corner of the net.

Ten minutes later Davie Robertson skilfully tapped a deflected header at waist height over his shoulder and into the net. The score, Queen's 2, Trent 0, after 33 minutes of play was a true reflection of the efficiency and determination of Queen's play. Wing forwards Robertson and Prince were playing exciting football, and speedster Gord Taylor was displaying his best form yet.. Andy Piotrowski, who can be deceptively fast (when he wants to be), also turned in a good game, and when, just three minutes from half-time, G. Taylor was fouled in the penalty box, he took the kick, and made no mistake of it.

With their victory Queen's became official winners of the East soccer division. They finished with 10 points, ahead of Carleton (C) with 9, and Trent (T) with 5. Ottawa (O) brought up the rear with 0 points. This Saturday at 2 p.m. they may meet their first real opposition in the OUAA semi-final with Laurentian , (whose soccer team is considerably better than their football team.) The only previous encounter of Queen's with Laurentian was in '69, when Queen's won a Central Canada play-off game, so, if you find the price of football tickets prohibitive, come and watch the soccer (and keep up with the football score at the same time). And if you are going to the football, have a look over to the soccer field .

WINNIPEG - About 350 students Tuesday voted to continue a strike for non-compulsory classes at West Kildonen Collegiate Institute.

They voted to strike at least until the end of this week and to try to organize a Friday rally of thousands of students from across Winnipeg.

The West Kildonan students have been boycotting classes since Monday. They say it is their right to be able to choose whether they attend classes and that they struck because the Seven Oaks School Board has refused to deal with their request for non-compulsory classes.

The rest of the school's 680 students have been attending classes, although noisy meetings of the strikers have caused disruptions, including cancellation of some classes.

At a general assembly yesterday the students rejected a school board proposal that they go back to their classes while the board negotiates with the province to have changes made in the School Attendance Act. The vote was 355 to 215.

Under the School Attendance Act, school-aged children must be enrolled in a school until age 16 and anyone enrolled over that age must also attend regularly or quit.

QUEBEC - The Union Nationale has officially changed its name to Unite-Quebec.

Party leader Gabriel Loubier said Monday the decision to rename the party was made during the weekend at a meeting of the party's executive.

TORONTO - Riot-trained, mounted Metro police Monday night charged four times into a crowd of about 3,500 persons gathered across from the Ontario Science Centre to protest Soviet Premier Alexei Kosygin's visit to Canada.

While Kosygin was assuring a blue-chip gathering of the Canadian Manufacturers Association that he was "deeply satisfied" with his Canadian trip, East European and Jewish protesters were sent scrambling from under the hooves of horses spurred into their midst.

Although no one was seriously injured during the melee, police laid 20 charges of causing a distrubance, assaulting police and obstructing police.

The demonstration was the second violent incident during Kosygin's eight-day tour of Canada which ended with his departure for Cuba this morning.

Attorney-General Allan Lawrence has asked for a report from Metro Police Commission on allegations of police brutality in the arrests Monday of persons demonstrating against Soviet Premier Alexei Kosygin outside the Ontario Science Centre.

GUELPH - The existing method of killing seals during the annual fall hunt in the Gulf of St. Lawrence is the most efficient and humane known, says Dr. Keith Ronald, chairman of the federal Department of Environment's special committee on seals and sealing.

Dr. Ronald, dean of the University of Guelph's college of biological science said the seal hunt "is controlled more tightly than any other hunting system in the world."

He added that "there is nothing to approach the control system used by the Government," which includes the way the animal is killed, handled and taken off the ice.

The committee met Saturday in Guelph to draft its first report since it was formed last April.

OTTAWA - The federal-provincial conference on the economy has been moved ahead to Nov. 15, 16, and 17, Prime Minister Trudeau told the House of Commons Monday.

The conference had originally been scheduled for Dec. 6, 7 and 8 after the several premiers rejected a meeting early in the fall.

TORONTO - Medicine is run by and for doctors who are accountable to no one but themselves while the consumer "mute and powerless", sufferes in inconveinence and pain, a University of Toronto economist charged Tuesday.

Prof. J. McLeod said laymen representing other professions such as law and engineering, consumers' groups and labour unions should be appointed to the Ontario Council of Health, a senior advisory body to the health minister.

A public defender or ombudsman to investigate patients' complaints, physicians deprived of hospital privileges and other problems should be appointed.

TORONTO - The world's tallest building - a 140-storey office tower - has been planned for the site of a parking lot next to the T. Eaton Co. store on College St. at Yonge.

Plans for the $120 million building were unveiled Wednesday at the International Building Exhibition, a gathering of builders, architects, structural engineers and specification writers at the CNE.

The building , a 1,650-foot-high triangle of concrete, steel and glass would have rounded corners to reduce the effect of winds that could reach 120 miles an hour at the top.

OTTAWA - Highway accidents claimed 2,087 lives in Canada during the first six months of this year, an increase of two over the same period last year.

Quebec, with 18 fewer deaths this year, still had the most traffic deaths, 681. Ontario was second with 641.

THE WORLD

UNITED NATIONS - This outcome is "a return to reality," the British delegate said, and the vast majority of delegates to the United Nations agreed as they voted by a 76 to 35 margin to give Communist China Taiwan's seat in the United Nations.

Actually, as Mitchell Sharp, Canadian External Affairs Minister noted Tuesday, the day after the vote, "no government was ousted, no country was ousted" by the UN vote. Sharp said that in a strict legal sense, Taiwan had never been a member of the UN. China has always been a member of the UN, and it was simply a "question of who speaks for the country."

The decision to seat so-called Red China instead of the so-called Nationalist China has made the United States extremely angry, since they had been pushing for seating of both Nationalist and Red China in the UN. U.S. ambassador George Bush, who with US secretary of State William Rogers had mounted a furious diplomatic campaign to save Taiwan's seat, called the vote "a moment of infamy." Last Friday, Rogers had assured President Nixon that the US effort would be successful.

Such was the American anger at not getting its way with the international community that the US has threatened to cut back on its financial aid to the UN. The US now contributes about 30 percent of the UN's operating expenses.

Senate Democratic leader Mike Mansfield and Republican leader Hugh Scott have said that Taiwan's ouster "could seriously jeopardize the future financing of the UN by the United States."

Meanwhile, Chinese Premier Chou En-lai and other senior Chinese officials hailed the decision as a "victory for the people of the world" and indicated that their delegate would be coming to the UN as soon as possible.

PAKISTAN - Pakistan claimed Monday night that its forces killed 438 enemy troops Sunday and another 63 yesterday in heavy fighting in East Pakistan.

The enemy involved was identified as "Indians and Indian agents," and the communique said some of the bodies carried identification tags of the Indian Army.

If even approximately correct, casualties in such numbers indicate that fighting has reached its greatest intensity since the brief war fought by India and Pakistan over Kashmir in 1965.

Pakistan did not mention its casualties, but said that Indian shelling of eight East Pakistani villages Monday killed 67 villagers.

MANILA - An outlaw band killed 17 soldiers and wounded 22 who were rushing to reinforce an embattled detachment in a southern Philippine town Monday the constabulary reported.

A colonel said the reinforcements were called to Magsaysay in Lanao del Norte, about 495 miles southeast of Manila, after an undetermined number of outlaws, believed to be Moslems, attacked the military outpost there just before dawn.

Lanao has been wracked with violence since July, mostly because of political differences, and disputes between Christians and Moslems.

WASHINGTON For those who don't plan ahead, the "morning-after" pill.

The use of the morning after pill to prevent pregnancy has proved 100 percent effective in 1,000 women who voluntarily participated in a study of the medication, described in the current issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association.

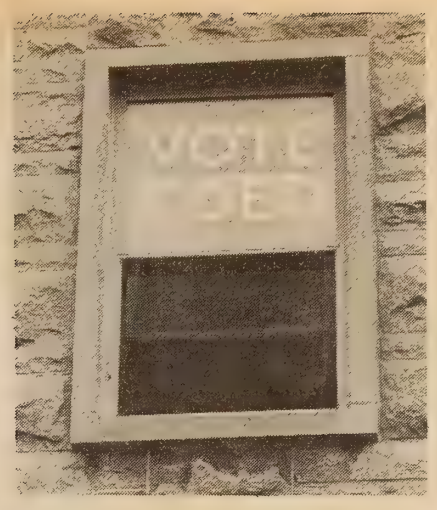
The report says that although at least 40 pregnancies might have been expected in the group of 1,000 - which had not had contraceptive protection during intercourse - there were no pregnancies.

Patients began taking two pills a day with 72 hours after intercourse and continued to do so for five days. As yet, there have been no indications of any serious side effects from the use of the pill.

NEW YORK - A total of 3,649 Canadian women had legal abortions in New York state last year. A total of 215,453 abortions were performed in the first year of operation of New York's liberalized abortion laws.

BELFAST - Mobs rioted in three Northern Ireland cities and guerrilla gunmen wounded three British soldiers Sunday after a weekend of terror in which five civilians were shot dead by troops.

Political chiefs of the outlawed Irish Republican Army, battling to end Ireland's 50 years of partition, swore vengeance for the killings and cheered as Chief of Staff Sean MacStiofain procalimed: "We are on the offensive in all parts of the North."



In Newry, the border city where British troops killed three young men attempting a bank holdup on Saturday, mobs fired and looted stores and wrecked two mail trucks.

USA - The American blast will take place. See page 5 for details.

COED RES HITS ROADBLOCK

The Women's Residence Council is unable to accept the proposal that Victoria Hall be an integrated residence and Gordon-Brockington Houses à women's residence next year, WRC president Cindy Davidson announced Friday night.

This leaves the proposal, presented last month by a joint committee of the WRC and the Inter-Residence Council, without support from either residence governing body.

A referendum which had been planned for last week, and then postponed till this Thursday, has now been delayed indefinitely, while the coed residence committee, the WRC and the IRC consider whether an alternative proposal would be possible.

The WRC's decision not to endorse the Vic-Gordon-Brockington idea, with which it was happy until early last week, came as the result of the "mock application form" circulated to residence women on Tuesday and Wednesday. That survey showed that while residence women were happy with having coed residences -- in fact, happy with having Victoria Hall integrated -- they were less happy about the Gordon-Brockington facilities available to women who would be displaced by integrating Vic.

In the "mock application", freshettes -- and, for comparison purposes, upper-year women -- were asked what residence they would like to live in next year if the proposal went into effect. The results showed that the traditional residences (Adelaide, Ban Righ and Chown) would easily reach their quotas of upper-year women, and integrated Victoria Hall wold reach its quota or come close.

But hardly anybody wants to live in Gordon-Brockington.

The case against Gordon-Brockington as a women's residence was made in the "Ask Yourself" flyer which was circulated anonymously in women's res on Monday of last week. "Leonard Field is, and will probably continue to be, the traditional ' playground' of Queen's men," that flyer said . It went on to compare study halls, common rooms and washrooms in the two buildings, and concluded, "It won't be the same !!"

The Inter-Residence Council, the student government in the men's residences, had been unhappy about the Victoria-Gordon-Brockington proposal from the beginning, many members feeling that an integrated project involving 360 men and 418 women was too large to begin with.

The IRC asked the coed residence committee to present a less ambitious proposal.

This proposal, presented Friday by committee chairman Doug Romans, is to make Gordon-Brockington itself a coed residence, with 170 women and 182 men, and move the 170 men displaced from Gordon-Brockington into Chown Hall, making it an all-male residence.

Neither IRC nor WRC has made a decision on that proposal yet. It is likely to come up at a joint IRC-WRC meeting scheduled for November 9.

Meanwhile, authorities in women's residence will probably circulate another mock application form, to find out whether women would like to live in a' coed Gordon-Brockington. Gordon-Brockington.

If a plan eventually meets with the approval of both WRC and IRC, a referendum of residence students will be called. Both men and women will have to approve the plan before it can be taken to the Ban Righ Board, the Men's Residences Board, and finally the newly-formed Residence Board. which must give approval before the plan can be put into effect.

Time pressure is on now, since residence budgeting for 1972-73 starts this month and read mission procedures for the residence systems start soon after Christmas.

Friday is the fourth anniversary of the first open hours ever held in women's residence, when men were allowed to visit on Sunday afternoon of Suzie-Q Week, 1967.

Students can help choose chairmen

A senate decision to allow students to become members of search committees for university department heads was finally implemented last Thursday, a full seven months after the decision was made.

At the March senate meeting, the senate originally accepted, a report from its committee on appointment, promotion, tenure and leave on "Procedures to be Adopted in Advising the Principal on the Appointment of Heads of Departments".

It recommended that the search committees, which examine the qualifications of applicants for headship positions, consist of at least three faculty members from departments other than the one concerned; where appropriate, the dean or associate dean of graduate studies; and, " at the discretion of the principal", two faculty members and two students from the department involved.

This final recommendation sparked much debate, and at the May senate meeting a motion came forward from the arts and science faculty board asking that the report's approval be rescinded. The senate decided to delay its implementation until the fall, so that the report could be considered by the faculty boards and by students.

In the end, the issue was not fought extensively in the senate at all. The faculty board of arts and science, which discussed the report two weeks ago, reported their "great concern" on either student or faculty membership on the headship search committees. Their concern was mainly related to the hesitancy faculty members might feel when discussing colleagues in front of students.

The faculty of medicine told the senate that it is "opposed to the inclusion of students or members of faculty in the departments concerned on search committees for heads of departments" in medicine. Neither of these groups has been represented on search committees in the faculty of medicine in the past.

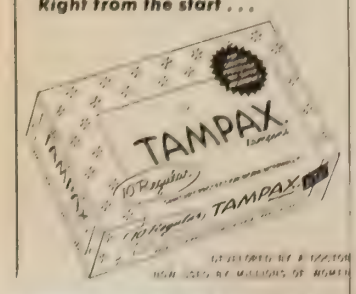
Why is it more women in the world choose Tampax tampons over all other brands of internal sanitary protection combined? First of all, Tampax tampons were developed by a doctor. So naturally you can trust them.

Worn internally, there's nothing to give away your secret. No pins, pads or belts. No odor or chafing. No discomfort.



Tampax tampons are so easy to use, right from the start. Each tampon comes in a hygienic container-applicator. This helps to place it in the proper, comfortable position.

Only Tampax tampons have a moisture-resistant withdrawal cord that is safety-stitched so it won't pull off.

Only Tampax tampons come in 3 absorbency-sizes: Regular, Super and Junior. Is it any wonder women in 118 countries choose Tampax tampons?

Queen's has changed since 'yesterday'

"Queen's, yesterday and today" was the topic which Queen's history professor, and leading Canadian historian, Dr. A. R. M. Lower discussed at a meeting of the Kingston Historical Society October 13.

Looking at the Queen's of today, it is hard to picture the sort of place Lower described.

"Professors were appointed," he said, "on an agreement to spend part of their summer convassing to pay for their own salaries."

"Those were the days," he said later on, "when a professor was a professor! Not lost in the crowd as just another instructor."

According to Lower's figures, Queen's for many years produced more graduates in medicine than in arts. The explanation he later gave was that most people who graduated from the faculty of arts were pretty surely headed for the ministry. This fact tied in with Lower's introduction, in which he commented on the close contact Queen's had for a long time with St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church in Kingston, and with the Presbyterian Church in general.

And Lower seemed dismayed, about the condition of the university today. "Queen's is wandering in a wilderness," he said. "It is not sure why it exists."

Lower observed a lack of values and purpose in the direction of the modern university. It no longer has the "intimate camaraderie" of the Queen's of long ago, he said.

He concluded his speech with a broad overview. Queen's began, the emeritus history professor said, in rented quarters with three professors who "taught everything" to ten students

Considering what Queen's is at present, and what it went through to get that far, Lower said he felt satisfied in commenting that "I have touched on a story of survival."

Snowball put on ice

Another long-standing Queen's tradition is about to be ended. Snowball Variety Night, which has been held in Grant Hall for a number of years (and was the location in fact of Lorne Greene's acting debut), will be held this year on ice in the Jock Harty Arena. The nature of the show will not be changed except that all skits, folksongs, cardtricks, etc., will be performed on skates.

Persons wishing to be MC - or director for this year's Snowball Variety night should give their names (and a brief description of previous experience) to Cathy Maydan, 544-0375, immediately. A useful but not essential prerequisite for the position is an ability to skate.

Auditions of acts for Snowball Variety Night will begin later in November. The organizers regret that any acts involving trained elephants will not be accepted unless the elephants can perform a double axle on skates. For all other acts all that is necessary is the very minimum of skating ability. "Start thinking of acts now," publicity chairman Stewart Searle told The Journal icily, "and be able to tell your grandchildren that you appeared in the first Snowball Variety Night to be held on skates."

Course evaluation study goes to senate committee

Course evaluation and the duties of faculty members will both be studied by senate committees as a result of Thursday's senate meeting.

Course evaluation was referred to the senate committee on academic procedures, which is to consider the methods now being used at Queen's and other universities. It will consider the ways in which course evaluation can be used to improve teaching, to help students choose courses, and to decide what bodies should be responsible for starting and designing course evaulations, communicating the results and proposing new changes.

This study was prompted by discussion, at the September senate meeting, of a recommendation from the special discipline committee, saying that the use of course evaluations should be encouraged. That recommendation was turned down by the senate; many senators were reserved in their support of course evaluation because of the particular evaluation guide produced this year by the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society.

A subcommittee of the committee on appointment, promotion, tenure and leave will examine the duties and responsibilities of faculty members. At a meeting between the Council of Ontario Universities and the government's Committee on University Affairs, several CUA members said that the public, which is becoming critical of how money is spent on education, needs a clarification of just what faculty members do. CUA members challenged the universities on issues such as the nine-month teaching year, over emphasis on research and outside activities, and the large extra incomes some academics earn from outside research.

A report on the subject has been prepared by Queen's vice-principal (finance) David H. Bonham, comparing faculty at Queen's and elsewhere. The subcommittee's study will provide a further look.

AMS conference sees some benefit in tenure

An AMS-sponsored conference on tenure (job security) for professors brought delegates from six universities to McArthur Hall October 23 to discuss the principle of tenure, its method of application and possible alternative systems.

An informal report on the conference, written by AMS president Patrick Riley and distributed Friday, said most delegates left the one-day meeting mentioning that they approved of tenure in some form. "Must be that conservative Kingston air," Riley's report commented.

Tenure is the system used at Queen's and virtually all other north American universities under which a faculty member, after a probationary period normally two years is guaranteed his teaching position until age 65 and cannot be removed except for flagrant incompetence.

"Queen's has one of the highest proportions of tenured staff in Canada," politics professor Dr. Ned Franks told the conference.

The original purpose of tenure was to protect faculty members from political or social pressure, Franks' background paper said.

He pointed out the struggles between universities and European fascists in the 1930's, and between universities and McCarthyite anticommunists in the early 1950's. "Universities in both these periods were subjected to outside pressures to stop the faculty from pursuing their independent course; the fact that tenure existed, and was held to be of value, enabled universities to resist these pressures."

But Franks who was honorary president of the Alma Mater Society last year, went on to state that "in my view...professors are not fulfilling their responsibility as independent critics of society, but rather they have become part of the power structure."

The conference spent much of its time considering whether tenure as it is now applied is the best way to achieve protection for faculty members. "It might well be that a breakdown in the system is at the base of current dissatisfaction with the principle," Riley's report said.

"The problem was seen not so much in terms of how much weight ought to be given to teaching in evaluating a professor, but how to assess the quality of teaching at all," the report said. It also said the conference delegates agreed that a professor's present students, his former students, his colleagues, and outsiders all had useful viewpoints in evaulating how well he teaches.

Late in the day the conference considered alternatives to the tenure system which now exists. One possibility discussed was five-year renewable teaching contracts, so that at the end of the five-year period a poor teacher could be removed. But "the mechanics and committee work involved might not be justified by the return from this activity"; the delegates agreed that "some method to weed out the extremely bad was preferred rather than a sweeping review."

Queen's law professor Donald Carter spoke about the possibility of replacing tenure with collective bargaining as the system of employment agreement for faculty. Even within collective bargaining, Carter said, strong procedural safeguards against arbitrary firing are essential to academic freedom. If such safeguards did not exist, he said, " a faculty member might derive little protection from a union of peers who had passed judgement and turned against him."

Carter added that bilateral dealings between the university and a union of faculty member might shut out student participation in decision-making.

Altogether, Riley's report said. "it was felt that perhaps the most vital problem facing us is to formulate accurate methods of assessing teaching. This would in turn permit the tenure system to work without sheltering poor teachers."

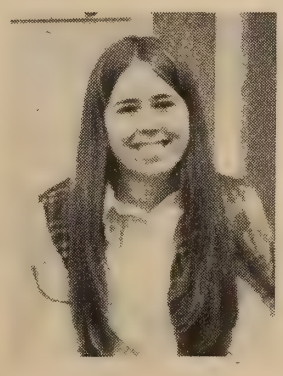
Orientation committee chosen for next year

At least orientation 1972 will be economical. Three of the six members of next year's orientation committee for artsci-nursing rehab are second-year economics students: Ann Dillon, Mary Macdonald and Rick Kingston.

The other three are also members of Artsci 74: Jackie Willson is in geography, Marenca de Bruyn in English, and Jim Thompson in mathematics.

The committee was chosen Thursday night by a committee of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society -- its nine-member executive, plus Nancy Brandt (for the Rehabilitation Therapy Society), Andrea Howard (for the Nursing Science Society), and 1971 orientation coordinator Kathy McSweeney.

It took them five hours to interview seven candidates for the committee (the seventh was Steve Sibold, also a second-year economics student).



The committee will meet during the next few days to talk about dividing up the six traditional positions for the committee members: coordinator, academic, cultural, social, informational, and communications.

End the medical and legal monopolies

At a meeting between the Council of Ontario Universities and the Government's Committee on University Affairs, considerable concern was expressed by members of the CUA about the high effective admissions standrads which exist for professional schools, such as medicine and law. The members were concerned that these high admission standards, which are created because of the limited number of places available in these schools, served mainly to preserve an unnatural shortage of doctors and lawyers which in turn allowed doctors and lawyers to make extremely high incomes without necessarily providing the services the community needs. In this light, we found the following editorial, which appeared in the Globe and Mail on September 2, extremely persuasive:

An eminent doctor appearing before a Canadian judge once protested that it would be impossible for the lay mind to understand the particular medical situation involved in the case. Retorted the judge, who in relation to the medical profession was a layman, "I shall understand very well if you explain it in good English."

In a sense that episode capsules the problem of modern society as it confronts the self-governing professions. As the level of education among the general population rises, laymen are going to be less and less willing to leave the professions in the hands of the professionals. It is a trend that is already begun and can only strengthen, for the very good reason that the public suspects that professional ethics are often designed to serve the profession, not the public.

An awareness of this growing lay rebellion was undoubtedly one of the factors which prompted the panel discussion about the supply of lawyers which engaged the attention of the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association in Banff in August. The meeting was told that for every student admitted to law school in Canada, from four to eight qualified applicants are turned away. It was agreed by the panel of lawyers and law professors that the provincial law societies and the legal profession had no right to restrict the number of those who want to become lawyers.

Yet at the same time the panel members feared that too many lawyers could lead to fee cutting, touting of services, lawyers taking short cuts in performing services because they were being inadequately paid, and money-hungry lawyers stealing from their clients. Evidently the gentlemen fear to place confidence in the free enterprise system.

Law societies and the legal profession cannot, of course, be blamed directly for the fact that most would-be lawyers are turned away by the law schools. Yet the public will note that law schools which admit students, are run by lawyers, that lawyers are heavily represented in governments that determine how many law schools there shall be, as the public will also note that doctors run medical schools and that most health ministers -- though there have been some healthy changes of late -- are doctors.

The public, in other words, already strongly suspects that a kind of professional community of interest -- without any hint of a conspiracy -- does work to limit the number of lawyers and doctors.

The results are not beneficial to the public. A shortage of both lawyers and doctors means that many of the more remote communities are without lawyers and doctors. If the supply was equal, or more than equal, to the demand, simple hunger would drive lawyers and doctors into these less attractive areas. A lack of competition also permits the poor or mediocre professional to make a good living when he ought, in fact, to be starved out of the profession by more competent competitors. An insufficient supply of professionals places too heavy a work load on the more successful -- we are always hearing of the doctor who works 60 and 70 hours a week. Would he not be likely to live longer and more happily, and would his patients not be ensured of better care, if there were enough of him to give the doctor a 40-hour week?

And finally -- and there's no getting away from it -- a chronic shortage of lawyers and doctors increases their ability to demand and get higher fees -- higher fees which the public is becoming less and less willing to pay.

If the lawyers and the doctors believe that they can expect governments to preserve their protected positions much longer, they should look at teachers.

Teachers, in Ontario, at least, are anxious to become a self-governing profession. They object keenly to the fact that more teachers are now being produced than can find jobs. Dr. E. E. Stewart, Ontario Deputy Minister of Education, acquainted the Ontario Teachers Federation with the facts of life in August.

"Our feeling," said Dr. Stewart "is that if people understand what the job situation is like -- and people entering teachers' colleges last year did -- they should be given the opportunity to study in that field. For the first time in a long time school boards are in a position to make quality judgments about the kind of people they hire into their systems. I think in the long run the marketplace will do its own sorting out of the problems."

The marketplace, we believe, could do the very same thing by lawyers and doctors, once there are enough of them. And if the lawyers and doctors do not themselves take determined and successful measures to improve the supply then -- they may count upon it -- the lay society will do it for them.

After that, if there should be lawyers so money-hungry as to steal from their clients -- well, we have jails, haven't we?

Ooops!

Thursday and Friday's papers last week were marred by several mistakes on the part of our printer. The story on Amchitka on Thursday should have contained a by-line- it was written by Howard Cohen - and the sense of it was ruined by several typographical errors and ommissions. In Friday's paper, the article "What have the unions ever done?" had two groups of paragraphs misplaced. All the paragraphs following "I says, "Yea, I think so. That's my boss," should have preceded everything between "Well, of course I couldn't go inside, eh..." and "Hey, boss! What've the unions ever done?"

Help!

The Journal needs typists to help us for about an hour or two on any one of Sunday, Tuesday or Wednesday nights. If you are interested, call Bill Johnston at 542-1462 or 547-2606 or drop in any of those nights.

"If you don't play the game my way I'll take my ball and go home!"

First, it was the 10 per cent surcharge on imports and the demand that other countries adjust the value of their currencies until the United States was satisfied that the adjusted levels were realistic - in US terms, of course.

Then, it was the threat to cut off American funds for the United Nations because countries had the nerve to vote against the US two-China policy.

Then, for the same reason, the Senate decided Friday to end the American foreign aid programme.

And, to add insult to economic injury, Nixon gave the go-ahead on the potentially disastrous Amchitka test.

Take that, nasty, ungrateful world. Freedom - the American Way.

letters to the editors

Residence noise

Dear Editors:

Before I present the beef that prompted this letter, I should like to make one thing clear: I am a student, presumably in the same occupational catgeory as the rowdies I shall refer to, and thus I have no particular axe to grind other than as affected by this matter.

It concerns the hooligans who continually raise hell late at night in the vicinity of the main campus student residences. To be specific, I am objecting to the two most common exhibitions of inconsideration: shouting, yelling or otherwise raising voices whether in pairs or larger groups, and the playing of record players and radios at such a volume that the public streets below tend to reverberate to the raucus noise issuing from open windows.

I have an apartment opposite one of the mens residences on Collingwood Street. Obviously, on the weekends one must expect a certain amount of disturbance as students relax and unwind from their week's studies. But it seems only reasonable that after midnight, during the week that one should expect a little peace and quiet. Not such luck.

Some unthinking clod throws his window wide open, turns up his stereo and lets blast, without giving thought to the time, the volume, or other people. And then, just tonight, a group of what were presumably students held an impromptu riot on lower Alfred Street.

I could not only hear them, right across to the next block but with all my windows shut I was still entertained by a rather repetitive use of four letter expletives. What it was in aid of, I do not know. Nor do I really care.

All I know (as did most of the other residents in my area) was that it was past midnightt, I was trying to study, other people were trying to sleep, and it seemed a damned thoughtless act on the part of a lot of stupid people.

I remember I read with mild amusement the complaints in the local newspaper from residents living next to the Richardson Memorial Stadium regarding the foul language, noise, and apathy of students attending football games. At that time I was not living where I am at present.

Now I can sympathize with them. It's precisely this kind of asinine antics that lowers the student's image in the general publics eye. And with good reason. For it can only represent a complete lack of responsibility and concern for the rights of others. Students who, when by themselves, would never dare to raise their voices or intrude upon another's privacy, think that because they are in a group of their peers that they can disregard all common courtesy and yell and scream and swear and otherwise create a disturbance only bring contempt upon themselves and discredit more considerate students who have the misfortune to be in the same occupational class.

There is really no excuse. I expect that some would challenge my complaint on the grounds that " we were only having a good time" and that "we didn't mean any harm" but that does not absolve them from the duty which every person in the community has to act so as to not deliberately infringe the rights of others.

It is even a less valid excuse when one considers the options available. If these clods want to congregate with a view to making a disturbance then they should do it at a time and at a place where it will not affect other people. Or in the case of the rabid record players, they can buy earphones for private listening or close their windows.

In short, there is no justification possible for the continual disturbance of the peace at a time and place when the majority of the populace desire, and in most cases need, a chance to relax, study or sleep. Short of legal action, I can suggest no solution other than that the people involved will in the future conduct themselves with at least a modicum concern, consideration, and good manners.

Co-ed Res

Dear Editors:

We are in favour of a co-ed residence at Queen's. Co-ed living arrangements have been very successful at other universities throughout Canada and the U.S and in Youth Hostels everywhere. We see no reason, therefore, why they should not be successful here.

A yes vote on the referendum would be a great step forward for Queen's. A very few years ago total segregation was the policy. We don't favour forced integration, but the Gordon-Brockington-Victoria Hall proposal for those who want it while still making segregated living possible.

There have been objections by the men to the fact that they will lose maid service while still paying for it.In fact each man pays only approximately $40 per session for bed-making and dusting. In our opinion, it is well worth the extra money to have private washrooms, kitchenettes, laundry facilities, and common rooms available on each floor.

The committee has made in depth studies throughout the spring and summer, and must present their proposals very soon to make Co-ed at Queen's possible. We and the committee feel the proposals must be passed now or Queen's Students will be waiting for many years for another opportunity.

We urge everyone to vote yes to give the committee the strength it needs to make Co-ed living at Queen's possible for the men and women who want it.

Journal reviews

Dear Editors:

Where on earth did The Journal dig up this Sandy Nieman creature anyway? What's her hang-up? It sems to us that only someone who is psychologically warped could descend to such low depths of personal insult as that which she totally unjustifiably saw fit to lavish upon Gordon Robertson and Theresa Sears for their recent performances in The Importance of Being Earnest.

Miss Nieman seems to think that because an actor is not perfectly suited to his role that his "shortcomings" are to be used as direct weapons of vicious and unwarranted personal insult.

The "review" gave the impression, for example, that Mr. Robertson was somehow on trial for his age and "thinning hair" in and for themselves. Nieman's spiteful venom made any meaningful consideration of these aspects in relation to the play totally secondary, indeed nearly accidental.

This is not to say, however, that these aspects were important. They weren't and if anything the audience took a genuine and kindly delight in the incongruity, thereby adding to the overall humour of Wilde's play.

At any rate, those of us with some imagination are willing to subscribe to a reasonable amount of Coleridgean "suspension of disbelief that . . . constitutes poetic faith".

As individuals who ourselves do not "suffer fools" gladly, on the stage or perhaps anywhere else for that matter, we are not at all opposed to seeing somebody put down by anyone who feels the given individual(s) deserve to be so treated -- providing this is done with a modicum of taste, tact, and above all at least some trace of genuine irony, wit or humour.

Nieman is abjectly devoid of all these, her statements pathetically indicative of "blunt weapons that tear and hack instead of cutting clean". By the way Miss Nieman, why don't you read Newman and perhaps at least pick up a few manners. (re "Definition of a Gentleman"). Obviously we could never expect you to learn any lessons from the subtilty of Swift.

Nieman obviously didn't enjoy the production and it's her perogative to say so -- in a reasonable fashion. Then perhaps the facts that we and many others in the whole enjoyed the production, and that Nieman's expectation of Kingston theatre are ludicrously unrealistic might be irrelevant.

So too the facts that Gordon Robertson IS one of Kingston's best actors and that Nieman's critical acumen is decidely far less acute than her vituperative and shallow rhetoric might indicate.

Nieman gives many indications that she is far from any reasonable academic grasp of the play as far as this goes, and as far as its production is concerned, (despite her flippant pretension) and any fool knows you don't damn a production for not having materials which are beyond its ken, because of budget etc.

Nor do you too harshly condemn actors for slight faux pas made on only any one given night.

Nieman, you have much to learn in many ways -- so much we think, that with this final word you can be utterly dismissed.

Anti-feedback

Dear Editors:

I wrote this letter simply because I am rather depressed by the fact that I can't pick up either Golden Words or the Journal without reading "blurps" by a bunch of seudo (sic) intellectual authors. Yes, regretfully you now think that I am one also, but I will keep confusingly ostentatious adjectives out of my rhetoric (Real or subtle?)

Every year after orientation, we are bombarded with writings disclaiming the Gaels for being ego tripping power mongers who can't see past their arm bands. However, this week, Traham Taylor claims that the campus constablulary (cops) have no taints of that disease which infects the Gaels every September. They really don't enjoy themselves or their power . . . they just need the green stuff. No, not grass -- money. Seems to be a bit against human nature to me.

Apparently everyone writing to these columns knows all the answers and has managed to figure out how the Gaels, the AMS and everyone else that they complain about, are thinking. Well, I'll admit it; I haven't. I'm too busy trying to get the peanut butter out of the bottom of the jar.

If people get kicks out of wearing armbands, or throwing tomatoes, or jumping on Kosygin -- great !! I'm sure it is better for them than the eleven o'clock news.

I'm attacking no one, just pointing a finger straight up where people can't see it. Personally, I feel more Journal space should be devoted to perceptive writers like Alan Broadbent who can convey thoughts, not attacks.

If you're thinking of writing a reply to my thoughts, don't bother because I've quit reading Feedback and Salad.

- but if you have a full jar of Skippy around, I sure could use it!

Who brought this up?

By James FitzGerald and Mark Symka

An intimate gathering of six hundred freshmen voluntarily participated in the traditional Doughnut Devouring Ceremony last night in Leonard Hall Cafeteria. As the male counterpart of the Levana Candle-lighting Ceremony, Doughnut Devouring symbolizes the competition among Queensmen to achieve the greatest number of sexual conquests in the academic year.
academic year.

According to the rules established in 1897, each glazed doughnut represents a girl in the faculty of Arts and Science; each sugar doughnut a girl in Nursing; while the remaining honeybuns represent the Queenswomen who always come back for seconds.

According to tradition, the amount of doughnut a participant vomits represents in relative terms the number of marriages, divorces, and alimony checks he can look forward to in the future.

Unfortunately, recent wanton acts of revolution and counter-revolution have threatened to stain the integrity of this fulfilling traditional experience. A small group of demonstrators from the Bakers Union unexpectedly stormed the ceremony, shouting obscene slogans such as, "What are you all here for - a full stomach or a fulfilling wife?

The heaving mass of students was perplexed by the prospect of having to respond to such a probing rhetorical question.

Men's Residence Council President Peter Wick demonstrated his involvement in the issues by being randomly trampled by an incensed band of bakers and candle-stick makers, who were either rushing to protest the ceremony or to protest the protesting. At this point nobody really knew or cared.

One enthusiastic participant in the ceremony, who wishes to remain anonymous, expressed his feeling of total satisfaction at having his fondest expectations of the Queen's spirit materialized.

But another irate participant resented having Queen's spirit in the form of doughnuts "rammed down my throat." This incisive comment inspired others to form an organization dedicated to stamping out hypocrisy, chauvinism, and jelly doughnuts, calling themselves G.R.O.I.N. (Guys Really Offended by Inflicted Nausea).

Their emphatic declaration that the whole affair was simply "twisted ceremonial horseshit" has prompted an investigation into the relative effects of equine excrement as a deterrent to the development of Queen's spirit. We wish G.R.O.I.N. the best of luck in the future. Rah Rah.

FEEDBACK

Amchitka

The article appearing in the Queen's Journal on the 28th of Oct. on page 4, seeks to explore the larger questions posed by the Amchitka test. It makes the point that it is not purely a local issue, but that it is one which has much broader ramifications and that it should therefore be opposed by everyone.

The argument proceeds by purporting to show that: the test is ostensibly a major step in the deployment of the ABM system in the US; that some of the technical aspects of the ABM system are in doubt; that the strategic utility of the system is negligible; and that the deployment of the system, regardless of its 'uselessness' adds to the arms race.

There is therefore no rational reason for the ABM and therefore also for the proposed test. As a consequence, the argument goes on. there must be another reason for the test and the deployment of the ABM.

Since the cold war has 'ceased' to exist, and since the USSR is now a status quo power, the only reason is purely and simply to serve the selfish aims of the US military-industrial ruling clique. The article ends with a plea for Canada to assert and protect its identity vis a vis the US.

Without for the moment considering whether the Amchitka test should take place, it ought to be clear that whatever stand one takes on this issue, that decision ought to be based on the right reasons. Taken on their own, the arguments forwarded in the subject article do not justify unreserved opposition to the proposed test.

Virtually the entire agrument depends on tying the test in with the deployment of the Spartan ABM system. One does not necessarily follow upon the other. This test does not mean that the ABM system must of necessity be deployed.

Research on weapons systems may be carried out without having to deploy every intermediate, moderately successful model. A separate distinct political decision is required. One might therefore take a position of approving a test as a necessary step in a continuing search for a more effective system, while disapproving the deployment of the Spartan ABM system.

If one were to admit a direct cause-effect relationship between the test and a deployment, or if one proceeds from the point of view that the systems is going to be deployed, in part, anyways, then one may well sympathize and agree with the authors contention that it is ridiculous to talk of reducing your losses on an all-out first strike from 120 million to 90 million. Is the strategy to be one of protecting the population centres, however?

The author stated that "without certainty as to mutual destructive capability, deterrence will fail . . ." The object is obviously deterrence, and there must be certainty as to mutual destructive capability. To ensure certainty it is necessary to ensure that your deterrent is safe, i.e. that it will survive an all-out first strike from the opponent.

This has become particularly necessary since the proliferation of offensive missiles and the development of MIRV, FOBS, etc. have increased the capacity of the offensive to such an extent as to give both sides the option of going to a counter-deterrent as opposed to counter-city strategy.

The means of achieving security, among others, are to 'harden' missile and key command and communications sites, to put missiles on mobile platforms, to put them into submarines, and to protect them with an ABM system (not necessarily Spartan). Since no single means affords requisite security, one resorts to a number of different means.

It is in this context that even a limited ABM deployment, even if not absolutely effective, might be viewed. While the saving of 30 million lives or about 14 per cent of the population may be meaningless and useless in this context saving 14 per cent more of your deterrent or of one or two key communications-command centres may be highly significant, since the requirement is only that these survive the first attack.

To achieve the above, a full ABM system (at a quoted cost of 50 Billion) need not be deployed. I believe the intent is in any case not a complete deployment of the system but a limited one, at considerably less cost.

(IT is this author's view that even the limited deployment of the presently envisaged system is not justified).

The development of MIRV and FOBS (Fractional Orbital Bombardment System), does not

The development of MIRV and FOBS (Fractional Orbital Bombardment System), does not diminish the weight of the strategic agrument of the merits of deploying an ABM system. The former system effectively increases the number of nuclear warheads which may be launched and delays the defenders' certainty as to the intended target of any particular missile. The latter reduces the defenders reaction time by delaying the time the defender can be certain that an attack is on its way.

They therefore decrease the effectiveness of any particular defensive system and make it even more necessary to give extra protection to your deterrent.

It was not made clear why the Office of Science and Technology in the US believed the Spartan warhead to be obsolete. A warhead consists of the nuclear bomb, trigger mechanism, electronic control elements, possibly electronic countermeasure divices, and the physical shell.

Which aspect is obsolete for testing purposes. Only two aspects really require the explosion of the warhead, the trigger and the nuclear device itself. These elements may have uses in future ABM systems (or offensive missiles) since they are less likely to be dated than the complex electronic elements of the warhead and the associated ground control system.

Complex electronic system tests do not call for an underground test. The test may therefore have a utility above and beyond the Spartan system. It must be admitted that in the absence of all the facts the foregoing is conjecture.

Aside from the logical difficulty of maintaining that a 'useless animal' can be considered to constitute, or even seriously threaten, proliferation of a nuclear arms race, the charge that a US policy of dealing from stength is responsible for destabilizing the international scene is open to question.

It is well known that the USSR has reached parity in certain categories and in some cases in overtaking the US in the deployment of other categories of strategic missiles, and will shortly surpass the US in nuclear submarines. There is every indication that the US is not going to attempt to redress the numerical imbalance.

Furthermore, it is difficult to believe that any nation in history has not attempted to negotiate from strength, except where it was incapable of doing so. Some merely do it more discreetly than others.

The efficacy of the strategic argument forwarded in the subject article is therefore very much in doubt. This brings us to the second main part of the argument which states that in view of the inefficacy of the ABM system (the presently envisaged system) the only reason for the deployment of the ABM and for the test as a result is to promote the self interest of the imperialist military industrial elite in the US.

One ought now to ask if the test and the ABM system were rational strategically, would this mean that the test would be justified and the subsequent argument obviated. One is led to believe by the tenor of the subsequent argument, that the test is still to be opposed.

Since the argument is based on a picture of US economic imperialism, to put it mildly, and of reformed communist states, it does not really matter the ABM system or the test are rational from a strategic point of view. The argument becomes independent of the merits of the test, even of the question of ecology. Amchitka becomes another device to protest against US imperialism.

Anyone who cannot decide on the relative imperialist tendencies of the US and USSR etc. should look at the test from the point of view of its immediate and long term strategic implications and from the point of view of ecology (a subject covered on p.8 of the same Journal, although not completely adequately).

The subject article has too many flaws in its strategic argument and can therefore not be used as a basis for making a final decision. Unfortunately I am only too aware of the limitations of the counter arguments I have forwarded more or less off the cuff. All I will say with respect to the strategic debate is 'Not proven', either way. It would be helpful to have more hard facts.

Kween's spirit

Dear Editors;

Kill, pussycat, kill; squeeze out the sweet sins of sexy Susan; kick him in the crotch, doc! Is this the way the managements of the local picture theatres have of saying that this town needs a good kick in the pants? Or is it the ultimate insult to Kingston's inhabitants, in particular Queen's students?

There was a time in this fair town, when Fall meant an improved selection at the threatres. That day seems to have passed. No longer may we wait in eager expectation a whole year for the freshman crowds that will incude the odious Odeon to acquire one or two of the much talked of movies that we didn't have time to see in Toronto. No, dear friend, our fare must be "Fire-maidens from outer-space" all year round.

Let's face it though: Queen's students are no different from anyone else. It's much easier to get him or her into bed after sexy Susan, than after something like "Fortune and Men's Eyes"! For, if Queen's students are different, or if "screw" isn't the only word in the world, then why don't Queen's students set up a university theatre? They have the means, whereas the man on Montreal St. does not. (The many film groups on campus involve too much of a commitment to be good casual entertainment, and besides they have showings in lecture rooms, which is not exactly a relaxing atmosphere.)

But no. Kueen's Spirit overcomes all! That spirit of lethargy that calms the soul with the reassurance that if nothing is being done then it's because everybody else is so apathetic here, and that if something is being done, then that's really good and wonderful. This town wallows in "self-complacent eulogies". (A phrase used by Lynette Hodgson in the Journal, Friday, Oct. 22. O thank you for that article, L.H.! Here is another voice crying in the wilderness. We are not yet all mummies immured in this tomb!)

There being no picture-shows to go to last Friday night, and incited by the theatre article mentioned above, I took myself off to Theatre 5's, "Importance of Being Earnest". But not before I'd had a good swig of Kween's Spirit, by rereading Barry Thorne's review of the play when it first came out in the summer. (Mr. Thorne is Kingston Whig's theatre critic, and a Queen's professor.) That characteristic flavour was there again, and apparently the large audience was drunk on it too. Either that, or they are so miserly that they feel obliged to enjoy something they have paid two dollars to see. What I saw was the most childish interpretation that I have ever seen of that delightful play.

Oscar Wilde had a wit that could bring out the buffoonery of society behaviour. To play Wilde successfully, the actors must be as sophisticated as the playwright. Since Wilde's was the wry smile, rather than the full-throated laugh - for no matter how blatant a line - it is a mistake to play Wilde as farce. Such an excess, and Theatre 5 resorted to this, is too much for the play to bear. It becomes an embarrassment. I must admit that I have myself played John Worthing as a clown - but that was in high school.

So what is there left to do? Answer: get out of Kingston. This I did on Saturday, running off to Ottawa to see a really enjoyable farce, Goldoni's "Servant of two Masters", put on by the Neptune Theatre of Halifax, a competent, professional company. Now, it seems, that L.H. thinks that Kingston and Halifax have much the same type of situation, and that therefore it should be possible to have professional theatre in Kingston, but I would suggest one after-effect of Kween's Spirit that would seem to preclude this possibility. This is that Kween's Spirit tends to make those who indulge in it, rabbit-like. Not only does it make them timid of the great big world, and frightened of criticism, but it also gives them a capacity for developing, and with amazing rapidity, an immunity to all such criticism.

Thus, too, Kingston audiences must suffer more than say, Belleville audiences. In Belleville there is the Quinte Arts Council, which, amongst other things, is bringing the Halifax company to play Goldoni's "Servant" at one of the local high school theatres. Kween's Spirit blinds one to the desirability of such touring companies. What could they possibly offer that we don't have already?

Everything! That is why I should like to see a club formed on campus, which, if it could not afford to bring good drama and films to its own theatre, could at least make it easier to get out of Kingston to a purer spirit.

P.S. A financial start might be made by some Mark Twain enthusiasts in producing "The King's Camelopard, or The Royal Nonesuch" for Kingston audiences. I assure you there is no risk involved. It could run for a month.

Just who is this Victor Bradley who thinks that Suzie-Q Week is a male chauvinist pig institution?

Just where does this Victor Bradley get off trying to force one of the great traditions of this university to defend itself?

Just how can this long-haired malcontent Victor Bradley justify defaming Suzie-Q Week as a male chauvinist pig institution?

Just how does this Victor Bradley corner the Queen's Journal into an exclusive interview to propound such outrageous opinions?

That is what I'd like to know.

Well, to answer these and other pressing questions, I managed to get an exclusive interview with this Victor Bradley, in the office he occupies as AMS vice-president, and I asked him to justify the comments on Suzie-Q Week attributed to him in the October 26 edition of the Journal.

This Victor Bradley proved to be very evasive on the whole issue, for whenever I hit him with a penetrating and incisive question he would answer the phone or reply to one of the thirty delegations pounding on his door. However, I managed to piece together some interesting facts on this Victor Bradley, mostly gleened from the Canadian Who's Who, which illuminated the chronology of his present views. In fact, it occurred to me that this Victor Bradley is a prototype of all anti-Suzie-Q types.

He was born in the middle years of this century in a small rural community, the first male in a family of nine sisters. He was the youngest sibling. His first real affection outside of his family was for a large bull, who is lovingly called Buster. However, it turned out that the bull was in fact a cow, proven on the birth of a calf, and he felt rejected when the cow transferred her affections to her offspring.

In the fourth grade, he became infatuated with a small blonde girl, but the relationship was quickly terminated when she stole his lunch box, ate the contents, and dropped it on his head from a tree. On relating this incident to his assembled sisters, he received no consolation, for they dismissed the affair as a good thing to happen to a rather pudgy young chap.

In the tenth grade, he again ventured into the world of romance, and invited a somewhat larger blonde to the school prom. After many weeks of privately practicing the jitterbug and the jive, he felt ready for the big night. He spent an hour liberally dosing his head with brylcream, resulting in a tremendous Chicago Box-Car with Waterfall hair-style, and leapt into a borrowed Ford sedan. At the appropriate time in the course of the prom, he invited the blonde out to the parking lot. In the midst of readying himself for the impending joust, she nudged him, and his greasy head slipped on the upholstery, resulting in a solid thump to the head which rendered him unconscious for the course of the evening.

At his first year at university, enrolled in the engineering faculty, he participated in a panty-raid on a women's residence. He unfortunately spent five minutes too many in sandpapering his fingertips, for what he thought would be precise work, and arrived to find that there were 95 engineers, 94 of them prompt engineers, and 94 women in the residence. He went home and toyed with the lock on his door for several hours.

He then left the university for a year, and found employment in a grocery store. He sorted and stamped. He soon rose to the head of the avacado, pomagrante, and pecadillo department. Everything seemed rosy, the world was in its place. One morning, however the egg section rebelled and as a part of the solution to the problem, it was resolved that he had confounded the eggs. He was dismissed.

He took to cruising the streets of big cities, but in this he found no satisfaction, for he was repeatedly convicted of violating parking meters.

He returned to university, and in due time came to be vice-president of the Alma Mater Society. This is an achievement that had profound effect, for he became in a short time the administrative head of an organization with a strong female connotation. He found that, with great success, he could control the destiny of this "Mater" thing. At last he had found a way to rise above the female gender, to exercise and demonstrate his masculinity.

And then someone had the unfortunate gall to ask him what he thought of Suzie-Q Week, an institution that allows women to decide who they want to go out with and where they want to go. Suddenly someone was saying right to his face, "Comment on this thing which will return you to your former bondage, this perniscious dalliance that recalls all those years of perspiration and acne."

Can you blame this Victor Bradley for grabbing at the first cliche that comes to mind, the old male chauvinist pig line?

No, let us not too quickly condemn his comments that would defy the old Queen's principle that men are men, and women are women, and only in the Victoria Hall pit and one selected week out of the year shall the twain ever meet.

La Presse riot

BY JEAN DE GUISE
in the Montreal Star

If any doubt remained that the conflict at La Presse went beyond the bounds of mere management-employee dispute, Friday night's massive demonstration in downtown Montreal finally dispelled it. (see page 6).

It is obvious today that a clear-cut power struggle is being waged between labor and the establishment.

The stake: Control over one of Quebec's major information media.

But the fight really began seven years ago, when La Presse's management, always in close touch with the political power, decided the time had to come to put an end to the Quiet Revolution as such.

"We realize now," a veteran La Presse journalist told The Montreal Star on the eve of the demonstration, "that the seven-month lock-out of the typographers in 1964 and that the present lock-out of four trade unions had but one target: The editorial department."

The charge is "news management." The newsmen feel that La Presse wants to go back to its image of a sedate family newspaper and avoid extensive handling of controversial subjects. A return to the "quiet fold" is sought and the only way it can be achieved is under camouflage of having to deal with unreasonable labor demands.

The feeling is shared by the leaders of the locked-out unions.

"We never asked," said one, "for anything that had not already been granted at the other papers, like The Star, The Gazette, Montreal-Matin and so on. And we could not understand why La Presse was so adamant about refusing to negotiate with us as a common front, about settling the automation and job security problems as they have been settled at the other papers.

"Never mind all this talk about violence, intimidation, provocative security measures and whatnot. There have been incidents, yes, and we truly deplore them. But not a single one was aimed at top management itself. The victims of these incidents were always at the foreman level - people who were members of our unions, but decided to side with management and keep on working - and, of course, imported scabs."

As for the journalists, the more thoughtful among them have come to see themselves as mere pawns in the escalating struggle.

They quickly saw that management's full-page advertisements "explaining" the conflict with the trade unions were riddled with half-truths and biased attempts to make their lock-out employees look as mindless puppets of big, bad international unions that were willing to sacrifice the poor local boys for the sake of gaining greater power.

These same journalists feel that the youthful leaders of their own union in turn tended to become slightly paranoiac in their gathering of "news management" cases and their replies to La Presse's self-righteous statements on the conflict. Half-truths were slipping into the retorts of their spokesmen, they thought.

But the scales at last seem to have fallen from their eyes and they look on themselves as caught between the frying pan of establishment control and the fire of labor control.

Several attempts were made to reach management spokesmen since the decision to stop publication was made Wednesday night. But those who would remain complete masters in their own publishing house, it appears, simply were not at home.

"Coed residence will be what the residents make it," she said, adding that she would definitely like to see a coed residence on campus.

But, Miss Noble said, the students who live in a coed residence will be the ones who create or solve the problems. She agreed with the proposal to have the sexes alternate room-by-room within a coed residence, saying that this would give students a much better opportunity to meet members of the opposite sex. This should help to build brother-sister relationships rather than dating ones, she said.

Miss Noble suggested that a smaller pilot project should be tried, rather than Victoria Hall. "Victoria is a bit too big for the first coed residence. But I do think that its facilities are great for a coed residence."

She said it is very important for there to be a choice of residence accommodation at Queen's. "First year girls are often quite shy and wouldn't want to be pushed into a coed residence."

Dave Jarvis

(Dave Jarvis, second-year commerce student from Grimsby, Ontario, is a sprinter and hurdler on the Queen's track team and lives in Morris Hall.)

Jarvis said coed residence would foster a whole new side to the social life of Queen's. Instead of men or women going stag or in couples to campus events, a group from a floor might go out together, he said -- a group consisting of both men and women, not necessarily paired off.

Jarvis, who is in his second year in Morris, said he wondered what coed residence would do to the spirit which exists in residence. The large coed residence would break down the spirit that has developed on Leonard Field, he said, and he suggested that it would be a good idea to maintain the smaller residences as the centres of spirit.

Despite its recent setbacks, coed residences are in the wind, and in the gossip. The Journal interviewed five well-known students who live in central campus residences, asking for their comments on the idea.

Their answers vary as widely as might be expected from students in five different academic programmes, with different outlooks and interests. But they may be very typical of the 2100 students in residence at Queen's now, who are likely to be deciding, before Christmas vacation, whether they want coed residence to exist on this campus.

"Coed residence should make the Queen's social situation much freer," Miss Roberts pointed out. "Hopefully it will help to remove a lot of the social barriers that now stand in the way of getting to know the opposite sex."

In a coed residence "even floor meetings will be fun!" she said.

Students would have to learn to respect each other in order for a coed residence to be successful, Miss Roberts said. If this were done, most of the problems that would arise could be overcome by mutual understanding, she added.

Miss Roberts, who is in Victoria Hall for her second year, said she agreed with Miss Moir that open hours should have been extended before coed residence was tried.

"It would give veryone an idea of what coed residence would be like." she said.

(Bev Moir, second-year nursing student from Lindsay, is vice-president of the Nursing Science Society and lives in Victoria Hall.)

"There are some disadvantages to coed residence which should be pointed out." she said. And for her, she added, the disadvantages would outweigh the good points of coed residence.

"Lack of privacy would be a big disadvantage in a coed residence," said Miss Moir, who is living in Vic for her second year. She suggested that the presence of men would inhibit a girl's freedom to walk around half-dressed.

And she questioned the enforcement of security in a coed Victoria Hall, saying that the control of people coming into the building would be far more complex. "This may well result in higher damages," she said, adding that she wondered whether such a large step should be taken when women's residences do not yet have complete open hours.

Miss Moir said, however, that the option of coed residence should be available for others.

"This is one advantage of the proposed setup," she said. "It does allow a choice of residence accommodation."

No more sugar and spice:

By Florence Howe in Saturday Review

"I remember quite clearly a day in sixth grade," a college freshman told me a year ago, "when the class was discussing an article from a weekly supplementary reader. The story was about a chef, and someone in the class ventured the opinion that cooking was women's work, that a man was a 'sissy' to work in the kitchen. The teacher's response surprised us all. She informed us calmly that men make the best cooks, just as they make the best dress designer, singers, and laundry workers. 'Yes,' she said, 'anything a woman can do a man can do better.' There were no male students present; my teacher was a woman."

Children learn about sex roles very early in their lives, probably before they are eighteen months old, certainly long before they enter school. They learn these roles through realtively simple patterns that most of us take for granted. We throw boy-babies up in the air and roughouse with them. We coo over girl-babies and handle them delicately. We choose sex-related colors and toys for our children from their earliest days. We encourage the energy and physical activity of our sons, just as we expect girls to be quieter and more docile. We love both our sons and daughters with equal fervor, we protest, and yet we are disappointed when there is no male child to carry on the family name.

The truth of it is that while we in the West have professed to believe in "Liberty, equality,and fraternity," we have also taken quite literally the term "fraternity." We have continued to maintain, relatively undisturbed, all the ancient edicts about the superiority of males, the inferiority of females. Assumptions current today about woman's alleged "nature" are disguised psychological versions of physiological premises in the Old Testament, in the doctrines of the early church fathers, and in the thinking of male philosophers, writers, educators - including some who founded women's colleges or opened men's colleges to women. In short, what we today call the "women's liberation movement" is only the most recent aspect of the struggle that began with Mary Wollstonecraft's Vindication of the Rights of Women in 1795 - a piece of theory that drew for courage and example on the fathers of the French and American revolutions. It is, of course, only one hundred years since higher education was really opened up to women in this country, and many people know how dismal is the record of progress for professional women, especially during the past fifty years.

How much blame should be placed on public education? A substantial portion, although it is true that schools reflect the society they serve. Indeed, schools function to reinforce the sexual stereotpyes that children have been taught by their parents, friends, and the mass culture we live in. It is also perfectly understandable that sexual stereotypes demeaning to women are also perpetuated by women - mothers in the first place, and teachers in the second - as well as by men - fathers, the few male teachers in elementary schools, high school teachers and many male administrators and educators at the top of the school's hierarchy.

Sexual stereotypes are not to be identified with sexual or innate differences, for we know nothing about these matters. John Stuart Mill was the first man (since Plato) to affirm that we could know nothing about innate sexual differences, since we have never known of a society in which either men or women lived wholly separately. Therefore, he reasoned, we can't "know" what the pure "nature" of either sex might be: What we see as female behavior, he maintained, is the result of what he called the education of "willing slaves." There is still no "hard" scientific evidence of innate sexual differences, though there are new experiments in progress on male hormones of mice and monkeys. Other hormonal experiments, especially those using adrenaline, have indicated that, for human beings at least, social factors and pressures are more important than physiological ones.

Sexual stereotypes are assumed differences, social conventions or norms, learned behavior, attitudes, and expectations. Most stereotypes are well-known to all of us, for they are simple - not to say simple-minded. Men are smart, women are dumb but beautiful, etc. A recent annotated catalogue of children's books (distributed by the National Council of Teachers of English to thousands of teachers and used for ordering books with federal funds) lists titles under the headings "Especially for Girls" and "Especially for Boys." Verbs and adjectives are remarkably predictable through the listings. Boys "decipher and discover," "earn and train," or "foil" someone; girls "struggle," "overcome difficulties," "feel lost," "help solve," or "help (someone) out." One boy's story has "strange power," another moves "from truancy to triumph." A girl on the other hand, "learns to face the real world" or makes a "difficult adjustment." Late or early, in catalogues or on shelves, the boys of children's books are active and capable, the girls passive and in trouble. All studies of children's literature - and there have been many besides my own - support this conclusion.

The verification of sexual stereotypes is a special area of interest to psychologists and sociologists. An important series of studies was done in 1968 by Inge K. Broverman and others at Worcester State Hospital in Massachusetts. These scientists established a "sex-stereotype questionnaire" consisting of "122 bipolar items" - characteristics socially known or socially tested as male or female. Studies by these scientists and others established what common sense will verify: that those traits "stereotypically masculine...are more often perceived as socially desirable" than those known to be feminine. Here are some "male-valued items" as listed on the questionnaire:

very aggressive
very independent not at all emotional very logical very direct very adventurous very self-confident very ambitious

These and other characteristics describe the stereotypic male. To describe the female, you need only reverse those traits and add "female-valued" ones, some of which follow:

very talkative
very tactful very gentle
very aware of feelings of others very religious very quiet
very strong need for security and the one I am particularly fond of citing to men who control my field - "enjoys art and literature very much."

The Worcester scientists used their 122 items to test the assumptions of clinical psychologists about mental health. Three matched groups of male and female clinical psychologists were given three identical lists of the 122 items unlabeled and printed in random order. Each group was given a different set of instructions: One was told to choose those traits that characterize the healthy adult male; another to choose those of the healthy adult female; the third, to choose those of the healthy adult - a person. The result: The clinically healthy male and the clinically healthy adult were identical - and totally divergent from the clinically healthy female. The authors of the study concluded that "a double standard of health exists for men and women." That is, the general standard of health applies only to men. Women are perceived as "less healthy" by those standards called "adult." At the same time, however, if a woman deviates from the sexual stereotypes prescribed for her - if she grows more "active" or "aggressive," for example - she doesn't grow healthier; she may, in fact, if her psychiatrist is a Freudian, be perceived as "sicker." Either way, therefore, women lose or fail, and so it is not surprising to find psychologist Phyllis Chesler reporting that proportionately many more women than men are declared "sick" by psychologists and psychiatrists.

The idea of a "double standard" for men and women is a familiar one and helps to clarify how severely sexual stereotypes constrict the personal and social development of women. Studies by child psychologists reveal that while boys of all ages clearly identify with male figures and activities, girls are less likely to make the same sort of identification with female stereotypes. With whom do girls and women identify? My guess is that there is a good deal of confusion in their heads and hearts in this respect, and that what develops is schizophrenia: The school-girl knows that, for her, life is one thing, learning another. This is like the Worcester study's "double standard" - the schoolgirl cannot find herself in history texts or as she would like to see herself in literature; yet she knows she is not a male. Many women may ultimately discount the question of female identity as unimportant, claiming other descriptions preferable - as a parent, for example, or a black person, or a college professor.

Children learn sexual stereotypes at an early age, and, by the time they get to fifth grade, it may be terribly difficult, perhaps hardly possible by traditional means, to change their attitudes about sex roles - whether they are male or female. For more than a decade, Paul Torrance, a psychologist particularly interested in creativity, has been conducting interesting and useful experiments with young children. Using a Products Improvement Test, for example, Torrance asked first-grade boys and girls to "make toys more fun to play with." Many six-year-old boys refused to try the nurse's kit, "protesting," Torrance reports, "I'm a boy! I don't play with things like that." Several creative boys turned the nurse'skit into a doctor's kit and were then "quite free to think of improvements." By the third grade, however, "boys excelled girls even on the nurse's kit, probably because," Torrance explains, "girls have been conditioned by this time to accept toys as they are and not to maniuplate or change them."

Later experiments with third, fourth, and fifth-graders using science toys further verify what Torrance calls "the inhibiting effects of sex-role conditioning." "Girls were quite reluctant," he reports, "to work with these science toys and frequently protested: 'I'm a girl; I'm not supposed to know anything about things like that!' " Boys, even in these early grades, were about twice as good as girls at explaining ideas about toys. In 1959, Torrance reported his findings to parents and teachers in one school and asked for their cooperation in attempting to change the attitudes of the girls. In 1960, when he retested them, using similar science toys, the girls participated willingly and even with apparent enjoyment. And they performed as well as the boys. But in one significant respect nothing had changed: The boys' contributions were more highly valued - both by other boys and by girls - than the girls' contributions, regardless of the fact that, in terms of sex, boys and girls had scored equally. "Apparently," Torrance writes, "the school climate has helped to make it more acceptable for girls to play around with science things, but boys' ideas about science things are still supposed to be better than those of girls."

Torrance's experiments tell us both how useful and how limited education may be for women in a culture in which assumptions about their inferiority run deep in their own consciousness as well as in the consciousness of men. While it is encouraging to note that a year's effort had changed behavior patterns significantly, it is also clear that attitudes of nine, ten, and eleven-year-olds are not so easily modifiable, at least not through the means Torrance used.

Torrance's experiments also make clear that, whatever most of us have hitherto assumed, boys and girls are not treated alike in elementary school. If we consider those non-curricular aspects of the school environment that the late anthropologist Jules Henry labeled the "noise" of schools, chief among them is the general attitude of teachers, whatever their sex, that girls are likely to "love" reading and to "hate" mathematics and science. As we know from the Rosenthal study of teacher expectations, Pygmalion in the Classroom, such expectations significantly determine student behavior and attitudes. Girls are not expected to think logically or to understand scientific principles; they accept that estimate internally and give up on mathematics and science relatively early. And what encouragement awaits the interested few in high school? For example, in six high school science texts published since 1966 and used in the Baltimore city public schools - all of the books rich in illustrations - I found photographs of one female lab assistant, one woman doctor, one woman scientist, and Rachel Carson. It is no wonder that the percentage of women doctors and engineers in the United States has remained constant at 6 per cent and 1 per cent respectively for the past fifty years.

Though there is no evidence that their early physical needs are different from or less than boys', girls are offered fewer activities even in kindergarten. They may sit and watch while boys, at the request of the female teacher, change the seating arrangement in the room. Of course, it's not simply a matter of physical exercise or ability: Boys are learning how to behave as males, and girls are learning to be "ladies" who enjoy being waited on."

Elementary school readers are meant for both sexes. Primers used in the first three grades offer children a view of a "typical" American family: a mother who does not work, a father who does, two children - a brother who is always older than a sister - and two pets - a dog and sometimes a cat - whose sexes and ages mirror those of the brother and sister. In these books, boys build or paint things; they also pull girls in wagons and push merry-go-rounds. Girls carry purses when they go shopping; they help mother cook or pretend that they are cooking; and they play with their dolls. When they are not making messes, they are cleaning up their rooms or other people's messes. Plots in which girls are involved usually depend on their inability to do something - to manage their own roller skates or to ride a pony.

The absence of adventurous heroines may shock the innocent; the absence of even a few stories about women doctors, lawyers, or professors thwarts reality; but the consistent presence of one female stereotype is the most troublesome matter:

Primrose was playing house. Just as she finished pouring tea for her dolls she began to think. She thought and thought and she thought some more: "Whom shall I marry? Whomever shall I marry?

"I think I shall marry a mailman. Then I could go over to everybody's house and give them their mail.

"Or I might marry a policeman. I could help him take the children across the street."

Primrose thinks her way through ten more categories of employment and concludes, "But now that I think it over, maybe I'll just marry somebody I love." Love is the opiate designated to help Primrose forget to think about what she would like to do or be. With love as reinforcer, she can imagine herself helping some man in his work. In another children's book, Johnny says, "I think I will be a dentist when I grow up," and later, to Betsy, he offers generously, "You can be a dentist's nurse." And, of course, Betsy accepts gratefully, since girls are not expected to have work identity other than as servants or helpers. In short, the books that schoolgirls read prepare them early for the goal of marriage hardly ever for work, and never for independence.

If a child's reader can be pardoned for stereotyping because it is "only" fiction, a social studies text has no excuse for denying reality to its readers. After all, social studies texts ought to describe "what is," if not "what should be." And yet, such texts for the youngest grades are no different from readers. They focus on families and hence on sex roles and work. Sisters are still younger than brothers; brothers remain the doers, questioners, and knowers who explain things to their poor, timid sisters. In a study of five widely used texts, Jamie Kelem Frisoff finds that energetic boys think about "working on a train or in a broom factory" or about being President. They grow up to be doctors or factory workers or (in five texts combined) to do some hundred different jobs, as opposed to thirty for women.

Consider for a moment the real work world of women. Most women (at least for some portion of their lives (work, and if we include "token" women - the occasional engineer, for instance - they probably do as many different kinds of work as men. Even without improving the status of working women, the reality is distinctly different from the content of school texts and literature written for children. Schools usually at least reflect the society they serve; but the treatment of working women is one clear instance in which the reflection is distorted by a patriarchal attitude about who should work and the maleness of work. For example, there are women doctors - there have been women doctors in this country, in fact, for a hundred years or so. And yet, until the publication this month of two new children's books by the Feminist Press there were no children's books about women doctors.

In a novel experiment conducted recently by an undergraduate at Towson State College in Maryland, fourth-grade students answered "yes" or "no" to a series of 20 questions, eight of which asked, in various ways, whether "girls were smarter than boys" or whether "daddies were smarter than mommies." The results indicated that boys and girls were agreed that 1) boys were not smarter than girls, nor girls smarter than boys; but 2) that daddies were indeed smarter than mommies! One possible explanation of this finding depends on the knowledge that daddies in school texts and on television (as well as in real life), work, and that people who work know things. Mommies, on the other hand, in books and on television, rarely stir out of the house except to go to the store - and how can someone like that know anything? Of course, we know that half of all mothers in the United States work at some kind of job, but children whose mommies do work can only assume - on the basis of evidence offered in school books and on television - that their mommies must be "different," perhaps even not quite "real" mommies.

Will public education begin to change the images of women in texts and the lives of women students in schools? There will probably be some movement in this direction, at least in response to the pressures from students, parents, and indivudual teachers. I expect that parents, for example, will continue to win legal battles for their daughters' equal rights and opportunities. I expect that individual teachers will alter their courses and texts and grow more sensitive to stereotypic expectations and behavior in the classroom. But so far there are no signs of larger, more inclusive reforms; no remedial program for counselors, no major effort to destereotype vocational programs or kindergarten classrooms, no centers for curricular reform. Frankly, I don't expect this to happen without a struggle. I don't expect that public school systems will take the initiative here. There is too much at stake in a society as partriarchal as this one. And schools, after all, tend to follow society, not lead it.

Mother: I asked Miss Jonas if my daughter could take metalworking or mechanics, and she said there is no freedom of choice. That is what she said.

The Court: That is it?

Answer: I also asked her whose decision this was, that there was no freedom of choice. And she told me it was the decision of the board of education. I didn't ask her anything else because she clearly showed me that it was against the school policy for girls to be in the class. She said it was a board of education decision.

Question: Did she use that phrase, "no freedom of choice"?

Answer: Exactly that phrase - no freedom of choice. That is what made me so angry that I wanted to start this whole thing.

The Court: Now, after this lawsuit was filed, they then permitted you to take the course; is that correct?

Daughter: No, we had to fight about it for quite a while.

Question: But eventually they did let you in the second semester?

Answer: They only let me in there.

Q: You were the only girl?

A: Yes.

Q: How did you do in the course?

A: I got the medal for it from all the boys there.

Q: Will you show the court?

A: Yes (indicating).

Q: And what does the medal say?

A: Metal 1970 Van Wyck.

Q: And why did they give you that medal?

A: Because I was the best one out of all the boys.

The Court: Just do the best you can to control yourself or I will have to ask you to leave the courtroom. This is no picnic, you know. These are serious lawsuits.

Sha Na Na and the Stampeders

Sha Na Na is 12 guys who banded together to preserve GOOD OLD ROCK AND ROLL, especially the rock and roll of the 1950's. They appear with slicked-back DA haircuts, gold lame suits, undershirts and dirty jeans.

Sha Na Na may be satire but like all good satire it is played seriously. The group members are excellent musicians and vocally they have no set lead singer. Virtually everyone in the group sings lead throughout the show. Their intricate choreography is instantly recognizable as a copy of every band you ever saw in high school. Old songs like Teen Angel, Book of love, Jailhouse Rock, Heartbreak Hotel, Come Go with Me, Teenager in Love, Duke of Earl etc. (remember?) bring back untold memories to anyone over 16 years old.

Their excellent stage show has created wild enthusiasm wherever they have played. Sha Na Na gained the all time encore record at the Fillmore West (five). They wiped out the Woodstock Festival with their inspired madness. More close to home, they received five encores when they played the University of Western Ontario in September.

If you are tired of going to concerts and seeing wooden performances, then come and see Sha Na Na. They like putting on good shows.

Tickets are $3.00 and $2.50 at the Union. There are two shows 3 and 7 p.m. on November 14. Put on your white socks and RESURRECT ROCK AND ROLL.

Stampeders are presently the top Canadian group on the strength of their hit single "Sweet City Woman" which topped charts in Canada and many U.S. states. Their music leans towards country rock but they are versatile in their sound.

Canadian acts are making dents in the music scene. The Stampeders leave Queen's for a tour of major U.S. cities.

Mason Proffit's new album makes sense within a musical and a social context--musically its firmly within the country-rock genre of Poco and the Grateful Dead: socialogically its concerned with fellow man, freedom, and the great ecology mania that dictates a "Right On" encomium. Liberally interspersed with the sliding notes of that traitorous country-music mechanism, the electric steel guitar, (or as the rock adopters have nominated it, the pedal-steel guitar), Mason Proffit's tunes are delivered with all the fervor of an expatrioted Buck Owens. Actually that's not near the sacrilege that five years ago would have been attached to the mere hint that Buck's music had any affinities with that pure strain "good ole rock n' roll".

Today, the four man Mason Proffit can perform a tune such as "Freedom", which tells of "rolling your own in Tennessee", "being the first to stand if they ever take our land", and "livin's just a way to let it be", all set to a tempo and melody strongly reminiscent of Grand Ole Opry fare. No sooner does the mind boggle at comprehending such disparate musical and social forms, than Mason Proffit launches into the highly folkish "500 Men", replete with five string banjo, and plectrumed flat-topping--shades of the Kingston Trio!

In fact, if Nick, Bob and John were to get it all together once again, this is exactly the sort of music they would gravitate towards. Rock and Roll is certainly becoming an all-embracing "muther"!

The title tune of the Proffit-set is an old folk chesnut that was written by Ed McCurdy: "Last Night I Had The Strangest Dream" -- several decades old by authorship, it is no stranger to the contemporary preference for broads and booze rather than bullets and butter!

"Eugene Pratt" brings back that early Beatle-Dylan-oriented propensity for blues-harping bridges between the heavy acoustic guitar-backed choruses. A song simply called "mother" reveals a ballad side of Mason Proffit, in its opening few bars, which turns into a raucous number of double-timed recognition of mother's universal talents of kindness, love and affection. All of which serve to no avail as the beloved son picks up a hurt in his side while frolicking in a rice paddy "somewhere".

Like its topicality of lyric, Mason Proffit is a group which will definitely bear close listening, and has a lot more to say than your run-of-the-mill "groovy" rock band -- they merit attention. MASON PROFFIT - "LAST NIGHT I HAD THE STRANGEST DREAM" - Ampex A-10138.

Riding a crest of Canadiana-consciousness comes the first album by Chuck Aarons and Jim Ackley -- who by the sound of songs like "Willie Boy" were a pair of folkies for quite some time. The addition of Ackley's piano work in "Lay Me Down" manages to place the sound close to that of Elton John's "Tumbleweed Connection" session.

In a song such as "Take Me Home" they are able to vary the tempo somewhat to add a further dimension to the material. But if Aarons & Ackley may be criticized for any breach of musical decorum it must surely be for the ever-so-slight tendency towards singing sharply (as opposed to flatly) which detracts from their close-harmony pairings.

Leaving off the rock trappings of drums, and tambourine-percussion, and only adding Ackley's keyboard backing and some subtle guitar interplay with bass, "Annalee" is a pretty, unpretentious melody that is given just enough feeling by A & A.

Their "Sailor Song" is treated as a folk-ballad with the most suble infusion of piano and strings, and the song merely begins and it is over. Their closing piece is a choral-backed composition -- "Let It Shine" -- with a repetitive chorus by most of the artists on the session. As a Canadian offering it ranks with the recent spate of albums which are finding their way to record counters after an extended period of being flatly ignored. AARONS & ACKLEY -- Capitol ST 6362.

Britain's Faces is a group which has an instant claim to fame -- the presence of Rod Stewart, whose solo albums have brought his name into prominence of late. Apart from this fortunate situation, the other four members of the aggregation (in particular Ian McLagan, on keyboards, and Ron Wood as lead, slide and pedal-steel guitarist) exhibit all of the prerequisites of a listenable, talented rock quintet.

The highlight of their "Long Player" album must surely be the extended (5:35) treatment of a song Rod intro's as one which no-one could have missed hearing -- McCartney's "Maybe I'm Amazed". Following Paul's arrangement with expertise, the Faces manage to add as much of their own flavour as any one can to a Beatle number. The guitar work is exceptional here, as it is on some other Faces songs, notably, "Sweet Lady Mary" and "Richmond".

Dump Warriors 51—3

Rugger Gaels Take OUAA Crown In Walk

Saturday was a beautiful Autumn day (at least in physical terms) and the Rugger Gaels added to its splendour by trampling the Waterloo Warriors 51-3, and clinching the first-ever OUAA Rugger Championship. The game was marked with hard tackling by both sides, resulting in many loose balls and set scrums, but the experience and coaching of the Gaels showed in the many fine breaks and setups which yielded multitudes of trys (and, of course, many demonstrations of the magic toe of Ron Easteal).

Fullback Alan Jeffery opened the scoring when he returned a Waterloo punt all the way. Easteal converted. Not to be outdone by the fleet little fullback, wing-forward Steve Shelley added another three when he scored on a fine forward rush spearheaded by Lee Doney. Easteal again converted. After a prolonged series of set scrums had moved the ball into Waterloo territory, scrum-half Terry Graham fed the ball to Easteal who split the uprights with a fine dropkick. Queen's 13, Waterloo, 0. Then things began to warm up. Geoff Cooper added a single try and Warren Smith a pair with Easteal converting two of the three, to quickly double the Queen's output. Finally, just before the half, lock-forward Herman Jillisen seized the ball in a line-out and lumbered into the end zone. Easteal's automatic toe made the score 31-0 Queen's at the half.

In the second half, the young Waterloo squad drove deep into Queen's territory on several occasions, but were unable to pierce the seasoned Gaels' defense until a Mr. Parker dropkicked a beautiful goal from fifty yards out to give the Warriors their three points. Aroused by this unwarranted intrusion upon their scoreboard, the Gaels began to return the attack. Peter Kopp, who had been called up from the seconds for the game, opened the assault with a diving plunge into the Warriors' end zone. Kopp also set up his fellow backs several times and generally played a strong game throughout. Easteal again converted. Warren Smith, the league's most prolific scorer of tries, counted two more (Easteal again, naturally), and diminutive scrum-half Terry Graham snuck across the line once, (Guess who, this time) to round out the scoring: Queen's 51, Waterloo 3.

The Rugger Gaels face only one more league opponent, the U. of T. Blues, but the game should be a thriller. Varsity has long been a thorn in the side of Queen's Rugger, and a lot of pride, as well as a long-term winning streak, will be on the line. Come on out to the West Campus next Saturday afternoon and support the Rugger Champs!

Hockey Gaels Down RMC 6—3

Bob Carnegie's icemen invaded RMC Thursday and came away with a 6-3 victory, despite going with a rookie-dominated lineup. Regulars Morris Mott and Clyde Harris did not dress for the encounter. Rookiegoalies Al Brown and Bill Minnes split netminding duties in Harris' stead.

The Gaels built up a six-one lead on goals by Dave Melloy, Murray Douglas and pairs from Steve Gross and Tim Bryant. Gross, a defenceman, was a pleasant discovery for Carnegie, who described him as a "take-charge guy -- the kind we need on defence". The better conditioning of R.M.C. showed late in the third period, when the Redmen scored twice.

W.I.C. News

With an exceptionally busy schedule last week, several W.I.C. events came to successful conclusions. Arts 75 girls carried off the top positions in badminton, with Mary Lee Robbins taking first and Patsy MacKimmie second.

The swimathon also met with good response. Arts '73 took first, P.H.E second, and Arts '72 third. The Synchro Swim meet, held Monday, attracted another good turnout. The schedule for continuing events follows:

Field Hockey Finishes 3rd.

The O.W.I.A.A. Field Hockey Championship s were held in two parts the last two weekends. The Semi-finals on Oct. 22 and 23 at York saw Queen's face York, McGill, and Toronto. Queen's took a 1-0 defeat at the hands of York before coming back to a 1-0 win over McGill. The Queen's girls forced a hard-fought game but had to bow 4-0 to the superior U. of T. team which featured two members of Canada's National team. The main story of the competition was in the shots on goal.

Queen's had a clear lead in this field, outshooting York 37-2 and McGill 27-1. The Queen's girls turned out to be remarkably adept at hitting the goal posts and cross-bar (much more difficult to hit than the enclosed area) but could not get the points they so badly needed, even though they controlled the play. The "B" team came through with a clean slate -- undefeated and unscored upon.

The Finals were held at Western on Oct. 29 and 30, with Queen's facing four competitors and earning two wins and two ties. They tied Guelph (0-0) and Waterloo (1-1) and defeated McMaster (3-1) and Western (2-0). The "B" team played well but were unable to maintain their previous record.

In the overall standing, Queen's ranked third of the eight universities involved, and had a very good season.

Queen's Once: Queen's Twice:

We Lost

By Dave Cameron

For the first time in a few years there will be no football in November for the Queen's Golden Gaels. On Saturday the Gaels stood and watched as the Western Mustangs rolled over, around, and through them en route to a 42-3 win, and a shot at the OUAA championship against the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees, who defeated McMaster 19-8.

It was day on which the Gaels could do nothing right (possibly due to lack of effort) and the Mustangs could do no wrong. Very simply, the Mustangs were "up" for the game, the Gaels were flat.

The statistics were surprisingly close considering the score. Western got only one more first down and about 100 more yards than did the Gaels. Of course, six turnovers didn't help the Gaels' cause.

Western's big guns did all the damage. Dave Kerr and Terry Harvey scored two touchdowns apiece and Bruce MaCrae scored the other one. McCrae looked especially impressive, gaining 98 yards by very tough, hard-nosed running. Brian Warrender was the leading rusher for the Gaels, with 80 yards in 11 carries.

The Gaels were first on the scoreboard with a 35-yard field goal by Doug Cozac, which started and finished the Gaels' offensive production for the day.

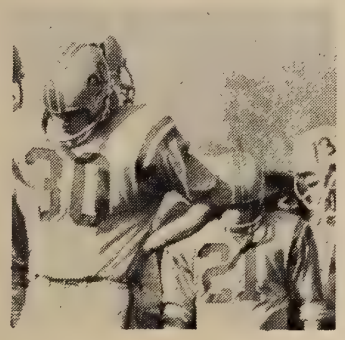
The Mustangs tied it up a couple of minutes later on a 32 yard Paul Knill field goal. Nothing of significance happened until the final play of the quarter. The play started on the Queen's 36-yard line, and ended with the ball in the firm grip of Mustang flanker Terry Harvey as he trotted into the Gael end zone. Guess which side of the defensive secondary was "covering" him?

The first part of the second quarter featured offsetting fumbles by Western's Dave Kerr and Gord McLellan, but little else. The good field position of the Mustangs eventually paid off, however, and a brilliant punt return by Dave Clarke set up a one yard touchdown run by Dave Kerr.

The Gaels promptly started a seemingly dangerous drive, got into Western territory, and gave the ball up on another McLellan fumble, his fourth in two weeks. This one proved costly, as the Mustangs got a safety touch when Stu Lang was downed in the end zone after taking Knill's punt.

With less than three minutes left in the half, Queen's kicked off from their 25, and the Western offence managed another field goal. The score at half time was 21-3.

The second half started as if neither team wanted to win. On the half's first play, Tom Taylor threw his first interception of the day. Two plays later, Fabiani fumbled on the Queen's 29, and Brian Rose recovered, delaying disaster.



It took two plays this time for Taylor to throw a pass to defensive half Jim Budge. From here, Western got down to business. Six plays later, Dave Kerr scored on a 3 yard plunge. The convert was good, and Western led 28-3. A couple of minutes later, Bruce MaCrae went over for another major, upping the margin to 35-3.

With 21 minutes left in the game, it was simply a matter of staying at the stadium until it's end for the Mustangs. There were a few signs of desperation on the part of the Gaels.

They tried the halfback pass play, but it, like everything else, didn't work. As predicted, we saw the shotgun play again, but this time it was Taylor trying it. This also proved fruitless.

The fourth quarter was, quite literally, dull. The teams traded series without results through most of the quarter. Western's final touchdown came on another Harvey bomb near the end of the game, a 38 yard catch.

Mike Lambros may be the best Gael defensive player, but did

Faces of defeat . . . but wait 'til next year

they have to announce his award after the defense had given up 42 points? But when your offence gives you just three points, and gives the ball away six times, no defense in the world is going to prevent the opponent from winning.

In the final analysis, much of the credit for the Western victory must go to the Mustangs themselves. No college team in the country could have beaten them on Saturday. It will be interesting to see if they are really that good when they play Ottawa next week. If they are, they'll go all the way.

Soccer Gaels drop Heartbreaker in Double Overtime

A large and often vociferous crowd fell suddenly quiet, stunned, after two and a quarter hours of an epic battle, stunned by the spinning of a ball in the meshing of a soccer net. Laurentian had scored the first goal of the semi-final game with Queen's in the fourth over-time period.

A few minutes of that period remained to be played, but the bubble was burst, and Laurentian had won, what surely must have been the longest intercollegiate soccer game ever, 1-0.

For Queen's it was the old story of the season: they had beaten themselves. Now that the season is over for them, we may as well call it fate that, time and time again, Queen's forwards just couldn't seem to get that ball into the net.

Throughout the game Queen's held a territorial advantage, and had more opportunities than their opponents, and with just one bit of luck would have won. As it turned out the game was to be decided on luck, and Queen's didn't have it.

After 90 minutes of regulation time, two 15 minute periods of extra time were played, still with no score. Most other leagues would rule a replay in this situation, or, if a decision was absolutely necessary, a succession of penalty kicks.

Undesirable as this latter solution is, it is doubtful whether the OUAA ruling of playing ten minute periods ad infinitum or until the game is decided, adds anything other than a mammoth exhibition for the spectators.

Presumably the philosophy behind the system is that the last surviving player will be able to decide the game -- but what if he misses his shot, and there's no one to take the goal kick?

A result depends on someone, through tiredness, making a stupid mistake. The teams being evenly matched, it seems inevitable that the one that tries harder offensively will lose, since it is more likely to suffer that defensive lapse. So it was with Queen's on Saturday.

They dominated the first ten minute period, and even with the wind against them in the second, were pushing Laurentian back into their end, until finally Laurentian broke into Queen's end, and a throw-in close to the line found an unmarked striker, with the goalie screened.

The game itself was full of incident, and kept the crowd, many of whom had never watched a soccer game before, excited to the end. The first twenty minutes saw the teams evenly matched, and perhaps a little tense, as both missed chances to score.

In the twenty-second minute, Queen's missed an open goal after a goal-mouth scramble, and three minutes later G. Taylor outpaced the defence but couldn't get his foot properly onto the ball.

Laurentian replied by setting up an unhindered shot for one of their strokers, but a diving save by Flood prevented the score.

The action swung from one end of the field to the other, reaching a climax in the last five minutes of the half as both goalies were in turn called upon to make spectacular saves.

Flood's sliding save, literally taking the ball off the feet of an oncoming forward No 7) was particularly courageous. Then, in the last minute, a corner kick from Prince was headed by G. Taylor onto the cross-bar. The ball bounced back out to Taylor's head, and he hit the cross-bar again. It just wouldn't go in!

Although Queen's were not playing the best football they were capable of, and Laurentian were continually threatening to score break-away goals, Queen's seemed to have the upper hand. Had they kept the ball on the ground more, their superiority over their taller opponents would have been more marked.

It also would have saved them a good many hard knocks in the air, that must have put a toll on their energies in the over-time periods.

In the thirteenth minute of the second half, Queen's again missed an open net to the frustrated groans of the spectators. Queen's continued to hold the territorial advantage, with Laurentian looking dangerous on the few occasions when they could break free. Queen's defensive four, with Mac Murray outstanding, gave a sound exhibition.

But the game now belonged to the goalkeepers, each of whom had demonstrated how difficult it would be for either team to score. This led however to a deplorable incident in the thirty-third minute of the second half.

A Laurentian forward, whom we shall identify only as No. 7, skilful and fast, but partial to foul tactics, broke past the defence to rush on the Queen's goal as he had done once in the first half.

Flood again came out to meet him. Perhaps sensing the danger, Flood, sliding in, decided to punch the ball away rather than gather it -- which he did successfully.

No. 7, however, apparently had a preconceived idea of the play, and though the ball was not there, he went through with his part of the plan, slashing Flood across the chest with his spikes, and kicking him in the mouth, snapping one of his front teeth in half.

We have no other description for No. 7 from Sudbury but animal. Though the referee had to warn this particular player several times, before and after this incident, he refused to send him off, apparently for the sake of an even game! Flood played on undaunted.

And so the game went into its over-time periods, by which time this writer had become too partisan to take any further notes on the action.

It was a thrilling game, and an unlucky one for Queen's, who thus finished their season as they began it: with a loss to an inferior team.

Laurentian go on to meet Toronto in the OUAA final in Toronto next Saturday.

Laurentian goalie goes up over Gaels Nick Drysdale and Gord Taylor on crucial corner kick.

MONTREAL - Two young women were killed and 340 persons were injured Friday night after almost 12,000 demonstrators protesting a newspaper lockout clashed with police and went a destructive spree throughout the downtown area.

An unidentified 18-year-old girl died in St. Luc Hospital of head injuries she received during an altercation with club-swinging members of the Montreal police riot squad.

A pregnant woman died after suffering an asthma attack and being trampled by a mob, which was pushed back by police on fast-moving motorcycles.

The woman, Mrs. Michelle Gauthier, 24, was first taken to Misericorde Hospital, near the action scene, was pronounced dead of asthmatic bronchitis on arrival at St. Luc Hospital. She was transferred from one hospital to the other because the first was not equipped to handle her case, authorities said.

A police spokesman said 60 arrests were made and about 75 policemen were treated for injuries at four downtown hospitals. The injuries included broken arms and legs.

The violence erupted when police cordons blocked a march of labor union members and youths who were heading for the La Presse newspaper building to protest lockouts resulting from a lengthy contract dispute.

La Presse, North American's largest French-language daily newspaper, suspended publication Wednesday until the dispute is settled. The dispute involved stereotypers, pressmen, photo-engravers and mailroom employees. La Presse has a circulation of 225,000.

Ronald Armstrong, a photographer for the newspaper Montreal Matin, said he was roughed up by police and detained for 90 minutes after he took pictures of the incident involving the girl who died of head injuries.

He said a group of demonstrators gathered at the corner of Ste. Catherine and Berri Sts. smashed an iron fence set up as a barricade, and threw it at police.

"One of the policemen dared the demonstrators to pick up sticks that were lying in the street," Armstrong said. "This girl picked up one stick and just as I turned around I saw her lying on the street, surrounded by policemen who were clubbing her. She was eventually dragged away by some of her friends."

The pregnant woman died about the same time after being caught in the middle of another group of demonstrators on St. Denis St. Onlookers said she appeared to be a Friday-night shopper who had joined the crowd out of curiosity.

ST. JOHN'S, Nfld. - Premier Joseph Smallwood clung tenaciously to power in Newfoundland Saturday, two days after the election that saw his 22-year-old Liberal domination of the island province crippled by a resurgent Conservative party.

Today, with final counts in from all but four ridings, the Liberals hold 20 seats, one less than the 21 captured by the Conservatives led by 38-year-old Frank Duff Moores.

The remaining seat went to Tom Burgess, leader of the New Labrador Party.

The Conservatives received 51 per cent of the popular vote, the Liberals 46 per cent.

HALIFAX - Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau walked out of a news conference late Friday while being questioned about federal assistance to the poor and the unemployed.

"I've had enough of this," he said and strode out.

When a reporter asked him whether the federal government could do more to alleivate the plight of welfare recipients. Trudeau replied: "No." He became irritated when the reporter persisted, asked him if he was aware of recent changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act, then walked out.

HALIFAX -The federal government will spend $95 million to get the Glace Bay heavy water plant in working order, Prime Minister Trudeau announced Friday.

The Nova Scotia government has poured $120 million into the project since 1963 and still has not got a plant that works. The plant, which was expected to bring prosperity to northern Cape Breton following the collapse of the coal industry there, was intended to produce the heavy water needed in the operation of the nuclear reactors that Canada manufactures for electric generation.

Construction of the plant in Nova Scotia was negotiated by the previous provincial administration of Robert Stanfield, now federal Conservative leader. The new administration of Gerald Regan, finding the plant parts corroded and useless, sought massive federal aid to get it in working order. The federal government told Atomic Energy of Canada Limited - the Crown corporation that makes nuclear reactors and which would buy the heavy water from the plant - to look the project over.

QUEBEC - Picket lines were set up Friday by 950 striking law students at Laval University to make others aware of the students' dispute, which centres on their demand for fewer lecture hours and greater representation on decision making bodies within the law faculty.

It was a sad week for Canadian newspaper publishing.

On Saturday, the 97 year old Toronto Telegram ceased publication. It was revealed that day that the Globe and Mail has purchased their presses and equipment, for a price of about $7 to $12 million.

The same day, the last issue of the Globe and Mail magazine appeared. In subsequent Saturday issues, the Weekend magazine will appear as the supplement. Books reviews will be carried within the paper.

Friday, the Chronicle-Telegraph in Quebec City, the only English daily in that city, announced that it would cease daily publication. The 200-year-old paper will now appear as a weekly.

Last Wednesday, La Presse in Montreal shut down indefinitely as a result of labour problems at that paper. The decision to close lead to the demonstration and subsequent riot, mentioned above.

VANCOUVER - A new protest against the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission's plan to explode a five-megaton bomb next week at Amchitka island in the Aleutians was launched Thursday in Vancouver.

The Amchitka Exodus Council, formed by Vancouver residents said it plans to lead a procession of cars, campers and trailers away from Vancouver starting Monday, and said similar processions are being organized in West Coast cities in the United States.

A council spokesman, Bruce Cameron, said the provincial Government had offered the use of all facilities in Manning Park.

TORONTO - Toronto Telegram Publisher John Bassett suspended the five-day-a-week column written by Ron Haggart on Oct. 8 because "I didn't wish to provide a platform for Mr. Haggart's views any longer."

Haggart said that Bassett gave him two reasons for killing the column - "irresponsible union activities" and Haggart's plan to devote his columns on the last three days of the Telegram's publication to his views of the paper's death.

When Haggart was hired 3½ years ago, Bassett had assured him that he could write what he liked "about the Argos football club, Maple Leaf Gardens or this paper."

THE WORLD

LONDON - Prime Minister Edward Heath won a smashing political victory Thursday night when the British House of Commons voted by a surprisingly large majority of 112 in favor of Britain joining the European Common Market.

Most political observers had expected Heath's majority to be only about half that number, and the massive support he received -- 356 votes to 244 -- was a severe rebuke to Labor opposition leader Harold Wilson, who opposed Heath's terms for entry. Sixty-nine of his 248 MPs cross the floor to assure Heath of his majority.

IRELAND - Prime Minister Brian Faulkner broke 50 years of tradition Wednesday when he appointed a Roman Catholic to a cabinet post in Protestant dominated Ulster.

Meanwhile, the British Army has said that it will fire on children who shoot at them after two youths 12 to 14 years old sprayed machine gun bullets at a British patrol on Wednesday.

WASHINGTON - The U.S. foreign aid program, which has dispensed $143 billion to other countries in economic and military assistance over the last quarter century, is dead.

In an astonishing move, the Senate Friday night voted 41 to 27 to kill a $2.9 billion aid bill that the House of Representatives already had passed and which President Richard Nixon said was vital for helping carry out U.S. foreign policy.

The Senate vote means, that after Nov. 15 funds can no longer be allocated for the direct aid program to 85 countries. There is, however, in excess of $4 billion in the treasury that will enable the completion of projects already started.

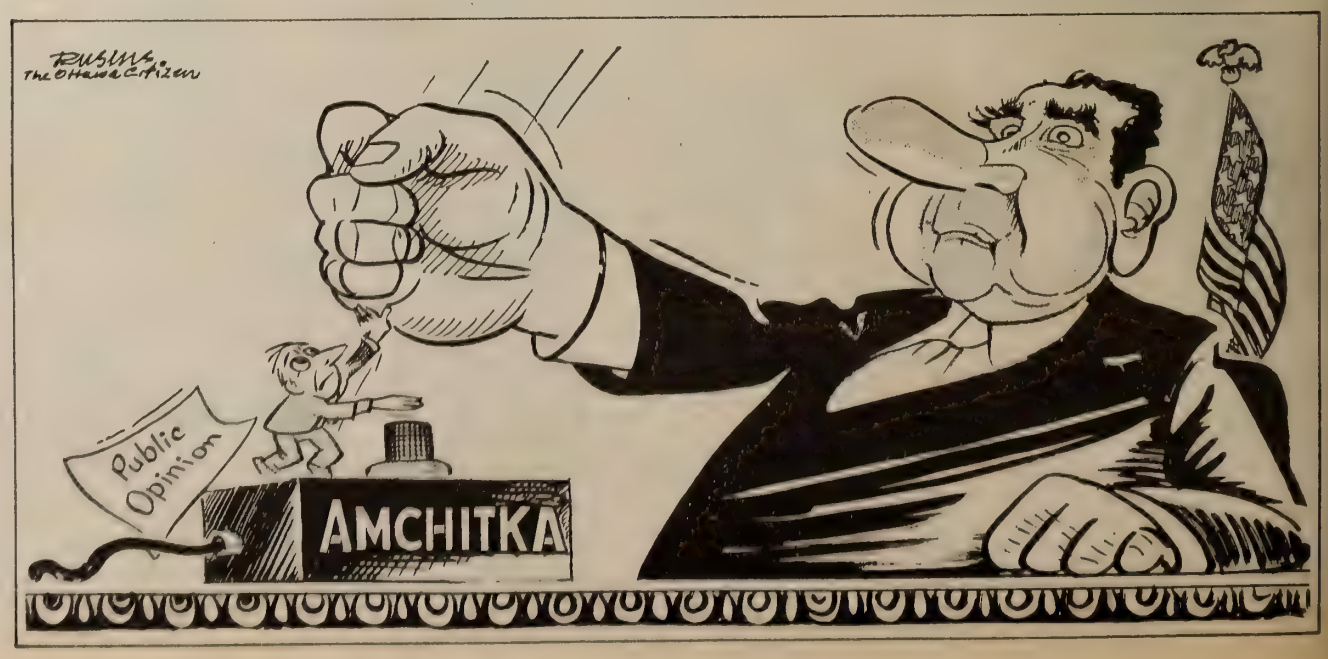
Whether the program will stay dead depends upon how successful the Nixon administration is in mounting a salvage operation, which Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott (R-Pa.) has said will be attempted.

President Nixon immediately denounced what he called the Senate's "highly irresponsible action" and called for "immediate restoration of the absolutely vital foreign assistance program so that we can continue the efforts to construct a more peaceful world."

The bill included military support for Israel, aid for beleaguered Cambodia and Laos, and funds to help the 9,000,000 East Pakistani refugees and various United Nations agencies.

The measure would have provided $549 million in economic aid to South Viet Nam, although war appropppriations under the $1.9 billion military procurement bill were not affected by the Senate action.

An informed public?



MONTREAL - Mayor Jean Drapeau said Friday he is the one person competent to decide when and to what extent citizens are to be informed about the municipal administration.

The population is happy with this arrangement Mr. Drapeau told reporters in a free-wheeling exchange about the flow of information from city hall.

He said if he allows himself to be questioned by reporters rather than reading statements on questions he considers worth dealing with, it create "confusion" and "conflict." And this in turn annoys the population which is "fed up" with "charges and counter-charges."

The mayor said his crushing 97 per cent win in the last election and 500 letters from citizens a week showed him that he was right.

"The people feel perfectly well informed. If they do not, they will tell me."

AMS court is still vacant

The AMS has been unable to choose members for the AMS court, which has four cases waiting to be heard.

At last week's executive meeting, a motion was presented -- and then tabled -- regarding the appointment of third-year law student Richard Lane as chief justice, Tim Bates, Smirle Forsyth, Susan Hall and Hildi Adelhelm as junior justices.

The motion ran into trouble because the AMS constitution require that one junior justice be a law student, and none of the four is. Court appointments have met with other problems as well. Justices are supposed to be chosen in the spring, by a committee consisting of the dean of the faculty of law, the retiring chief justice, and the retiring judicial commissioner (this position has now been changed to internal affairs commissioner).

But only dean of law D. A. Soberman is still here. Chief justice Arthur MacColl and AMS president Rod Follwell, who was acting judicial commissioner, have graduated. No appointments were made last spring; so any action taken this fall is illegal, strictly speaking, internal affairs commissioner Jim Richardson told the AMS meeting last week.

Soberman and Richardson will be choosing nominees this Friday, and the names will be presented to the AMS executive for approval Monday night, Richardson told The Journal.

If the names are approved, the court will meet Wednesday to discuss policy, and will start trying cases Saturday.

Birth control book given out

Six thousand copied of the "McGill birth control handbook" were distributed on campus by the AMS this year.

They cost the AMS $240, services commissioner Glenn Hall told The Journal, and were bought to "supplement" the handbook Modern Methods of Contraception, distributed at registration, which was written by Dr. Ted Johnston of the department of obstetrics and gynaecology at Queen's.

Hall said the McGill book, titled simply Birth Control Handbook, was purchased because "it was a more comprehensible report of birth control than the Queen's one."

It includes sections on abortion and sterilization which are absent from Johnston's book.

Hall added that the McGill publication was chosen in spite of its "political bias".

The book is written from a left-wing position: "For the past three years," it begins, "we have been working to provide men and women with the information they need to control their own bodies."

Its introduction discusses the politics of the population control movement: "We are concerned by the rising of a new movement which seeks to destroy and take away what control many men and women have finally obtained."

The book calls for "basic social change" to solve the problems of hunger, pollution, crime, racism and war.

Then it discusses male and female anatomy; hormones and the menstrual cycle; sexual intercourse; conception; oral contraceptives; intrauterine devices; the condom; diaphragm and jelly; vaginal spermicides; rhythm; coitus interruptus; other methods; sterilization; effectiveness; new methods; abortion; and venereal disease. There is a long bibliography.

The aim of future purchases of birth control books, Hall said, will be "to get the most thorough treatment of birth control with the least political and moral biases".

The McGill book has been condemned as immoral by Catholic women's organizations and banned in some schools. It was distributed in small quantities in Kingston high schools, and an earlier edition was handed out at Queen's two years ago.

Parking experiment announced

The university has announced the first reconsideration since on-campus parking regulations were adopted in October 1970.

For two weeks beginning next Monday, cars with Queen's parking permits can red - blue - green - orange - black restriction, which normally specifies which parking lots a car may use, will not apply during this period.

The two-week test is intended "to evaluate the colour zone parking system as opposed to a system without zones," according to parking director R. I. Luker.

Information about where cars actually do park will be collected during the two weeks, Luker said. In addition, written comments about the parking system are invited, and should be directed to the parking office in the interim administration building.

"Revisions to the present parking regulations will not be made without full consultation of the constituents concerned," Luker's statement said.

Queen's staff do their things

Recent awards and activities to Queen's people:

History professor Dr. Hilda Neatby received an honorary LL. D. degree at the fall convocation of the University of Saskatchewan (Regina) last week. She taught at Saskatchewan for 44 years before coming to Queen's to write a history of the university. Dr. Neatby was presented to the chancellor of that university, John G. Diefenbaker, by its principal, Dr. John Archer, who was archivist at Queen's until two years ago.

Henry Fleming, a former personnel officer for Molson's Breweries and Dupont of Canada, and a past president of the Montreal group of Queen's alumni, became associate director of the personnel department last week. He will be responsible particularly for labour relations, dealing with the three union locals now in operation on campus -- two of the Canadian Labour Congress and one of the Canadian Union of Public Employees. (Staff of the public relations department have applied for certification as a second CUPE local.)

J. A. Corry

Former principal Dr. J. Alex Corry is delivering the 1971 Massey Lectures on CBC radio. The topic is "The Power of the Law", and the lectures are heard on the AM network Monday nights immediately after the 11 p.m. news and on the FM network Tuesdays and Thursdays at 7 p.m.

Corry's topics include "law as reason and custom', "law as command", "obedience and disobedience", "due process", "civil rights", and "the constitution". Corry, who was principal of Queen's from 1961 to 1968, is co-author with Dr. J. E. Hodgetts of the standard political science text, Democratic Government in Canada.

Corry has also been awarded the John Hammett Medal by the New York City alumni group, a presentation made annually "in recognition of contributions to the welfare of Queen's University".

AMS rents out 23 houses

The AMS Housing Agency has at present, 23 houses on lease to students, three of which are apartment dwellings on University Avenue. There will be more available throughout the year. Interested students should submit an application to the AMS office. When a house becomes available, the policy is "first come, first served."

The agency aims to keep rents at a reasonable level and to offer students accommodation close to the university. The rent per student is approximately $500 per year. But as there is sometimes disparity among housing facilities, square frontage and the age of the building are also taken into account.

The Housing Agency is eager for "new blood" to help its running. If interested leave your name in the AMS office.

Taxi fares up

It costs more to get to the Manor these days. Kingston taxi firms have raised their rates; Amey's Taxi, the largest of the firms, gave the following rates to The Journal Tuesday evening:

75c for one person (it was 60c)

25c for each zone crossing. (it was 15c)

25c for each extra person (it was 15c for the second and third person, 30c each thereafter)

But, with more than one person, there is no extra charge for the first zone change.

SEEING there is nothing (right well beloved Students in the Mathematickes) that is so troublesome to Mathematicall practise, nor that doth move, molest and hinder Calculators, than the Mutiplications, Divisions, square and cubical extractions of great Numbers, which besides the tedious expence of time are for the most part subject to many slippery Errors, I began therefore to consider in my Minde, by what certaine and ready Art I might remove these Hindrances (John Napier, 1614) The math department uses APL for this.

Who gets into Queen's?

A university committee recommends that admissions to Queen's be based on extracurricular work and special talents as well as on academic accomplishments.

And, it says, Kingston residents and children of Queen's graduates should have preference when the university has to choose between equal applicants to enter Queen's.

The committee, which was set up by the university council the the spring of 1970, issued its report in mid-October. Its recommendations will go to the council, which is primarily a body of alumni whose function is to advise the university on what it should do. Except for ceremonial duties, the university council has little power.

But the special committee on admissions which it set up is being taken seriously by the university. Its members were assisted in their work by the office of academic planning, and a survey it helped conduct in September 1970 was also used by the student employment service in making its plans.

The major recommendation the committee makes is that Queen's should have an explicit admissions policy, since admissions is "an integral part of the long-run planning process'.

And the principles on which applicants are admitted to Queen's should be set forth by the senate, it says.

Then the report discusses just what the policy should include: "We recommend that the existing admission policy be replaced by the principle of a scale of weights in the admission of each freshman student."

These would include "special talents and abilities" including "natural gifts which allow an individual to perform in an outstanding way"; musical and literary talent are given as two examples.

Second, the report lists extracurricular accomplishments of the student, including school, athletic and community activities.

And third it mentions "measures of academic competence including attitudes and capacity for independent and original work". This should be considered important enough that an applicant could be admitted on academic grounds alone, the recommendations say.

When an application is considered, one factor should be "the candidate's personal statement about himself", one recommendation says.

A lengthy recommendation deals with people who might not ordinarily be admitted to Queen's, and particularly urges that special consideration be given to Canadian Indian applicants.

Special aid should be given to "students from disadvantaged backgrounds", it says. One proposal is that there be "a transitional year of studies, to involve a small specially selected group of students who would not otherwise have had an opportunity to attend university".

Children of alumni should not get special consideration, the report says -- except that when two equal candidates are being considered and there is only room for one of them, children of graduates should be taken first. The same advantage should be given to Kingston residents, the report says.

It proposes that more students from outside Ontario be admitted to Queen's. (Only 20.6 percent of Queen's students come from outside Ontario, according to a table included with the report.)

That table shows that Queen's students come chiefly from eastern Ontario (40.2 per cent) and central Ontario (27.8 per cent).

Tables describing the background of students who come to Queen's show that the median income of parents is around $14,000 per year. About one-seventh of Queen's students have parents who earn more than $25,000 a year; about one-fourteenth have parents earning less than $5,000.

The fathers of more than half of all Queen's students went to university; fathers of 36 per cent graduated.

The report includes a discussion of the philosophy which should underlie admissions to Queen's. It must be "consistent with the history, environment and capacities of the university," and must reflect the proposition that the university must have a social dimension, which "appears no longer to be seriously disputed".

The admissions process is one of the most important points at which the university comes into contact with the general public, the report says. It affects the public image of the university, and also results in "significant social and economic advantages" to people who are selected to enter university.

Queen's must balance the "high standards of scholastic excellence" which belong to an academic institution, against the dangers of policies which keep the university as the preserve of an academic elite, the introduction to the report goes on. Accordingly, an admissions policy based only on academics is not fair to the public -- or to the university. "The great university does not venerate scholarship to the exclusion of creativity or artistic sensibility or independence of thought or whatever other attitudes of mind and personality give intellectual life meaning".

The present admissions policy leans heavily on academics, the report points out, and this emphasis needs serious reexamination. The proposals which the report makes will be considered in coming weeks by the principal of Queen's.

How to get your man

BC

Girls, I want to begin this article congratulating you on your fine choic universities. Using vertical mosaic crit Queen's is the epitome of middle and upper potential professional marriage material. I to remind you that although money is n prime importance, I am often reminded saying my grandmother was wont to utter: more confortable to cry in a mink coat".

So, girls, if you are in third year Ho English, like me, you'd better start hustling fat little unathletic asses to capture that s man. Sit down and read this article next to record player and learn these val techniques to the music of either: 1. Ta Wynette's "Stand by your man", 2. F Zappa's What is the ugliest part of your bo or "American Womanhood".

Assisting me in my study of tips fo potential bride is Mrs. David Walker, wh taken time out from her busy day of d cooking and teaching to share with yo benefits of her marriage experience. consulted (and creator of the accompa explanatory diagrams), was Miss Eliz Hague who, during her university career, to share her man, but has gained some val insights into the cause of her failure sinc time. I, myself consider that my varied past has equipped me with a basic knowle the do's and don't of feminine allure.

What to look for in Him:

A. Tall and slim is the preferable body t phallic symbol, you know), but if you can the Patrick Riley's of the campus, you'll h settle for the Victor Bradley's. What you w hair the length of the Eaton's model. again, Patrick is a choice example). Thi commital length allows him to mingle plea with your freaky friends as well as your His clothing should resemble either a business exec. or a fastidious hippy: (Alt you obviously like a sense of passionate ab you don't want him to jeopardize his eco future by alienating the business world).

On The Date

1) Read Ann Landers on necking and and who sets the limits. Read especially t which says: "Remember, if he really love he'll respect your wishes". Read this lin and over before each date.

2) When forced to deal with an intell here is a handy tip: After he has asked heavy question, request that he be more e concerning the second word of the questio to avoid pinpointing "and's" or "but's".

3) Remain feminine. You must never him in English, Sociology, Art History o Psychology, and learn all the arts which to a man's domestic instincts: cooking, s crocheting, painting, writing poetry, ma and beading (to make him a perso choker).

Mix business & pleasure & take advantage of low overseas air fares. Get your abortion in London & boywatch in Picadilly.

When Sex Rears its Ugly Head

1) Use FDS (or is it FSM? I always get those two mixed up.)
2. As my grandmother was wont to say when she wasn't commenting on fur coats: "Don't leave your sense of humor on the bedside table".
3. Birth control: There is absolutely no need for this. The potential husband does not expect you to relinquish your precious maidenhead even for him. At this point I would like to direct you to the professional faculties, where the husbands are. The Arts boys are just out for a ball, and besides they have absolutely no upward social mobility.
4. Read love comics. We recommend Marvel and D.C. Within these pages you'll find lots of handy phrases for those tricky moments. Don't forget to benefit from the lovelorn advice: Never pass up the opportunity to learn from the mistakes of others.

How to get your Man

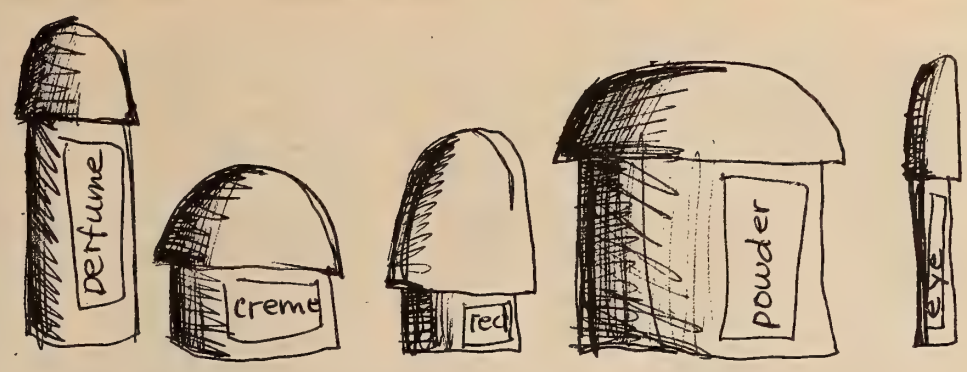
1. You should never wear a bra that slips off instead of unhooking. The trauma of such a discovery may dampen his enthousiasm.
2. Don't look bored when he's making a pass.
3. Don't mention marriage overtly, just talk in terms of "how nice kids are", and when he's hooked on having you around, propose to him. (Don't wait for him; it's not in vogue for men these days. They're supposed to be "finding themselves" for the next fifty years.)
4. Don't wink at Patrick Riley when you're with someone else.
5. Having made mistakes 1-4, your abortion costs can now be charged to OHSIP.

Where to Meet the Boys

Be an AMS constable. As well as having license to frisk all desirable sports fans, you may, if you play your cards right, charm your way into the arms of the chief.

Go to 1957 dances. It's amazing how erotic a jive can be. If sweat doesn't offend your aesthetic sensibilities, your man may be waiting to dance that last dance with you.

Go to AMS meetings. The fare here is certainly tempting, but if you plan to follow up this lead, we suggest a special tolerance for male chauvinist pigs.



Notes on the Authoresses:

Ann Vogl, an ex social butterfly, is now concentrating on getting a B average and a meaningful relationship with her man.

Miss Elizabeth Hague is sexessfully establishing herself as welfare recipient and free-lance artist.

Mrs. David Walker subscribes to the theory that you should never stop growing because there are always men around with more endowments than your husband.

It's a fucking good thing nobody reads this paper.

Today, cosmetics are on the tip of every girls tongue. They come in all shapes and sizes with many different guarantees, so that your choice is often difficult. Your best decision can only be reached by experimenting with different varieties.

Girls, often a little female intuition can mean the difference between heartbreak and marriage. Here's an ingenious little, handy-hint; if that "big date" finds you "indisposed", why not remove all chances of telltale odor by substituting an air-wick for a "you-know-what".

Things are happening on campus, you know

... in artsci

Students in psychology and geology have been asked by principal Dr. John J. Deutsch to comment on what kind of person should be the new chairman in those departments.

Department heads Dr. W. R. Thompson (psychology) and Dr. H. R. Wynne-Edwards (geological sciences) have resigned effective next summer, and committees are to be set up to look for their successors.

Meanwhile, a university statement has asked faculty and students to comment "on the present state and future prospects of the department and the type of person they would like to see as head".

Comments should be directed to arts and science dean Dr. Ronald L. Watts.

"If the views are in writing, students are asked to state whether they are willing to have their letters shown, in confidence, to the members of the Search Committee," the statement said.

After the search committees are set up they will probably meet with the departmental student councils and possibly listen to other student opinions.

... in meds

Two changes in the faculty of medicine were approved at recent meetings of the university senate.

Last week's meeting approved the setting up of a department of family practice, to teach general medicine -- a speciality in which Queen's is outstanding, the senate was told.

The September meeting agreed to change the name of the department of otorhinolaryngology to the department of otolaryngology, "to conform to the practice at other universities" and to make it easier to spell.

...in law

The forty-member faculty board of the faculty of law has approved the addition of two more student representatives, bringing the total to nine.

They will be student senator Arthur Ault and another member of the Law Society executive, not yet chosen.

At present, Law Society president Lesley Cook is the only Law Society representative on the board, which is the governing body for the faculty of law. The other six students are elected two from each year society.

The proposal to increase student representation was introduced last spring and approved by the university senate last week.

One of its purposes, Miss Cook said, is to increase the voice of the Law Society executive in comparison with spokesmen from the year societies.

Appeal not working

Student response to the United Appeal fund drive this year was below expectation, AMS external affairs commissioner Chris Dundas told the Journal.

He said the collection boxes in Douglas Library and the Union had excellent response, but other programmes have been less successful.

In early October letters were sent to all the faculty societies requesting contributions; only commerce contributed Dundas said.

And only seven of about 150 floor seniors and proctors have returned money from canvassing their floors, he said, raising about $20.

It is unfortunate that more students have not contributed, Dundas said. He pointed out that if every student gave 25c the total collection would have been more than $2000.

Open hour's petition shelved

The Women's Residence Council has received a petition asking for 24-hour open hours, but has decided not to do anything about it at present.

The petition will be "held back" until the question of coed residences for next year has been settled, WRC president Cindy Davidson told The Journal.

A second petition for full open hours -- allowing men visitors in women's rooms at any time was started by first-year women in Chown Hall and is now being circulated in residence.

Vicky Wilgress, Georgina Binks and Jennifer Chance started their petition late last week; by Tuesday it had nearly a hundred names from Chown Hall alone. It will be presented to the WRC executive Saturday, Miss Chance said.

A petition with 100 signatures is sufficient to call a referendum of women in residence.

The petition asked that "in view of the widespread support for coed residence 24-hour open hours should be put into effect for the duration of the 1971-72 academic year. It should be started on an experimental basis with an eye to its permanence in conjunction with coed residence next year. This would also give those in residence a better indication upon which to judge coed residence."

Miss Wilgress is social convenor of Artsci 75.

Laying of underground pipes continues, to provide steam, gas, water, power, and sewers for the arts-social sciences complex north of Watson Hall. Blasting through the "good old Kingston limestone" is continuing, physical plant administrator O. L. Parking story correction

Hungry type lice chewed away a line from the second paragraph of the front page story in Thursday's edition of The Journal.

The second paragraph should have read:

"For two weeks, beginning next Monday, cars with Queen's parking permits can use any on-campus lot. The red - blue - green - orange - black restriction, which normally specifies which parking lots a car may use, will not apply during this period."

Laboratory explodes

An explosion Tuesday night smashed windows, damaged equipment and brought firemen to extinguish a blaze at the basic sciences building on Stuart Street across from Adelaide Hall.

The explosion occurred in a laboratory refrigerator about 10:20 p.m. Tuesday. No one was in the building at the time.

A radioactivity warning is posted on the lab where the explosion occurred, and firemen did not enter it until neurology professor Dr. H. B. Dinsdale, who is responsible for the lab, made sure the radioactive source was undamaged.

Graduate student Richard Haas, who had been working in the lab during the day, said he could not recall any explosive substances being put in the refrigerator.

The explosion may have been the fault of cooling equipment in the refrigerator, Dinsdale said later. There were no traces of explosive substances in the chemicals which the explosion left scattered in part of the building.

Hass is a good student, Dinsdale pointed out, and unlikely to have made a serious mistake with chemicals.

Dinsdale also said he did not think any other laboratories had been damaged, and that the research equipment apparently was not affected by the explosion.

But side windows of the building were blown out and glass was strewn over the sidewalk and lawn when Adelaide Hall residents and passers-by who heard the explosion arrived on the scene.

Thick smoke came from the laboratory where the blast took place, and firemen poured water into the explosion area.

The fire call, turned in by Victoria Hall night-man Vic Lea, was the first of a dozen on-campus alarms this year that was not a false alarm. Adelaide Hall, across the road from the research building, has been especially plagued with alarm malfunctions this fall.

The fire department is investigating the exact cause of the explosion.

It's Suzie-Q Week all the year round

Suzie-Q Week reverses the social roles the sexes play at Queen's. But an increasing number of students, not bound by convention any time of the year, are enrolled in academic programmes which traditionally belong to the other sex. The Journal interviewed five of them.

"We expected it all"

"It is the same as having twenty brothers," Marie Iwaniw explained, talking about her third-year engineering physics class.

"However, when I skip a class, everyone knows about it," she said. And she added that professors tend to ask her more questions.

She is not new to all-male classes; during high school she took some courses, not available at her school, from an all-male high school nearby.

Only two engineering freshettes took part in initiation 1969, Miss Iwaniw said. It was a bit gross, she pointed out. "but we just sat there and expected it all."

She was advised not to attend Inebriety, she said, but did take part in the grease pole climb -- throwing tomatoes.

A brother relationship

Edward Sobien left arts for rehabilitation therapy two years ago. and has been the only man in a class of twenty women for both of those years. But being in a class of girls can be advantageous, he said; they are always ready to help him out.

His presence in the class has become more of a brother relationship than anything else, he said.

"At times it was quite embarrassing, however," he said, since physiotherapy requires fairly intimate knowledge of the human physique. But this seemed to bring the male-female relationship to a greater understanding of each other, Sobien said.

He has one factor in his favour, he said: most of the professors are male. Since they had to go through what he is doing now, they are likely to understand his position.

Sobien added that he has found great enjoyment in classes where the male-female ratio is low.

More male acquaintances

Last year Beverly Bishop was a nursing freshette at Queen's. This year she is in first-year engineering, one of two girls in a class of fifty men. And from having mostly female friends last year, she has more male acquaintances this year, she says.

"In engineering, with all those men . . ." is a phrase which she hears constantly from less fortunate freshettes with looks of awe on their faces. But Miss Bishop says a girl can fit into a class with men and not be out of place.

"A girl in the class was somewhat of a novelty at first," she said, and "whenever I asked a question in class everyone would turn around to see where the non-male voice was coming from."

But she is increasingly being accepted, Miss Bishop says, and special attention is becoming limited to opening doors and offering her a seat.

It hardly seems strange

Being the only woman in second-year metallurgical engineering does not bother Judith Atkinson; taking classes with eighteen men hardly seems strange to her, she said.

"If I were to walk into a room full of girls, it would bother me." she said.

Coming to Queen's from McGill University, where she spent a year studying architecture, Miss Atkinson said she feels at ease with men. At first the men were very aware of her sex, she said, but they soon got used to her presence.

Her own first apprehension was whether they would act differently because she is a woman, she said, but she was soon assured by their friendliness and self-control.

WINTER SOCIAL EVENTS

All campus groups wishing to sponsor a social function next term must fill out an application form in the AMS office by November 12. Res women well conditioned

It is interesting to note that one obvious example of the sexual stereotyping described in your Tuesday's article "No more sugar and spice" may be taken from another article, "Coed Res Hits Roadblock", found in the same issue. The inadequate facilities and austere decor of the Gordon-Brockington residence seem well suited to the tough, aggressive character of the Queen's male, but heaven forbid that the gentle, sensitive Queen's female be subjected to such rigours.

We have indeed been well conditioned.

The Old Library Mystery

Dear Buddies,

Rocky and me, we don't read too heavy, but sometimes after a few jugs at the Wheel we do like to go to the Douglas to get one of our favourite Hardy Boys books. The only trouble is, the episode we always want at the time usually isn't on the shelves. This state of affairs was not always so much the case, it seems to us, and it strikes us as rather odd that our favourite books have become steadily more difficult to get hold of since the new computer system made the Douglas Library vastly more efficient.

What is even more disconcerting however, is that not even through the holding system can we be sure of getting our book. Just last week, for example, Rocky asked the desk to hold a copy of The Old Mill Mystery, but since the impersonal efficiency of the grand new computer system seems to make the library staff unaware of the person to whom they're giving the book, ten other unprincipled students who wanted The Old Mill Mystery were able to take out all ten copies "illegally" before Rock could make the scene.

When Rock turned up with overdue copies of The Phantom of Rock Hollow and The Secret of Wildcat Swamp, though, he was immediately ripped off for an enormous fine, despite the fact that he wanted to renew them for the second time to take more extensive and much-needed study notes. (Like most Queen's students, Rock has always been a demon for self-improvement) The computer keeps omnipotent records of ripoffs so that the necessity to pay its demands are now much more inexorable than in the days of humanity when Christian charity and mercy were possible. Now it's the quality of Rock's billfold that's strained.

Rock and me, we're kinda baffled. By way of the thousand natural shocks that flesh is heir to, we always sorta thought you got what you paid for.

Letter to Queen's Men

The discussion at the recent A.M.S. meeting (October 25) concerning the budget, prejudice in favour of athletics, and the validity of intercolligiate activities (refering to sports) caused me concern. Many of the people who will vote on such athletic issues are the same people responsible for making the Arts initiation what it is today, a very wishy washy, truely ARTSIE type initiation.

Queen's is proud of her athletes and I would not like to see the money or any part of the money presently spent on athletics used for other purposes. One possible suggestion that might come from some members of the A.M.S. if the cuts are allowed to go through; could be the offering of FREE FINGER PAINTING LESSONS for each and every Queen's student, held Saturday afternoons using some of the money SAVED by cutting back on the expenses of that "NASTY OLD ATHLETICS PROGRAM". Or we could always have more FUN CLUBS.

If your feelings are similar to the ones expressed above, let the A.M.S. hear from you before these issues can be raised again, as the Journal indicated they would be.

If you disagree, just think if the present trend continues you may be able to send your son or daughter to the number one ARTSIE university in Canada, Queen's. Who's policies would be, don't haze the frosh, all students should attend their FREE FINGER PAINTING and ART APPRECIATION classes and last but not least, wear your 'tams frosh' but only if you want to. The Journal would be carrying the following notice at the start of the fall term;

Due to cut backs in athletic funds and a redistribution of these funds into the art projects for the students, it has been announced that all regular season home football game tickets will have to be purchased by the individual students.

Open letter to chief librarian

Dear Editors;
(An open letter to D.A. Redmond, chief librarian, Douglas Library):

Frustration seems to be my lot in life when it comes to dealing with the Douglas Library. Now I refer specifically to the Library's policy of allowing periodicals, present in the stacks, to be checked out of the library by undergraduates for a week and by graduates for a month (and by staff for God knows how long).

Due to the frequent need to consult periodicals especially those of up to five years in age and because of the library's lack of duplicate copies for these volumes, once they are removed (and a check of the shelves housing periodicals will reveal that at least these five years are oftentimes missing) reading and research are often terminated in frustration.

The Library's present policy baffles me for either the adminstration is unaware of the current state of the social sciences in which periodicals are the primary source of material and not books or the administration just does not care -- which I find difficult to believe.

Perhaps an explanation of the present policy would clarify matters.

I would suggest two alternatives to the present policy: (a) cease the present policy and thus force people to use all periodicals within the Library itself or (b) purchase duplicate copies which would remain in the Library.

The former solution would seem to be the easiest and the least expensive for removing the frustration of many periodical users.

Damning the critic's critics

Dear Editors:

The mongrel head of Kween's Spirit surfaced again in the Journal, Nov. 2, as respondents Bowden, Watts, and McDonald belched fumes of indignant disapproval over Journal drama critic, Sandy Naiman. That Kween's Spirit that brings rabbit-like response to criticism: - startled, but short-lived, with the main characteristic a lack of self-criticism, (due mainly to the self-satisfied complacency this intoxicant induces.)

How typical it was to see these inebriates hurling abuse at S.M. for her "unwarranted personal insults"(!) in a drama criticism, (that was perhaps rather vehement in expression), and doing so in a most obnoxious personal fashion with as little reserve or wit as they accused her of!

They made few references to S.N.'s actual criticisms, but if they expect Sandy Naiman, or anyone else, to accept a piece of nonsense that casts a balding sixty year old man as the younger brother of a twenty year old, in the spirit of Kingston productions, then I'm afraid they're asking us to become completely sloshed on Kween's Spirit!

Incidentally, in an age sensitive to Women's Liberation, they should refrain from making assumptions about S.N.'s marital status, no matter how greatly the epithet "Miss" improves their style.

Bad show, fellows! Too bad!

Walter G. Spunde.

More criticism

Dear Editors;

After having seen Theatre Five's production of "The Importance of Being Earnest", I was convinced, unfortunately, that Kingstonians must be culturally deprived.

After having read the letter written by Mr. Bowden, Miss Watts, and Mr. McDonald (Journal, Nov. 2) which tore apart Sandy Naiman's hilarious review, I now feel that they, hopefully not representative of the Queen's student body, are culturally deprived as well.

They seemed guilty of the same crimes which they attributed to Miss Niaman - thoughtlessness, tastelessness and tactlessness. They "tear and hack instead of cutting clean."

Parking damage

Dear Editors:

On the morning of October 20, my convertible, which was parked in the underground parking lot on Clergy St., had its top slashed and was broken into. There was nothing of value in the car and luckily for me the thief was not vindictive and left the rest of the car alone.

This is not the first time since September that a car has been broken into while parked in the underground lot and will not be the last time, unless the University decides to hire a night watchman for the area. After all, surely for the ridiculourly high sum of $26 a term I have to pay for the privilege of parking, the university can provide more than a couple of white lines to put my car between.

Already this term, the lights in the lot have been broken and a false alarm set off. When will the University provide a watchman? After all the cars are stolen?

Dear Editors;

To the Students of Queen's re the Amchitka demonstration:

Do the students of Queen's lack the courage of their convictions or do they lack any convictions at all. It is not novel to talk about the apathy of Queen's students but when you experience it, it sheds a rather painful light of reality on an already well known fact.

I am talking about the reaction to the Amchitka blast scheduled for next Saturday. If anyone has no opinion on this issue, then I question his right of citizenship. If someone does have a conviction, as most I have met do, they are most probably against it. Why, then, when a peaceful demonstration at the Ivy Le Bridge was organized for Wednesday was there no more than five to ten students from this hallowed ivy tower. (I counted five- the figure ten is an optimistic approximation). The demonstration made its point but was rendered somewhat ineffective by the small number of participants. St. Lawrence College made up the slightly more than 100 involved. I don't know the number of students at St. Lawrence, but five out of 9,000 is one shit of a turn out for Queen's.

This generation does a lot of patting itself on the back for being so concerned and for being the "peace generation." I feel after two years here that that pat should be a kick and it should be located a bit lower on the torso. If you really believe it is wrong, show that you do, for nothing is gained from a lazy pessimistic silence. We condemn our parents' generation for the situation of the world today - well, if you are paying more than lip service to the "in" opinion of the age, get off your asses - please.

APATHY? WHO CARES.

Rocky and Spike - arrogant leftists

The letter of Robin Beaudoin and Donald McGeorge on the results of the election in Kingston is such a fine example of the arrogance of the left that I feel some comment from the opposite end of the political spectrum is called for. (It will certainly be a unique experience for many to see a Conservative opinion expressed in the Journal.)

The heavy-handed and vicious sarcasm of these two gentlemen questions the intelligence of the Queen's voter and the character of Mr. Apps.

The sarcasm in their letter is based on the assumption that no reasonable voter could conceivably support the Conservatives unless pressured into doing so, given the fact that the opposition (especially, I presume, the N.D.P.) is the sole guardian of truth and enlightenment.

The Ontario election, like so many others in the past, is "yet another testimonial to the fact that brute force and ignorance will vanquish all opposition when that opposition is encumbered with mere competence and literacy."

This crude and desperate attempt to excuse the failure of the left cannot obscure the truth. All three candidates in this riding appeared frequently on campus, and all made a strong bid for the student vote.

On the basis of these personal encounters, and on the strength of the party positions, a majority of the voters in residence supported Mr. Apps.

As it happens, this support secured his re-election. To assert that this Queen's support was not rational is a feeble excuse at best, and an insult to the student voters.

The attack of these two gentlemen on the character of Mr. Apps is also a low and vicious tactic. Because he has played professional hockey, he is portrayed as some kind of rural idiot.

This really does not fit the facts terribly well. But obviously Mr. Apps must be made to fit the stereotype of the ignorant, reactionary Conservative. A little character assassination fits in very well with the dogmatic biases of this letter.

Perhaps if Beaudoin and McGeorge had made a real effort to enlist support for their candidate before the election, things would be different. As it is, their arrogant and snide attack on the winner reflects no credit on the left wing in Ontario.

If they cannot accept the expressed will of the people without sarcastic whimpering, then they really should not involve themselves in politics.

At a rap session with youngsters in Newfoundland, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau tried to explain to a sceptical girl why it wouldn't be what she called "blackmail" for the United States to put pressure on Canada to make water available to it.

"They would make us realize that we cannot get along without their technology and capital," Mr. Trudeau said. "That's blackmail," the girl objected. "No, that's buying and selling," shrugged the Prime Minister.

-Toronto Star, Aug. 11, 1971.

Mr. Stanley Knowles: In view of the fact that one of Canada's chartered banks has predicted that unemployment in 1972 will probably be of the order of 6.4 per cent, the same average that was expected this year, can the Prime Minister say whether it is the government's target or does the government have something better, and, if so, what is it?

Right Hon. P.E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is not our target, Mr. Speaker. We have something better. You will see if you just wait another year.

What good does it do?

by Leslie Kaye

The reforms promised by the "Green Revolution", a world-wide programme to improve the agricultural yield in underdeveloped countries, are not forthcoming. The gap between the rich and the poor in countries such as Pakistan and India is widening because new agricultural technology is not using labour on the farms as it could do, contends Gunnar Myrdal, Swedish economist. Workers are being driven into the cities where industry is not yet ready to absorb them. At the same time, Myrdal says, rural unemployment or underemployment "forces people down the economic and social ladder, making owners tenants, and tenants landless workers, while fragmenting small farms."

The Green Revolution has, in the past five years, increased indigenous grain productivity, mainly by intensive modern cultivation of limited areas by well-to-do farmers. But Myrdal has pointed out that "taking into consideration the great and generally increasing income inequalities in these countries, undernutrition among the poor masses of people is more serious than appears from the average figures of food consumption...Malnutrition is even more pronounced."

Because high-yield grains have proved successful in some progressive areas Myrdal has noted a type of "technocratic euphoria" -- the wide-spread belief that the so-called "food self-sufficiency" is enough. This euphoria neglects the fact that the starving masses are not being supplied with food. The starving do not create a demand because the pennliess obviously cannot pay for goods received. Therefore they do not create a market.

Myrdal calls for direct aid to the masses on much larger scale, and this is where I disagree with him. China, as the example of how a country could develop, presents an opposite attack to the problem. The only way to force India, Pakistan, etc., to develop viable, selfsustaining economies is to cut them off completely from all types of foreign aid. The Western "hand-out" type of aid has merely succeeded in dragging along an immense number of emaciated people at a minimum subsistence level. With total reliance on Western aid measures - Western machinery, Western medical aid, Western powdered milk diets - and Western industrial ideals, underdeveloped countries have never been made to think on their own, using Oriental farming techniques and goals which may be more applicable to the Eastern agrarian cultures.

Despite improvements in imported medical aid, it has not been enough to cut down to a reasonable level the number of neo-natal and child mortality rates. (Malnutrition is highly correlated with miscarriage and infant abnormalities.) Children in agrarian areas are usually considered to be benefits. They will, if they survive, be extra hands on the farm, as well as old-age insurance for their parents. Therefore people in underdeveloped agrarian countries perceive a need to produce many children. Because of the high rates of child and infant mortality many children must be produced to have even a few survive. Some die immediately, after sapping their mother's physical resources during pregnancy; while others live just long enough to drain the entire families' resources. And, even with high death rates, medial aid ensures that the birth rate exceeds the death rate.

There is a cyclical problem involved in the need to have children. Poor living standards lead to increases in infant and child mortality rates which leads to an increased number of births which lead to an increase in the growth rate which leads to a large proportion of persons under the productivity level (or a large dependent population) which leads to a low per capita income and low standards of living.

Our "humanitarian" gestures have simply enabled starving people to last a little longer, eating a little food per day. If that strata of the population were not there, the total amount of available food would go much further among a decreased population.

It is obvious that many people in underdeveloped countries would die if aid were cut off completely. Suggesting that this should happen sounds callous, but is it really? The effects of slight malnutrition are well known, even in North America. The effects of prolonged, severe malnutrition are devastating. A large insufficiency of vitamins, protein and - or minerals produces mental and physical deformities to varying degrees, several of which are irreversible. To sustain beings that can never fulfill their human potentialities simply because we feel guilty about our over-consumerism is not humanitarian. In essence we are forcing India to always be a welfare state, and to always be in physical and mental debt to us.

China, after the revolution of 39, closed herself behind the Bamboo Curtain (as Russia did behind the Iron Curtain) and remained isolated until she had developed an agricultural system that was fully functional, and entirely her own. Borrowing only those aspects of Western technology that was viable for her circumstances, she grew to be a nation that could take pride in her development. India, Pakistan, and the other poor countries should follow her example, be made to follow it, perhaps. "Necessity is the mother of invention" is a cliche only because it is very true.

Lord Bowden noted that people are sent out from underdeveloped countries on the premise that they will return with expertise that will enable them to help the development of their country. This seldom happens, he said, because these newly-educated people see the benefits of a higher standard of living and want the same, and they will not get what they want at home. (This is understandable.) In Canada, medical and law students from rural areas rarely return to the sticks, where they're needed, so why should an Indian medical student be expected to return to a poverty-stricken village.) The financial drain, on a poverty-stricken country, caused by sending students abroad on scholarships is immense, especially when the country gets little or no return from the deal. Also, such students (Lord Bowden noted this in Ghana) want to study those aspects of Western education that are popular in the West - such as geriatric medicine, a big new field in England. If you come from a country where people seldom reach middle-age, let alone old-age, geriatrics is a peculiar option to choose over, say, tropical parasitology. But it is respectable field in temperate climate countries, a door to the Western academic community. Rather than study practicalities such as agrarian or irrigation methods, these scholars want to belong to the recognized community of Western scholars, despite the fact that a PhD. in Medieval European History is useless in to their country. Lord Bowden noted that at the University of Argentina one half of the 85,000 students are studying law, only one student is studying geology, and Argentina is a vast country of untold mineral resources that will never be tapped by lawyers.

Pakistanis and Indians are being trained by Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited, to operate nuclear power plants to produce electricity. It seems to me that the need for electricity is far less than the need for more functional Indian methods of agriculture. Rather than trying to imitate the West, without a hope of succeeding India and other impoverished countries should follow China's example of becoming a well-developed argarian nation rather than remaining an extremely poorly-developed pseudo-industrial one. (Industrilization is a Western ideal, and it may not be a good one, at that.)

As Paul Ehrlich says, in Population - Environment - Resources, "Shortages of capital, demand, resources, and trained technicians, lack of effective planning, and the absence of adequate transport and marketing systems all combine with extremely high rates of population growth, malnutrition, and disease to make any kind of development difficult, and thus retard agricultural development." Unless faced by a catastrophe, the underdeveloped countries will continue along this downward path, aided, with all kindness, by the developed countries.

Nothing the West has done has helped disrupt this process. As long as India, Pakistan, etc. are dependent on Western hand-out-strings-attached-type welfare, their problems can only get worse.

Without external aid millions will probably die - those who have been suffering a long time from severe malnutrition. Those who have just recently been dispossessed by the new farm combines may still have the strength to revolt against the well-to-do farmers and the present systems of governments. They may even go communistic. That certainly can't make things worse, and it might make things better. Better distribution of wealth among fewer people is the only solution I can see for their plight, and only drastic measures can bring about those circumstances.

Gunnar Myrdal

Gunnar Myrdal, one of the world's top social scientists, will be at Queen's from November 8 through 12, as the third Brockington Visitor. On Monday November 8 he will give a public lecture in Grant Hall at 8:30 p.m. on "The World Poverty Problem."

Myrdal was born in Sweden in 1898, graduated from the University of Stockholm in 1923, and bega practicing law. Since 1931 he has been an economics professor at the University of Stockholm. In 1934 he and his sociologist wife Alva wrote Crisis in the Population Question, which directly influenced the social policies of all the Scandanavian countires in the economic distress of the 1930's. He was involved in implementing his economic and social planning theories as deputy member of the board of directors of the National Bank of Sweden and as a Social Democratic member of the Senate from 1936 to 1938 and from 1944 to 1947.

Myrdal has earned the reputation of being one of the most 'human' social researchers of the century. His most famous work is An American Dilemma (a massive work of about 2,000 pages) commissioned by the Carnegie Corporation. The book is the result of four years of intensive research (between 1938 and 1942) into the problems of the American Negro. One of the striking things about this vast and detailed work is that it is also immensely readable, something very rare in texts of such stature.

Myrdal is a social scientist with a difference in that he is not afraid to take moral stands. 'Objective research', the creed of the modern social scientist, has value as far as description is concerned, but Myrdal's study's are also prescriptive and subjective. In the Preface to the 20th Anniversary Edition he states that he was "shocked and scared to the bones by all the evils I saw, and the serious political implications of the problem..." Recently, at the University of Georgia, 26 years after the publication of An American Dilemma, Myrdal reevaluated the situation in the South thusly: "The South, as I knew it then, was a hell of a place. One cannot be nostalgic about that South, although that does not mean that I did not meet good people there. Things are improving; things are changing much more rapidly than can be seen by the outsider who reads the newspapers...The South, as I see it, is sometimes bad but sometimes better than the Yankee North...the University of Georgia, for instance, - in many ways an old-fashioned university - is desegragated, and in a sense more desegregated than universities in the North. There are no statistics kept here on black students, , and separatism is certainly not visibly the case...I have been to some Northern universities and I have seen that separation beginning to take place - almost apartheid - blacks and whites not eating together, and so on. Separatism cannot be the end of the vision."

His book is still a classic in the field of race relations. According to Myrdal, the Negro problem was the sharpest focus of a generl oral problem. The American dilemma was the conflict between the moral creed of brotherhood, equality and freedom the American professed and wanted to live by, and the prejudices that personal and local interest, the pressures of conformity and social prestige, and economic, social and sexual jealousies engendered in him. His report stirred considerable debate and some sharp attacks but it accurately forecast many of the difficulties that beset America in the 1960's.

Although Myrdal saw the worst aspects of American prejudice he still feels optimistic about America's future because of "America's Puritan tradition. The legacy of Puritanism is not entirely wholesome in this (the U.S.) country. There is, for instance, a self-righteousness that makes us in the rest of the world angry. But one good thing in the legacy is the possibility of conversions...I know of no nation in the world that can change its fundamental attitudes so rapidly as America. And I have the feeling that conversions are possible in the racial crisis."

Appendix 5 of An American dilemma, "A Parellel to the Negro Problem," compares the situation of women to the "black problem," which is probably more aptly the "white problem."

In 1944 he was appointed chairman of the Swedish Post-war Economic Planning Commission and from 1945 to 1947 he was Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Social Democratic Cabinet of Per Albin Hansson. While in this position, he negotiated a Soviet-Swedish trade pact, which was widely opposed. Myrdal left Sweden in 1947 to take the post of Executive Secretary for the United Nations Economic Comission for Europe, in Geneva.

Ten years later, the Twentieth Century Fund chose him to direct an exhaustive research study on Asia. In his monumental study, Asian Drama: An Inquiry Into the Poverty of Nations (1968,) Myrdal attacks aid-giving countries for "pampering social and political reaction rather than promoting equality." He accuses the Green Revolution in poor countries of bypassing their underfed massess, burying hopes for land reform and creating huge urba slums. Land reform, while on the political agenda almost everywhere in the underdeveloped world, has almost everywhere been carried out badly or not at all. Meanwhile, education and government reforms meant to help the poor have usually favoured the better-offs.

The Challenge of World Poverty is primarily a summary of Asian Drama - 518 pages as opposed to 2,284 - for those who do not like reading all that much. An appendix entitled the "Latin America Powder Keg" reflects the shifting of Myrdal's focus to Latin America.

Hugh Winsor, of the Globe and Mail, says, "Much of what he (Myrdal) says about underdevelopment is really systematized common sense. What is significant is the bluntness and cogency of his presentation. The social realities of underdevelopment have not been presented this way before."

Myrdal's writings have had considerable impact on public opinion and government policy in much of the western world for nearly forty years. It is probably that Asian Drama and The Challenge of World Poverty will have similar impact in the decades to come since they deal with the major world problem at present - the growing gap between the "have" and the "have not" nations.

'The Homecoming' got lost

By Sandy Naiman

Theatre 5 may not be the most professional company in this city, but no one can say it isn't consistent.

Many of the problems with its last production, "The Importance of Being Earnest", have been carried over to its most recent offering, "The Homecoming", by Harold Pinter.

Again Mr. Gordon Robertson has assumed the dual roles of actor and director, however in this case his acting, at least, has improved. As Max the seventy year old father of a peculiar middle class English family, Mr. Robertson is well cast. He is brittle, pathetic and yet somewhat spirited, inwardly. He seems to be groping for a lost youth and, at the same time, for the respect he feels is his due, from his three sons. Mr. Robertson's grizzly face, his wizened mouth, frozen into an everlasting downward grimace is believable, to the point of becoming rather monotonous.

But there has been an improvement. He has learned his lines and can at least function more confidently, it seems, as Max.

Mr. Robertson's directing, however, seems to splinter the unity in the play, that Pinter probably originally intended Again, he has not been able to focus his actors around the central themes of the play in order to communicate a tight, clean product to the audience. (Perhaps an oculist could solve this apparently chronic problem.)

The pregnant pauses, redolent in the Pinter play, in the Theatre 5 production, go into labour and give birth. They may have served as a time gap in which the actors can remember their lines, but the audience found those interminable silences, in a nearly empty Grand (35 people attended the opening performance) discomforting and austere.

There is an art to the dramatic pause and when mastered, it can be one of the most effective instruments at a directors disposal. However, when used in excess, like anything else, it becomes nauseating. Such was the case in "The Homecoming" at the Grand. And as a result, the play seemed to run a bumpy obstacle course filled with jumps and hops and the occasional smooth terrain.

The other actors in this production seemed to be functioning in a daze, like automatons that have been programmed to do and say things at given times and in given sequence. Daniel Buccos, as Lennie, the most frightening character in the play, was so hypnotic, so stagnant in his portrayal of a mam, who lives in the past, that in many cases he seemed to lose the audience and his fellow actors, as well.

David Switzer, as Teddy, the Homecomer, was nebulous and unreal. He showed no emotion, no surprise, and, in fact, no perceptible reactions to any of the situations in which he became involved.

Joey, the youngest brother, played by Bill Burnett, a role which has tremendous comic potential, seemed only moderately funny, in the Theatre 5 rendering.

But, as was the case in "The Importance of Being Earnest" there too, is a spark of light in "The Homecoming". This time, the surprise package was Michael Kronewetter, who portrayed Uncle Sam, with such compassion and tenderness, that he virtually brought each scene he was in to life.

Sam, is the most realistic character in this play, as the voice of rationality and reason, amidst a microhosm peopled with freaks and social atrocities. But, as is always the case with such sagely characters, he is destroyed by those around him, in the end.

Mr. Kronenwetter's performance, and particularly, his parlances with Max, were the high points of the production. The honest humility of Sam, when confronted with the egotistic delusions of Max were crushing and exciting, dramatically.

Miss Theresa Sears, as Ruth, the newcomer was, I am afraid, beyond description.

The sets in this production were passable, dreary and depressing, which I suppose befit the mood of the play. The costumes were musty looking but nothing worth particular mention. The mood is consistently carried out through these secondary devices, however, the total impact of this play was lost. One felt let down when leaving the theatre, that something was missing.

I must harken back to my original premise, that because the direction was inappropriate, and lacking the entire production seemed to be out of focus, poorly timed, slow and without any dramatic pace.

It is extremely difficult to act in a production which one directs. The objectivity is lost and the overall picture is never totally clear to the man who is ultimately in control.

There is no particular esteem attached to someone who presumes to perform two of the most demanding roles in a theatrical production, unless, of course, those two roles can be performed very well, or at least, adequately.

But Mr. Robertson, keep trying! I don't know if that old adage, "Practise Makes Perfect" will ever apply to you and your company, but at least we can depend on a certain amount of consistency and will have our opera glasses adjusted, accordingly.

Jacques Loussier

The concert, in its standard form at any rate, is dead: with these words the more important musical innovators of our time, among them Pierre Boulez and Glenn Gould, are smashing the old shibboleths and bugaboos of the artistic world, and preparing the way for new attitudes, a freer, less artificial approach to music in particular, and to art in general. The performance of the Jacques Loussier Trio in Grant Hall Monday night shows pretty well the main reason for this idea's popularity.

Loussier, the pianist, was faultless. His sense of timing was perfect; he never misplaced one note. His modern improvisations on Bach were so intricately placed into the melody as to bring out a totally new dimension to the music. He sat, hunched over loosely, or swaying from side to side, now brusquely pouncing, now urging it triumphantly onto a resounding finale. This was Bach, but Bach bold, and in a word, uncontainable. Do you think that the old master himself could sit still while pouring our constantly, endlessly, his staccatos, partitas, concertos, masses, preludes, and fugues? Of course not. And neither can you, listening to the stuff if it really grabs you. This is the big objection to the concert in its old form: if you can't move or dance to it in the concert hall, you might as well go home and put on a record.

Jacques' two sidesmen, Pierre Michelot and Christian Garros, seemed never to let him down. The timing was perfect: the blending of the three instruments on the whole was faultless.

The bass player, Michelot, squeezed drippingly resonant blues out of his strings; the drummer, C. Garros, either played around in a casual wickedly sardonic manner, or got suddenly serious, utterly wrapped up, for example in some Stockhausenesque cymbal scraping.

The audience really liked it. Either that, or the intensity of the thing was too much for them, and they had to let it out in five minutes of applause, developing to a standing ovation, that forced Jacques and his buddies to come back for two devastatingly brilliant encores.

Rookie-laden Gaels Face Major Rebuilding Year

Five returning lettermen and seven rookies hold the key to the 1971-72 edition of the Golden Gaels varsity basketball team.

The Gaels, finalists last season in the OQAA conference, open their schedule tonight at 8 p.m. in the Bartlett Gym with an exhibition encounter with the Harlem Wizards.

Serious competion begins next Wednesday with another exhibition tilt, this time with St. Lawrence College Blues at the Community College campus. Action in the newly formed Eastern Division of the OUAA starts in mid-November with a pair of away games against U. of Toronto and Ryerson.

Co-Captains Andy Daugulis and Paul Howard are the only returning starters from last season and will provide the backbone for an otherwise inexperienced club.

Daugulis, a 6-2 forward, was selected to the OQAA Eastern Division second team all-stars last year and looks a likely candidate to repeat. Howard, the tallest starter at 6-6, will handle the centre slot and hopefully the backboards.

Joining Daugulis and Howard are three returnees from last season who saw little floor time, Dave Wright, Peter Gordon, and Dave Smith. Head coach Frank Tindall is counting on these three to make a firm contribution after a year of learning.

Gordon, a 6-0 sharpshooting guard, appears to have the best chance at a starting berth while both Smith and Wright are solid defensive ballplayers with an opportunity to see plenty of floortime.

Former junior varsity players Rob Smart and Joe Davidson were the only two capable of making the jump to varsity competition this season. Smart is a 6-3 forward and Davidson a 5-10 guard.

Other rookies are Ian Rawes, a 6-3 forward from Ottawa; Dave Foulds, a 6-0 guard and Stu Beck a 6-1 forward both from Toronto; Bruce Hemming, a 6-6 center from Nova Scotia and 6-0 guard Stu Bridgeman from Vernon, B.C.

Bews News

Final playoffs are underway in all major fall sports, with Comm '72 and Law '72 meeting in the football finals after edging Comm '75 and Law '73 respectively. This series promises to be a good one; Law may have a slight edge on the basis of a very strong defense.

Law '72 is also favoured in the Rugger finals, against PHE. The Lawmen knocked off Mechanical (last year's champs) in the semis.

In soccer, Eng Grads, Chem Grads, PHE, and Mining meet in the semifinals. As we see it, Chem Grads and PHE will be in the finals with the outcome a tossup.

On a more wintry note, the hockey season is off to an early start. Comm '72 has an almost set team back from last year's championship, and they should be counted the team to beat. It will be interesting to see if the league is devoted to hockey rather than catch-as-catch-can wrestling as in prevous years. One can always hope.

In interfaculty play, Engineering has won soccer, with football under way and rugger yet to start. Interfac hockey will start earlier this year in an attempt to provide an intermediate training ground for prospective intercollegiate players. This is an idea that could stand close investigation for sports other than hockey.

The Jock of the week Award goes this week to Ron Antoine for his memorable quote "If you can't be a sport, be a rule."

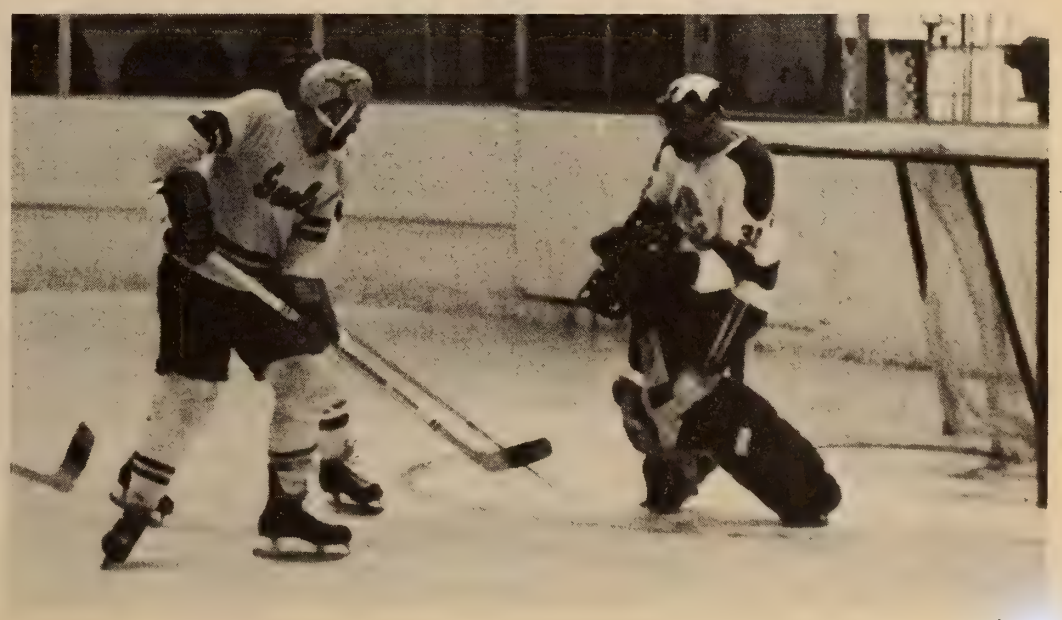
Gaels Prepare for Weekend Games: Meet York Saturday

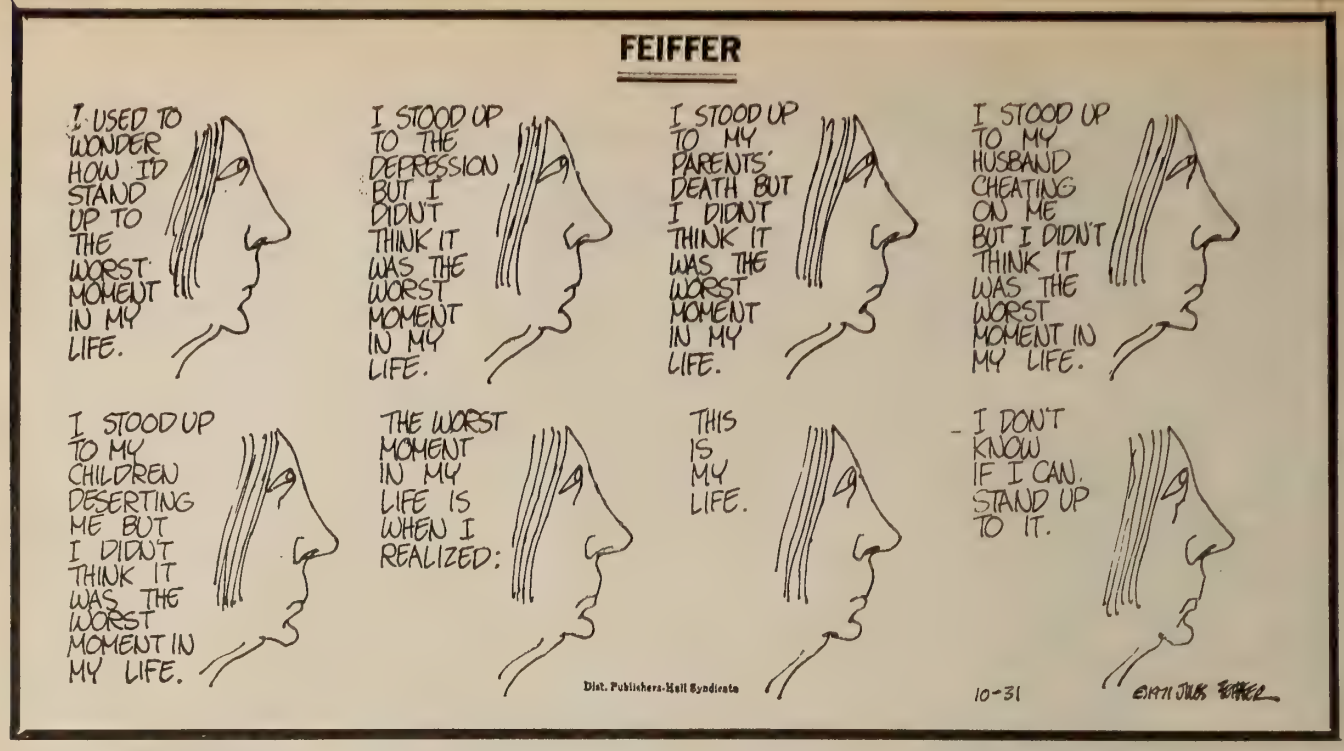
By Ron Pratt

Bob Carnegie's hockey Gaels should be well prepared when they venture to Toronto this Saturday for an afternoon encounter with the York Yeomen. The Gaels have played two exhibition games to date, emerging with a 6-3 victory over RMC while losing 3-2 to the Kingston Aces Tuesday night, and have another contest on tap against the Jr. B. Frontenacs tonight at the Harty Arena. Game time is 7:00 p.m.



The Gaels have so far exhibited strong skating and hustle, and even their loss to the Aces was encouraging, for several reasons. First, Carnegie has put together one very exciting forward unit with Morris Mott at centre, Bill White on left wing, and John Smith on the right. This trio had numerous scoring chances against the Aces, particularly in the first period when White twice had breakaways, only to be stopped by the fine goaltending of Mike Lovett. White did score the Gaels' first goal, after Mott and Smith had forechecked the Aces into submission, and later assisted in the other Queen's goal, scored by rookie Bruce Carmichael who beat Aces' alternate goalie Skip Wing on a sizzling backhand drive.

The strong performance of goalie, Clyde Harris, who shone when the Gaels were short handed, and the revamped defense led by Mike Lynch and Graham Closs, gives good reason for optimism. Carmichael, also a defenseman, turned in a steady performance, as did Doug Barton, Murray Douglas, Bob Kindon and Bruce Cameron.



LACK FINESSE

The Gaels defeat at the hands of the Aces was mainly the result of a lack of finesse around the net; their failure to capitalize on scoring opportunities was all too obvious, and although the defense improved, it suffered letdowns, especially on the goal by ex-Gael Dave Field. Even so, the Gaels look good. They have the talent, and more importantly, the hustle, to win games, and a few breaks could put them in the thick of the OUAA race. It is just a question of time . . . can the Gaels put it all together before league play starts? After this weekend, we should know more.

CANADA

OTTAWA - A new rate schedule which Bell Canada claims will cut phone bills in Ontario and Quebec by up to $4,600,000 was approved yesterday for a six-month trial period by the Canadian Transport Commission.

The new rates, which go into effect Nov. 28, are the second change in Bell's long-distance rates in six months. They were offered by Bell while the commission was investigationg complaints about the company abandoning the old late-night economy plan June 6.

The new plan provides for a two-thirds discount off regular day rates from 11 p.m. to 8 a.m., seven nights a week. From 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. Sundays there will be a three-quarters discount off regular day rates.

As an example of how the rates compare under the different plants, a five-minute call to Toronto from Montreal under the old night economy plan would cost $1.05, while under the new night schedule it would amount to 71 cents. On Sundays under the new plan it would be 53 cents.

MONTREAL - Striking workers at La Presse, North America's largest French-language daily, announced Monday they would publish a new tabloid French-language afternoon newspaper Tuesday.

Michel Lord, president of the La Presse journalists' union, affiliated with the Confederation of National Trade Unions, made the announcement at a news conference.

"It will be produced by teams of workers from all the unions working at La Presse," Lord said, "and will be distributed by union members."

ONTARIO - Canada's breathalyzer law does not infringe on the Canadian Bill of Rights, the Ontario Court of Appeal ruled Tuesday.

The court held that Mr. Justice Patrick Galligan was wrong when he prohibited the trial of Oakville businessman George Clinton Duke, charged with driving with more than 0% per cent of alcohol in his blood, on the ground that Mr. Duke was not give a sample of his own breath for private testing.

The Court of Appeal also overruled Mr. Justice Edson Haines, who had quashed the conviction of Clarence Wayne Brownridge, a Stayner farmer, for failing without reasonable excuse to provide a breath sample for analysis. Last November, Mr. Brownridge refused to give police a breath sample until he had consulted his lawyer

NEWFOUNDLAND - New Labrador Party Leader Tom Burgess said Sunday following meetings with Premier Joseph Smallwood and Conservative Leader Frank Moores that he had laid down certain conditions to both leaders for his support in the Newfoundland Legislature. He said he received assurances from both of them. Mr. Moores' Conservatives took 21 of the 42 Legislature seats in last Thursday's provincial election. Mr. Smallwood's Liberals took 20 seats and Mr. Burgess was elected in Labrador West. Mr. Burgess said he won't decide for a day or two which party he will support.

OTTAWA - The Bras d'Or, Canada's experimental hydrofoil submarine-chaser that has cost $52.5-million since 1963, is being mothballed for at least five years.

Defence Minister Donald Macdonald told the Commons Tuesday that storage and maintenance will cost another $1-million but that to go on with the program to a stage from which production could begin would cost "possibly another $20-million or more."

The ship was a victim of economics, changing priorities for Canadian defence and perhaps of international trade.

OTTAWA - The Canada Council is expected to support a probe of Canadian studies at universities.

In an interview Tuesday at the annual meeting of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada T.H.B. Symons, president of Trent University in Peterborough, said the support might include financial help.

He said there are more Canadian studies in the universities than the public realizes but probably fewer than there should be.

Ironically in the United States there are at least half a dozen well-developed, high-powered centres of Canadian studies bigger than any in Canada, Mr. Symons stated.

"As a country we've been hesitant to regard our own problem as a proper subject for scholarly study."

ONTARIO - The greatest unemployment crisis since the stock market crash of 1929 was set off this past year when 138 plants in Ontario closed down, resulting in temporary or permanent lay-offs for 16,224 workers, an Ontario Federation of Labour report says.

The study finds that 76 of the plants were foreign owned or controlled and employed 10,927 of the persons who were laid off. The study, which covers the period from June 1970 to June 1971, puts most of the blame for the closings on the depressed Canadian economy, fostered by the federal government's ill-advised and disastrous efforts to curb inflation.

OTTAWA - President Tito of Yugoslavia arrived at 6:25 Tuesday night amid intense military and police security at the opening of a six-day visit to Canada.

Six miles away, on Parliament Hill, about 75 Croats held a protest demonstration carrying signs saying that Marshall Tito killed 500,000 Croats after the Second World War.

ST. JOHN'S, Nfld. - Burgeo Fish Industries Ltd., the main industry in the isolated Newfoundland town of Burgeo, was closed Tuesday and all workers paid off.

Spencer Lake, owner of the plant, said in an interview from Gloucester, Mass., where he was looking after other business interests, that the decision to close was final.

Employees were given two weeks' severance pay yesterday.

The plant has been the centre of a long-simmering battle over union recognition for the Newfoundland Fishermen, Food and Allied Workers union. The dispute started last June when 120 plant workers walked off their jobs to back demands for recognition.

Non-union workers continued to operate the plant until last week when it was closed because of a rockthrowing incident, which, Lake said, caused $15,000 damage.

Lake said the plant could only reopen if it was taken over by government or bought by another firm. But he said he doubted if any fish company would want to locate there in view of the labor troubles.

"...Indeed, the administration has fallen into the habit of talking as thought the war in Viet Nam were already over."

THE WORLD

STOCKHOLM - The 1971 Nobel Prize for Chemistry was awarded Tuesday to a Canadian, Dr. Gerhard Herzberg, 66, of the National Research Council in Ottawa, for his studies of chemical reactions that help produce smog.

The award to Dr. Herzberg cited his work with "free radicals," molecular fragments that take part in chemical reactions and help produce the smog that irritates the eyes of city dwellers.

WASHINGTON - The United States has given away or sold more than six times as many military supplies as the nearest rival, the Soviet Union.

In an up-to-date summary, Senator Frank Church (D-Idaho) reports that in the 20 years from 1950, when the arms dispensing program began to 1970, the U.S. had made available to foreign countries more than $36.5 billion worth of military weapons and equipment.

During that time, Church says, the United States dealt away 4,385 F-84 fighters, 21,725 tanks, 4,423,000 rifles 77,433 machine-guns and 32,500 missiles.

NEW DELHI - Government authorities mobilized a massive relief operation Tuesday in devastated coastal areas of Orissa state where a weekend cyclone and tidal wave claimed possibly 10,000 lives.

Latest offical reports by the government-run All-India Radio placed the official death toll at least 5,000. Government officials estimated the total would be at least double that figure.

Eyewitness reports carried by the Press Trust of India news agency from Cuttack district - the area hit hardest by 90-mile-an-hour winds, a 16-foot storm wave and heavy rains - told of human bodies floating in flood waters and strewn along roadsides amid debris and uprooted trees.

WASHINGTON - The Atomic Energy Commission announced Tuesday it expects to be ready to conduct the Cannikin test "no earlier than Saturday, Nov. 6."

Meanwhile, opponents of the explosion appealed a court refusal to halt the blast. Environmentalists also appealed the decision of U.S. District Judge George Hart to keep secret documents they say prove the potential dangers of the blast.

In preparing an environmental-impact statement required by law, the conservationists claim the AEC ignored or suppressed reports from our government agencies opposing the blast.

On Monday, Judge Hart ordered some of the documents made public, designated some for the eyes only of environmentalist lawyers and said others should remain secret. In their appeal filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals, the environmentalists asked that all documents be made public.

They also requested a preliminary injunction halting the blast.

On Oct. 5, the Appeals Court turned down a request for a stay, but that was before the three-judge court had a look at the disputed documents.

The judges have been studying the reports since Monday night. The environmentalists say they expect the Appeals Court to call a hearing on the case Wednesday.

AMS meeting

The AMS cancelled an outer council meeting again last night, this time because it conflicted with the Brockington Lecture by Gunnar Myrdal.

The meeting was primarily to be a theme meeting dealing with publications; it would also have considered regular business, including appointments to the AMS court.

The outer council will try again next Monday, at 7 p.m. in the McLaughlin Room of the Union. At press time it was not known whether that meeting would still talk about publications.

Remembrance Day

Thursday being November 11, Armistice Day, classes will be cancelled from 10.30 to 11.30 a.m. Students, faculty and staff are invited to the university memorial service, which will be held in Grant Hall beginning at 10.53 a.m.

"It is easy for us who are living to honour the sacrifice of those who are dead. For it helps to assuage the guilt we should feel in their presence. Wars can be prevented just as surely as they are provoked and, therefore, those who fail to prevent them must share in the guilt of the dead."

Coed res decision near

The Inter-Residence Council and Women's Residence Council meet tonight to hear what residence women think of the current integrated residence proposal.

That proposal is that, next year, Donald Gordon House and Brockington House be coed residences, the sexes room and room about, and that Chown Hall become a 170-bed men's residence.

A mock application form circulated to women late last week showed that the older traditional residences, Adelaide and Ban Righ Halls, would still be the most popular. Though only 56 percent of women answered the survey, there were more than enough "applicants" to fill the upper-year places in both those residences.

WRC president Cindy Davidson told The Journal Sunday that 322 women who were eligible to live in residence next year, and said they wanted to do so, answered the form. (There are about 650 freshettes in residence this year. Another 51 answered the survey but said they wanted to live outside residence in 1972-73.)

Of the 322, 68 women gave Adelaide Hall as their first choice, she said; there are 24 places for upper-class women in that building. Similarly, there were 17 applications for the 16 places in Ban Righ.

But the sample included only 164 who wanted the 259 places in Victoria Hall, and 73 who wanted the 101 places open to second-year women in Gordon-Brockington under the coed plan.

Asked whether these buildings would be filled when all freshettes were considered, rather than just the 56 percent in the sample, Miss Davidson said, "I'm not going to say. I don't know."

The quotas for second-year women might not be filled, she said, if freshette applications are unexpectedly high and many upper-year women drop out in favour of apartments or Elrond College.

"Our main ambition is to fill the residences," Miss Davidson said.

Tonight's meeting will decide whether to endorse the coed proposal and call a referendum, which would be necessary to make integrated residences a reality for 1972-73.

Snow job is pulled

Snow fell Sunday morning, the first for this winter, closely following the first frost Friday night.

"I don't like winter," AMS vice-president told The Journal in an exclusive interview shortly after the flurry.

He added that official winter does not begin until December 21.

On Wednesday Nov. 10 - 8 PM in Stirling Hall RM 412C the Students International Meditation Society will present an introductory lecture on the fascinating and illuminating technique of the TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION.

Anyone can begin to use the full potential of his mind in all fields of life. There is a way to expand the conscious mind, tap an inexhaustible reservoir of energy and creative intelligence and start to enjoy fulfillment in life.

TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION has scientifically published beneficial physiological results. It is a safe, natural and spontaneous method for expanding the mind, and it works for everyone.

TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION

Timbers shivered, Science Formal constructed

by Val Hanbidge

Tortuga, this Saturday, raises the jolly roger over Grant Hall for the annual Science Formal. Every year final-year engineers demonstrate that they are creative as well as mechanical; the pressure is now on Science 72, and as the date of the dance comes near, curiosity and excitement grow. Perhaps, therefore, it would be a good time to look back at the creations of plumbers of the past.

There was no doubt, for instance, that the 1930 Engineers' Ball would be the highlight of the social season. Tickets were in such demand that they were refused to all but sciencemen. "Brilliant Tints of Rainbow Hue Transform Stern Grant Hall Into Magic Elfin Glade" was the bold title of The Journal's article on the dance:

...The cunning ingenuity of the engineer's mind, and delicate appreciation of color-values, produced a magic elfin glade, the setting sun's golden rays piercing a soft rain to illuminate the skies with the multi-colored rainbows. Tropic verdure flung black silhouettes against the radiant heavens. Never before have Grant Hall's drab walls assumed their festive attire so wholeheartedly....

..Hundreds of colored snowballs were pelted hither and yon among the happy throng during the novelty number. Each girl, however, had been presented with a tiny parasol and was able to fend off vicious attacks with her cunning shield....

The master-stroke of the planning committee, however, was its arranging to have science freshmen shovel a path through the February snow between Grant Hall and the women's residence, Ban Righ.

Science 36 had as its aim better music. On a revolving platform in the centre of the floor, under a huge canopy held up by white pillars, Mal Hallett and his orchestra played swinging music to the dancing couples. The ball was later described by The Journal as "one of the outstanding social events of the college year".

The theme of the 1941 ball was ancient Greece:

.....Flowing columns, etched against deep panels, outline the Temple of Mercury, whose symbolic figure looks down into the courtyard of swirling couples....For one unforgettable night, engineering magic has invited you to dance, laugh and love in a background of enchanting loveliness.

The Norse legend of Valhalla was the setting for the Science 50 formal. In the centre of the ballroom was a magnificent fountain, 45 feet in circumference. Streams of water gushed fifteen feet into the air, then dropped into a hexagonal glass aquarium below (a contribution of the hydraulic engineers).

.....As with all legends there is always the more torrid region and this territory has been appropriately designated as the bar. The exploration of the bottle locker, as it is termed, will be left to the guests at the formal.

From even these few past galas it is easy to see the impressive tradition of the Science Formal. "Will this year's dance live up to it?" is the question which will be answered when Science 72 and their guests enter the pirate world of Tortuga on Saturday.

Yo-ho-ho -- and memories begin.

Nominations are invited

A vacancy exists on the Senate Committee on Academic Procedures, for one faculty member for a 2-year term.

Full-time faculty and students are invited to submit to the Secretary of the Senate, Room 225, Richardson Hall, the names of faculty whose interests, knowledge and experience seem to qualify them for this position. Names suggested need not be those of members of the Senate, but should be those who have worked, or are working, or who have a special interest in particular problems related to the responsibilities of this Committee.

Sponsors should outline carefully the talents, interests and experience of the person suggested.

Rabbi welcomes all at Hillel House

by Jane Douglas

Rabbi Juda H. Mintz is a busy man. As Kingston's only rabbi, he is leader of the congregation at Beth Israel synagogue, Jewish chaplain at Kingston Penitentiary, and enthusiastic director of Hillel at Queen's.

The B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation is centred at Washington, D.C., but has branches around the world. Hillel House here is at 26 Barrie Street, an old house bought by five members in 1945. It is spacious, with a relaxed atmosphere, and there is a Judaica Library including subscriptions to the major Jewish periodicals.

In a town like Kingston, with a relatively small Jewish population, Hillel serves as "a means of education". It gives Jewish students and faculty an opportunity for cultural activities including debates, movies, art exhibitions and social gatherings.

Mintz said he is attempting "to open the avenues of understanding". Therefore, everyone is welcome at Hillel. In particular, anyone, Jew or non-Jew, can enroll in the "Hillel free university" programmes in Judaism, Hebrew, the Talmud, and Israeli folk dancing.

Juda H. Mintz

Other programmes include the Sunday night cold supper banquet (everyone is welcome and the cost is $1.50). On Friday nights a young marrieds group meets for a sabbath meal followed by singing and discussion. Services are held at Beth Israel synagogue (116 Centre Street) on Fridays and Saturdays.

On October 19, a busload of Hillel members took part in the Ottawa protest against Soviet "spiritual repression" of Jews, on the occasion of the visit to Canada of USSR premier Alexei Kosygin.

Mintz said that Russians want everyone to believe in the state, but that Jews believe in God. Though the situation has improved since the days when Nikita Khrushchev was first minister in the USSR, Jews still cannot emigrate from Russia, he said, nor are they allowed to read Jewish periodicals.

Between eight thousand and ten thousand Jews who gathered on Parliament Hill for the non-violent demonstration last month showed their concern for all minorities, Mintz said.

This month there will be a number of guest speakers at Hillel, starting with T.I. Fenner of the department of computing science at Queen's. Professors from the University of Western Ontario and Sir George Williams University will be coming to speak on "Jewish mysticism".

And on November 21, at 7.30 p.m., there will be an Israeli folk concert in Dunning Hall.

A non-interview with Queen's new dean of women

by Mary O'Rourke

The new dean of women at Queen's is a reflective person who doesn't want to be pinned down by a routine job description. She'd rather not be made known or interpreted to Queen's students through a superficial, set question-and-answer interview. Nor does she think a reiteration of her past career will tell you much more about what she'll do here at Queen's. She's had sufficient experience with different jobs and life-styles to know that every new situation must be approached without making comparisons.

All of which makes a reporter's task rather difficult; but it does give you a perhaps clearer picture of Mrs. Evelyn Reid herself.

Who's Where describes the dean of women's responsibilities as "keeping an eye on women students, particularly...in the women's residence system", but adds that she is a good person to take problems of any nature to. "And she is even willing to talk to men as well."

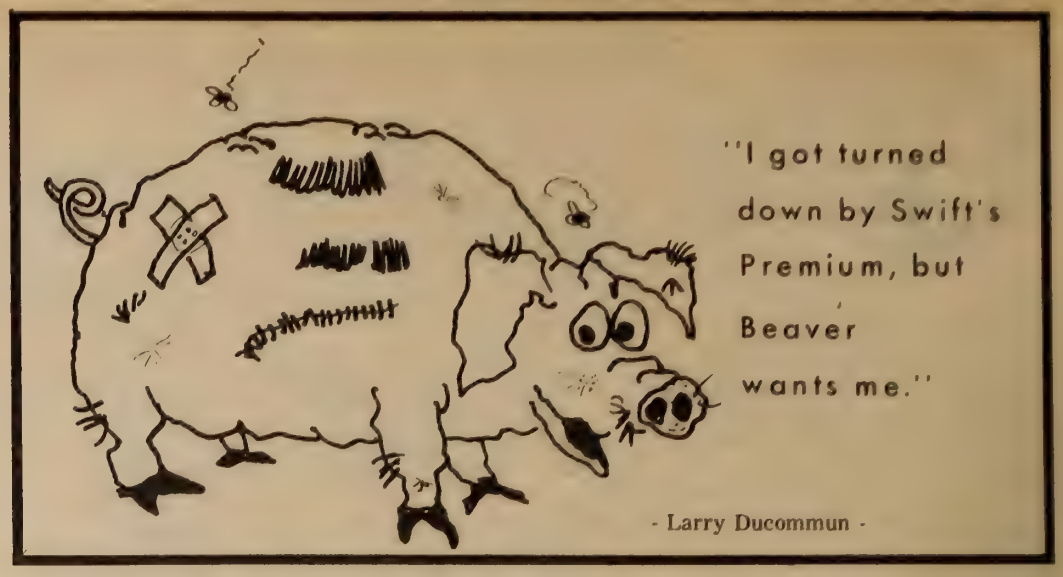
This, however, is a rather limited view of a position which, in Mrs. Reid's view, has many possibilities. Having been on campus only a few days, she has only begun to explore the areas and the ways in which she will work. Hence her reluctance to commit herself on issues which she feels require both time and consideration.

But Mrs. Reid's caution should not be interpreted as either timidity or lack of wide-ranging interest. On the contrary, she cites her readiness to accept a job without a standard job-description as perhaps her best qualification for it. She says she feels comfortable in the university community, and is interested in exploring all its aspects. Mrs. Reid will have an office in the Student Affairs Centre, at 165 University Avenue, as well as her office in Victoria Hall -- this, to make more contact with off-campus students, male and female alike. And she sits on several committees, including the committee of deans, the committee of departments in the faculty of arts and science, the student affairs committee of the senate, and the university health council.

As for "keeping an eye on women students", Mrs. Reid hardly envisions her position as that of a babysitter. She is very much concerned with the role of women in society and their full appreciation of it. Thus she hopes to help girls explore this role and develop as individuals capable of making their own decisions. Although Mrs. Reid says she has given some thought to the validity of a label such as "dean of women", she suggests that it may now have more significance than it had even five years ago.

In discussing the problem of women's identity, Mrs. Reid suggested that two chief inhibiting factors may be women's tendency to evaluate themselves through men's eyes and, even more important, women's lack of sufficient respect for one another.

She said she had missed a recent and classic example of the latter failing, the gatecrashing of the traditional candle-lighting ceremony October 18. But she said she was interested both in the incident and in meeting the women's liberation demonstrators involved, and added that she would like to look into that movement at Queen's.



And finally, the coed residence issue. Mrs. Reid says she has experience with all sorts of living situations, and recognizes the pros and cons of each. Thus she maintains that it is entirely up to the students to decide what is most suitable for them at present.

The dean of women is very much what students make her. So don't be misled by Who's Where definitions or reporters' interpretations; go and meet her yourself.

Journal blasted for bad taste in its dating lampoon

Dear Editors;

Regarding last Thursday's article "How to Get Your Man" - satire is an effective form of communication but, like any other medium, has its limits. Needless to say, Miss Vogl et al exceeded those limits. As the saying goes, ladies, your taste is all in your mouths.

- Gareth Davies, Sc. '72

Dear Editors;

Although I considered it an impossibility, the Journal has managed to achieve a new standard of excellence in bad taste. I draw your attention to the recent article published during Suzie-Q week titled "How to get Your Man". By no means a puritan, I am nevertheless disgusted by this degrading article. It is apparent also that the recent change in the frequency of issue contributed further to the deterioration in the quality of this "publication."

It seems to me that the purpose of a university paper should be to offer interesting, informative articles of a high calibre. Unfortunately, the Journal never reaches these "lofty" heights of literature.

Since criticisms should be accompanied by suggestions for improvement, the following thoughts are offered: a) resume publication on a twice weekly basis, and b) include some papers written by Queen's students, selected by their professors on a basis of high literary achievement. This should offer various views on all subject matter taught at Queen's and would give the reader a feature to which he could look forward.

If the Journal is attempting to publish articles on the level of mentality it suggest Queen's students have, I wonder just how many students accept your evaluation.

- G. Heinz Puersten
Emil Tickert

(Ed. note: The Journal always welcomes articles from students or prof, whether written specifically for the Journal or written as essays, and we will print all those which are sufficiently good and interesting.)

Dear Editors;

To Ann Vogl: No wonder nobody reads the Journal.

- Susan Megill, Bruce Eddy

Dear Editors;

In regards to the "centrefold" of the Queen's Journal entitled How to Get Your Man, it sounded like a Playboy's version of the RCMP's motto. However, being openminded Queen's students, we waded through the article. The diagram did attain its purpose by attracting our attention but it was gross and revolting. I realize that "if ya got it, ya got it, but if ya don't - it's tough" but the line has to be drawn somewhere.

The authors were quite humourous and their points were well taken; however, they epitomize the Queen's gentlewoman (female counterpart of gentleman) to be "an innocent, virginal slut who has passed her prime and requires a companion with whom to spend the rest of her life." If this is she (how poetic), then she deserves the "typical" Queen's gentleman who is out only for a lay.

Pick-a-dilly.

- Helen Howes, Margie Ross

Dear Editors;

My allegiance to Queen's University is something I like to announce with pride. Publications such as Thursday's Journal make this more and more difficult. The Queen's Journal is an instrument of communication between campus and the general public. What do people think when they see as its central feature something that one usually would find scrawled in the back pages of Grade 6 arithmetic books? The campus has better artistic talent than that presented, and, I hope to think, better taste in its application.

I enjoy reading "naughty" material as much as the next person - my appreciation increases with the skilfulness and wit in the presentation of it. Your text was mildly amusing, but your visual aids appalling.

That is not the important thing. What it shows is a sadly limited outlook amongst your staff. If they stopped gazing at their own and other people's navels and looked around, they would see reams of copy material in every corner of the campus. A professor just published a book, an eminent visitor is about to come. There was a fire on Stuart St. Tuesday night. Grant Hall has new radiators.

This is campus information we wouldn't mind getting and the general public (that includes students, faculty, alumni and Kingstonians) wouldn't mind reading. Why dabble in scandal when you have the ability to contribute so much to Queen's - and to the pride we would all like to have in it?

- Brenda Maybee

Dear Editors;

Ann Vogel may have bounced off the stage after the "Pyjama Game" last year to cheers of, "Ann Vogel, we love you!", but as upper year Queen's students, we were, to say the least,unfavorably impressed with the attempt at sexy humor by Misses Vogel and Hague and their accomplice, Mrs. Walker. While Miss Vogel is working on a meaningful relationship with her man, we have been looking in vain for something meaningful in this article. As if the literary aspect of this article was not disgusting enough for these three ladies, we also find illustrated diagrams to emphasize the point of their blow by blow descriptions. Miss Hague will be on welfare for a long while if her art work continues to be in such good taste.

We would advise Ann Vogel not to spend her time in the creation of such nauseating, odious, ignorant, and obnoxious two-page displays of crap as, in aiming for a B-average with the highly limited intelligence she has exhibited in her article, she can't spare any time. To your side kick, Mrs. Walker, we advise that you cancel your subscription to this theory before your husband finds that there are women around with many more endowments than his wife, especially in the area of the brain.

We would now like to pose a question to the editors. "Why was this printed?"

+ Two extremely disgusted readers Annette Brownell, Linda Pritchard, Arts 73.

P.S. To P. Riley, your body's in DANGER!!! Padlock your pants and run like hell.

Dear Editors:

We have just finished reading, with great disgust, the article "How To Get Your Man", in the November 4 edition of the Journal. The article not only lacks humour, but is in bad taste, showing immaturity not to be expected of a university student (not to mention, third year!). One is compelled to think twice about the calibre of students at this "fine choice of universities" and the standards of its newspaper. Whether or not it was meant to be funny, the article manifested itself merely as an insult to every female (and male) student at Queen's and, in your opinion, it was an unfortunate mistake that it was ever printed.

We find it difficult to see the necessity of printing a third edition of the Journal each week if you have to stoop so low as to print such articles.

Disillusioned.

Theatre workshops

Dear Editors;

I am grateful to Miss Lynette Hodgson for allowing me the opportunity to correct what seems to be a popular misunderstanding. In her letter of Friday Oct. 22 entitled "All Over Again." She says "There is not one group outside the university offering organized workshops for training young actors and inspiring potential directors with the techniques and craft that they need."

On the contrary I can think of four other groups offering precisely this training and at least two of them also train young stage managers, wardrobe and props personnel, lighting technicians, house managers and teachers. They are St. Lawrence College and the Friday night classes of Theatre Five. Two other well-established groups in the city are the Saturday morning classes run by Alan Argue and the Domino Youth Company.

Probably it depends on your definition of "young." Perhaps, like a lot of other people, Miss Hodgson does not notice anybody under the age of 20. This would be a great pity, for I am coming to the conclusion that we lose, instead of gaining, maturity after that age.

As I know that Miss Hodgson has herself been engaged in youth theatre and is an excellent speech teacher, I do rather wonder why she does not offer these talents in a more organized fashion and so perhaps help to bring about the state of affairs she desires, "a dynamic theatre", "realistic" instead of amateur" etc. One small reservation, however - Miss Hodgson can tell us quite adequately what she does not like, but apart from vague references to Stratford and Niagara and "untapped potential", she appears to have no programme. A well defined programme of training for young people would be welcome if she could articulate one. It might inspire and educate us all.

the Dormouse

BY Alan Broadbent

I had the opportunity last week to talk to Guy Smart, captain of the Queen's Cerebral Squad (QCS), about the upcoming season and some of the problems the squad is facing.

"How does it look for the upcoming season, Guy?" I asked for openers.

"Well, we anticipate encountering some ponderous competition," he replied. "The consortium of competitors looks equivalent to the finest of past epochs, but the QCS hopes to surmount all obstacles and achieve the pinnacle."

"Who do you think will be the toughest in the league this year?" I queried, not being sure if he had already answered the question.

"In the industrial section, we can surmise that Inco, Alcan, and Scott Paper have been scouting us closely, and will have prepared various systems to counter our fortes," he answered. "In the graduate school division, we anticipate that Toronto, Manitoba, and British Columbia will have mobilized a concerted effort to effect themselves as victors."

I decided to get right into the touchy business of the current problems of the QCS, and asked him how the protest against training table meals has affected the team.

"A specious and perniscous attempt on the part of an illiterate majority to derive certain groups of their right to participate in valuable pursuits," he raged.

"But, do you think you can justify spending money, students' money, on feeding intellectuals so they can compete with others on a level that few others appreciate?" I asked.

"Let's avail ourselves of the verities," he said. "Queen's is a university, and it depends on its reputation to fill its coffers, to bring fame and glory to its name. The intellectuals of Queen's bear the brunt of making the populace aware that we are fulfilling worthwhile purposes here. The QCS is the one succinct organ that can do this duty, and thus it should receive the support of the university, including the students."

"But do you need training table meals to do all of this?" I persisted.

"My good dolt," Guy said, taking me into his confidence, "there has been a plethora of literature published lately which shows that there is a corelation between one's diet and his effective functioning as an intellectual. If one does not eat well, if he is deprived of certain food values, it quite simply follows that his brain will not function well. Without a training table, which every other intellectual team at every other university has, we would not be able to surmount all obstacles and achieve the pinnacle."

"It seems to me," I pointed out, for it seemed at the time to be a good thing to point out, "that every student here is here for intellectual reasons, and that it would be ideal for every student to have a training table so that he could function intellectually pinnacley, as it were."

"That shows how much you know about competition" he said, and I noted some contempt in his voice. "If everyone had a training table, then the financial burden would be unbearable. The pure and simple truth is that not everyone can make the team, and those who do should be fed well."

"But many people don't want to make the team. They just wish to study and live their life without being a member of a university team."

"Then let me eat peanut butter," he offered. "We are out to produce winners here, not dilletantes incapable of precise and profound analysis and synthesis."

I abandoned this line of conversation, seeing that this Guy Smart was a tough cerebrum to crack, and asked him to say a few words about the value of being on the team for each member.

"It builds character," he said. "Each fellow meets the most demanding competition, and if he is successful in this encounter, he will go on to make valuable contributions to society. Each man is responsible for knowing his area of knowledge completely, and if he fails, he has let down his fellows. He knows that he will then not be accepted by his teammates."

With the confidence that he was a major cog in the wheel of the intellectual process, Guy Smart went off to his evening meal with the QCS, interrupted only by a few frosh who wanted his autograph and free tickets to be the home-opener.

Co-ed Residence:
An Uptight issue

-by Mark Smyka
and James FitzGerald

Once, in the distant, forgotten history of man, there existed an obscure race of creatures known as the Uptights. The Uptight Culture was composed of a network of self-contained communities, each characterized by an abnormal craving for wisdom and knowledge by its motley members.

In order to enjoy their very brief lives, Uptights tended to focus their intellectual energies on the countless petty public issues of the day as their primary livelihood. It was considered de rigeur for a young Uptight to thrust himself into the excitement of a deliciously silly issue immediately upon entering his first year in the community.

The organization of the Uptight Culture into various communities was distinguished by a monarchical structure. The inferior communities which had large numbers of Uptights were called the Peasants. Communities with a medium-sized populace were made up of Citizens.

Further up the status ladder stood the highest, most conservative, traditionalist community with a smaller, elitist membership. A problem which still eludes historians today is why a community of Kings never existed. Scholars have speculated that when the Uptight hierarchy reached Queens, it was an appropriate place to stop.

The Uptights of Queens were a peculiar lot indeed. The individual life expectancy of an Uptight Queen ranged from 1-4 years. They had a curious term which described the junior members of the community. The young females were called Fleshettes, and the male counterparts Flogs.

As the most conservative members of the Uptight Culture, Queens proved to be the most reluctant to change their prevailing customs. Queens went far beyond the customary uptight reaction to everyday problems, so that each issue within this community precipitated unmitigated confusion and disorder.

It came to pass, that after a lengthy period of conservatism, a general mood of liberalization swept the Uptight Culture. One of the old and previously unquestioned laws forbad young males and females to see each other while they lived in their repsective places of residence.

It was considered a serious breach of Uptight Ethics (and they did have an acute moral sensitivity) to view a member of the opposite sex, or the sex of the opposite member, in the compromising position of daily (and nightly) living.

However, some Peasants and even some Citizens (who had a much longer life expectancy) decided after considerable debate that this old law was outmoded. Gradually, they began to integrate their male and female residences.

Soon the issue was forgotten and those Uptights who still wanted to live with their own sex were happy while those who sought warmer companionship were free to do so.

The Uptight Queens Flogs and Fleshettes decided, however, that the issue was not to be stomped over lightly. Rather than allow such a potentially tasty controversy pass by unheralded, they launched into serious debate. Innocuous exchanges of opinion gradually escalated into prolonged discussions and finally denunciations of loose Uptight morality.

Old Queens conservatism fought a brilliant battle for the preservation of the status quo. The side of Queens liberalism (a small but vocal contingent) proved equal to their stiff opposition. To the vicarious delight of the rest of the panting Uptights (who in the meantime were protesting an explosive issue in a far-off northern land), the Queens war raged on.

Historical documents of the period devote unusual amounts of space to this apparently monumental issue. It is worth pointing out that the residence problem eventually led to the decline and fall of the Queen's community.

Amchitka protest

Dear Editors;

Bravo for the St. Lawrence College students who organized the Amchitka demonstration at the Ivy League bridge! Apparently Queen's is living up to its traditions of "all talk and no action". I find it very curious that the Alma Mater Society, notified of the event on Monday, was unable to communicate this information to the students of Queen's!

-Gordon Edwards

Dear Editors;

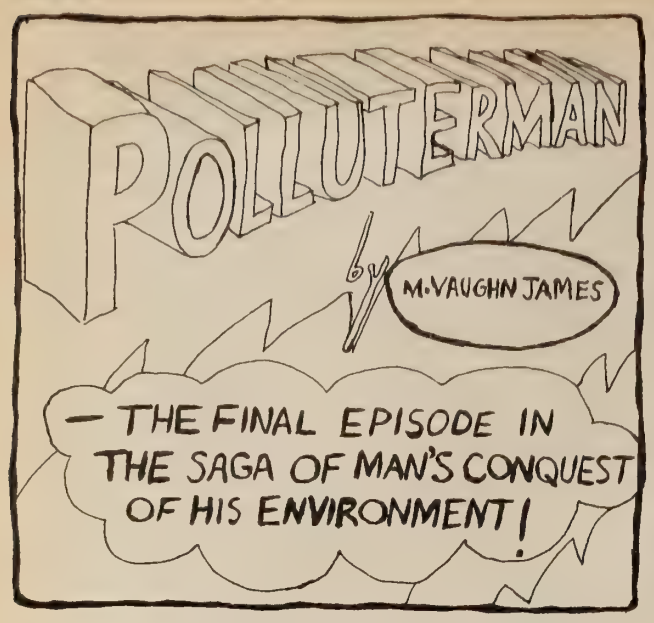
For more than a week now the Journal has been filled with material about the United States nuclear experiment on Amchitka Island. The most irritating piece however was the letter on page 5 of volume XCIX No. 19 accusing Queen's students of apathy because they did not all flock to blockade the U.S. border to protest the experiment.

It may be true that Queen's students are apathetic but perhaps Mr. Skitch should think over the material on Amchitka presented in the Journal.

All of the articles, after much emotional appeal, came to the effective conclusion that the officials of the U.S. government and of the Atomic Energy Commission are not only irresponsible but stupid. While this is certainly possible it does not seem very likely.

The authors of the Journal articles were all firmly convinced that the Amchitka experiment would lead to great destruction of life on earth. It is only reasonable to expect that the possibility of danger from the test occurred also to the A.E.C. officials.

As these officials are human beings who must inhabit this planet just as we do, they no doubt took very careful precautions to be sure that no calamity could occur. The United States may be renowned for massive political blunders but they have seldom if ever made such an obvious technological error.



It is just possible then that Queen's students did not flock behind Mr. Skitch to blockade the border because they were not taken in by the scare headlines of the Queen's Journal. Next time you protest about apathy, think of a better excuse.

Repression in S. Africa is justified by reference to our War Measures Act

"... Most of the talk about South Africa's being a kind of police state where freedom of expression is ruthlessly put down is a huge distortion of fact. It's true that we do have certain legislation aimed against outside agitators which seems Draconian. Some of us are unhappy about the extent of this legislation and occasionally how it's applied. But there are many precedents for special powers in democratic countries where the authorities have to deal with revolutionary political groups committed to attain their ends through violence rather than persuasion. Canada, Northern Ireland and India are all recent examples."

-from a 16-page advertisement by the Republic of South Africa in the July 1971 issue of Fortune.

Current recycling efforts are not solving our ga

by Ken Webb in Alternatives, no. 2

WE know that participation in the activities of environmental groups is currently at a very high level. One campaign involving large numbers of people and a great many man-hours is recycling. The effort at recycling, especially of newspaper and non-returnable bottles involves anti-pollution groups all over the continent. Because so much of the energy of the movement is involved in these activities we should take the time to seriously assess whether they are the most productive possible use of manpower resources.

It will not be the aim of this brief paper to deal with all aspects of recycling. The recycling of by-products within industrial processes is an urgent matter for our society and the recycling of all waste the true goal of the anti-pollution movement. We will concern ourselves here, however, just with those items most commonly collected from the general public in the numerous collection centres which are being organized by environmental groups: cans, newspapers and particularly glass bottles.

There are, in the press, numerous references to the new public efforts at recycling. Some typical headlines read, "students to return nonreturnable bottles" (Christian Science Monitor, June 3, 1970), "Drive opens here for usable trash" (New York Times, October 2, 1970), "The return of the nonreturnables" (Newsweek, September 21, 1970). Newspapers and cardboard clearly are items which can and should be collected and reused. But why aren't we carefully evaluating the best way to re-use metal and glass containers? Why should there be more than a relatively few non-returnable paper containers used at all? Why should cans and glass be crushed, melted and remade when such processes involve pollution and the unneccessary use of resources such as electric power? We must evaluate which recycling methods produce the least damage to the environment. We should then use the methods found to be best for the environment, not just those which are best for industry.

The organizational literature of environmental groups makes the extent of preoccupation of the movement with the recycling of bottles quite clear. Aside from some statements such as "Don't buy pop or beer in disposable bottles or cans. These alone create a terrible disposal and litter problem" (Pollution Probe, p. 200), and "Non-returnable bottles have descended on us like a plague" (CSRS NEWSLETTER, v. 1, no. 1), most groups actively encourage their members to take part in industry organized recycling campaigns.

The reason for the original appearance of one-way bottles is aptly explained in this quote from Newsweek (September 21, 1970), "...shopping habits have changed since the 1920's, when deposit bottles held virtually the whole market for soft drinks, beer, and milk, and thrifty housewives were only too happy to save pennies by bringing them back to the store. After World War 11, the milk bottle market was largely lost to paper and plastics, and cans captured a big share of beer and soft-drink sales. Glassmakers fought back by developing lighter, less expensive bottles that could be thrown away. "We had to go the one-way route or fold up, recalls one manufacturer." The CBS (Canadian Business Service) report of April 7, 1970 on the glass and glass manufacturing industry reported, "...it would appear that in the U.S. the competition from cans has been met successfully by the introduction of non-returnable glass bottles."

Another factor is that "twenty or so non-returnables yield a good deal larger total profit than one deposit bottle" (Newsweek, September 21, 1970). The April 7, 1970 CBS report on Consumers Glass (the 2nd largest glass manufacturer in Canada, and operating a redemption centre in Montreal) reported: "Sales increased in each of the past 5 years, aided by a significant growth in the non-returnable soft drink container market." The October 6,1970 CBS report on Dominion Glass (the largest glass manufacturer in Canada, and also operating a redemption centre in Montreal) reports: "In both 1967 and 1968, the most rapidly increasing demand was for no-deposit soft drink bottles and Dominion's sales of this product increased by 82 percent and 57 percent."

A large scale advertising campaign was started by the Glass Container Manufacturer's Institute in the U.S. in late 1969, which included introducing a musical group called "Soda Pop and the One-Way Bottles." It was particularly aimed at making one-way bottles more acceptable to teen-agers and young adults. Advertising Age (December 8, 1969) reported: "Besides promoting one-way bottles, the 1970 campaign will emphasize an anti-litter program." The campaign was abandonned because of the public outcry, and the name of the rock group was changed to the "Glass Bottle".

With the direct approach a failure, the glass manufacturers started a new campaign to push public acceptance of one-way bottles. Redemption centres have been set up across the continent at the manufacturing plants. Both Dominion Glass and Consumers Glass in Montreal take back non-returnable bottles, and give ½c per bottle or $15 per ton. The July 1970 issue of the Toronto monthly Executive magazine talks about the Canadian counterpart to the American campaign. "Civic minded groups are sponsoring various drives to clean up litter and with it, the offending bottles and cans. One of the better examples of this attempt is the Keep Canada Beautiful campaign sponsored by the Canadian Tourist Assn., and the 'litter chase' programs conducte various parts of Canada by Boy Scouts and Girl Gui The Glass Container Council of Canada is an avid porter of these projects." TV ads in the U.S. now spe the "Natural" (manufacture, melt, re-manufact cycle of glass. The joint American-Canadian camp has a number of effects.

It protects the industry from possible outright ban of non-returnables by minimizing public and governm criticism. The public sometimes now even appl them. We should think seriously about the follo related issue of cans from the Environmental Hand (p. 264): "Recent Reynolds Aluminum advertisem offer 200 dollars per ton of aluminum cans (40,000 c returned for recycling. Great! Far out! However, useful to reflect on the recent concern of some legisl on the nondegradable nature of aluminum cans, whi not rust as do tin cans. Was Reynolds backed in corner by several states on the verge of outlawing u aluminum cans altogether? One can be sceptic thank Reynolds for a good move and suggest still b approaches in recycling."

Those people who ask the question "What can I stop pollution?" are often told that as one altern they can bring back bottles to the redemption ce These people are left with a sense of accomplish that they've done their part, while in fact by co-oper with industry rather than forcing industry to co-op with the public, they're ensuring that no real solutio be found. Also, through their satisfaction with ha done something, they will be less likely to take on kinds of political action. What we need is not just a but original and useful action.

A New York Times article of November 8, 1970 en "Round-up of bottles improves only the manufactu image", says: "Glass bottle manufacturers, caught the concern over the environment, have mount nationwide promotional campaign to get people to tu their old bottles instead of throwing them away. D the effort, the manufacturers concede that it will do to solve the problem of the billions of glass bottles are discarded in the United States every year, tributing heavily to a growing solid waste problem the glass manufacturers hope that the campaig give them a better image at a time when people a creasingly concerned with the growing glut of wa the face of the land."

Mr. Cheeney, president of the Glass Cont Manufacturers Institute said, "We're shootin recycling 30 percent of our glass production", tha billion bottles out of 36 billion manufactured. That l no less than 25 billion bottles still uncollected. In however, the number collected is much less, ey says in the same N.Y. Times article that "the tion centres will never get above 5 percent." As the ction of glass containers was increasing at the rate ercent a year, it means that only one year's in- has been collected in the U.S. Even the hoped for cent collection is less than the total of 6 years in- in production.

he companies make a profit from their collection s? Probably not, or at least not directly. The same imes article reports: "The penny a pound, or $20 a he manufacturers are now paying for returned is the maximum amount they considered the used to be worth. But, Mr. Cheeney said, the cost of ing reclamation centers has brought the total p to as much as $36 a ton, which, he says, is well he breakeven point. The added cost has been ab- so far on the theory that is helping to improve the y's image." Further, Chemical Week of July 15, eports: "Cullet obtained in this program, one er points out, will cost the companies about $20 a d this cost must be added to the expenses of ing, handling, transporting and advertising. nies can easily purchase cullet less expensively, intains. Some say the program may be con- ly effective in public and community relations, the already extensive advertising by container acturers to induce wider use of glass bottles in nce to cans." The situation with cans may be t however for the Christian Science Monitor d on July 24, 1970 that: "Reynolds can afford to ns at $200 a ton because that's cheaper than aluminum at $250-$300 a ton." Cans, in contrast to are not of course so readily recycled without and reproducing.

dditional benefit to the companies is explained by ober 6, 1970 CBS report on Dominion Glass which ns a grinder which "would crush waste glassware non-returnable bottles which could than be sold ompany for $15 a ton to improve the operation of aces."

e industry journal Vend says in an August 1, 1970 "The soft drink industry has made several recent o reshape public opinion and mollify government s in the rapidly escalating war on litter." Are our s being "shaped" by industry? Our job is to our environment from the ravages of these s, not to co-operate with big business in their tive ways. We must force them and the govern- take the action necessary to insure complete g; and that means organized public pressure.

Revive Rock n' Roll!

The Balcony

By Harvey Kellerman
(brother of you-know-who)

One can come away from The Balcony, the drama department's major production for this term, with a kaleidescope of impressions. The first one that I carried with me, at approximately 11:45 p.m. (after having entered Convocation Hall at approximately 7:45 p.m.), was that the play was too long. While this is essentially a minor detail, in view of the over-all quality of the production, it did rather mar the good feeling one usually carries home after having seen such a "heavy" play (if you'll pardon the cliche; for once it really is suited to the situation).

The Balcony was essentially "about" people's fantasies. People often wish their dreams to come true, but we see in the House of Illusion, that when the hidden corners in peoples' minds become realities, the fantasies become a joyless burden, losing all of their dream-world spontaneity.

The character of the Police Chief particularly brought this metamorphic phenomenon to the fore. His only desire in life was to be imitated by the clients of the House of Illusions. To him, achieving this meant success in life. When the dream of the Police Chief comes true, it is horrendous and grotesque. Harmless, pleasurable fantasies become uncontrollable in reality.

The rebels, who were the so-called "carriers of truth" become just as perverted in the end as the hedonists whose life had no meaning, no reality -- the "regulars" at the House of Illusions. These rebels, as the new force for wiping out meaningless society, were defeated when they accepted the tactics of those elements that they were working against. By making Chantal equivalent to the Queen, they destroyed themselves and her. (Incidentally, I rather felt that the character of Chantal was a bit "overcooked" if youknowwhatimean!) These reform-minded people ended up sinking to the lowest common-denominator of humanity by turning their heads towards personal gain. One sees the Rebel Leader, who was the most idealistic in his group, becoming swallowed up by a very ugly personal reality.

Irma, outstanding as the character who had no illusions, had no redeeming qualities to make one feel sympathetic towards her. She used people, lived off their illusions. She strove to have a meaningful relationship with the Chief of Police, but proved incapable. In her House of Illusion, Irma was very much in control of the situation. She played a very domineering role but the quality of the acting was at times spasmodic; Irma, was an extremely powerful character in the first two acts of the play but became almost passive and tired out towards the end.

The Court Envoy was rather an amusing little bit of social satire. He, who spoke always in riddles and appeared to be clueless, was aware of exactly what was happening, which is not what one was led to expect.

At times the strength of the play fell down, partly due to its length and partly due to its lack of unity. The play had a very loose totality; while I have above stated some of my impressions as to what the play was "about", I do not feel that there was a coherent, unifying statement present that tied the entire production together.

There were many facets to this production and I do not pretend to have covered a substantial number of them, or even the most important ones; in the final analysis, however, perhaps the playwright's basic premise was that real change cannot happen with positive results. Striving for the ideal becomes subverted to the search for pleasure.

The stage-set was excellent, adding to the surrealistic qualities of The Balcony. The presence of the Sound Man created the awareness that the audience, also, was taking part in an Illusion.

Rugger Gaels finish undefeated

by Kees Kort

The last time Queen's University Rugger Gaels lost a match was in 1969 when they lost an OQAA championship game to U of T 24-12. Just as on that day in 1969, last Saturday was a cool windy fall day, but the Rugger Gaels turned the tables on the Toronto side and kept their perfect season intact by rolling to a 22-11 victory.

As in all the games this season, the fine passing of the Queen's backs coupled with the hard tackling and superior forward play accounted for the Queen's victory. The Rugger team however was given its toughest test of the year as the U of T side fielded a big tough experienced team which almost pulled off an upset.

Although Ron Easteal again figured prominently in the scoring, the Gaels other top scorers were shut out and tries came from Wayne Johannsen, who was called up from the seconds, fullback Alan Jeffrey, and Peter Grozelle and Deryk Reimer, who each scored their first try of the season.

Easteal opened the scoring early in the game when he counted three points on a penalty kick. Queen's continued the offensive and a fine display of passing and running by the backs resulted in the Johannsen try, converted by Easteal.

The game then featured a fine display of excellent rugby, as both teams drove deep into each other's zone but were thwarted by excellent defensive play. The highlight of the first half had to be a fine goal-line stand by the Gaels. U of T had driven to within one yard of the Queen's line but was forced out of bounds. Then on three consecutive line-outs from the one yard line and two five yard scrums, the gaels held and a fine punt by fullback Alan Jeffrey got Queen's out of trouble. From there the forwards put on a superb display of rucking which forced the ball deep into Toronto territory and Deryk Reimer capped the drive by plunging across the line to put the score at Queen's 11, Toronto 0.

Fullback Alan Jeffrey, who on numerous occasions bailed the Queen's side out of trouble through good punting rounded out the first half score when he faked a pass to winger Neil Peace, completely fooling the Toronto defenders, and Jeffrey scampered into the end zone untouched.

In the second half U of T's fine kicker, Seery, opened the scoring when he split the uprights on a penalty kick. U of T maintained the momentum when they took advantage of a Queen's defensive lapse and Bellem scored on a Toronto rush, which displayed sharp passing and good rucking. Seery converted. This was quickly followed up by another successful penalty kick by Seery. Queen's 14; Toronto 11.

The closeness of the score seemed to rouse the Queen's side and a fine forward rush and a Toronto penalty resulted in a good Easteal penalty kick.

The game then turned into a dire defensive battle with neither team having an advantage in the set serums, lineouts or rucking. The match ended with the finest running display of the day when Peter Grozelle took the ball from a loose ruck and evaded at least seven would-be tacklers en route to the end zone. Easteal converted. Final score: Queen's 22, Toronto 11.

The seconds' game was much like the firsts' with neither team having an advantage in the first half. Queen's opened the scoring early but the gusty wind thwarted Oppens convert attempt. Queen's scored again but again the wind spoiled the convert attempt. U of T rounded out the score when they rushed over the Queen's line. Half-time score; Queen's 6, Toronto 3.

In the second half the seconds steadily wore down the U of T team and took over control of the game. Fine tackling and passing resulted in three unconverted tries by Queen's while fine defensive play shut out the Toronto second XV. Final score: Queen's 15, Toronto 3.

Thus ends one of the finest seasons in Queen's Rugger Club history. Neither the firsts nor the seconds lost a game in league play, while the firsts also beat the Quebec League Champions, The Town of Mt. Royal, 11-8. In league play, the first XV rolled up 281 points while allowing only 23, 11 of which were scored by U of T last Saturday.

Volleyball Gals split Invitational Meet

Queen's held an Invitational Women's Volleyball Tournament on Saturday, hosting teams from Waterloo, McMaster, Carleton, Ottawa, and York. Two games were played in each match, and each team played all of the others.

The Queen's girls played a somewhat disorganized game throughout the afternoon. They seemed to have trouble with finding their proper defensive positions.

However the tournament was invaluable for just these reasons. The girls have not had a chance to learn to function as a unit due to the short practice time and the low number of players returning from last year's team. They also are learing to implement a new defensive setup to which they were just introduced to this past week.

Overall the girls put forth a good effort and lost both games of a match only to the powerful team from Waterloo who were the walkaway winners of the tournament. McMaster took second, with Queen's and Carleton tied, and followed by Ottawa and York.

As it was a long tiring tournament with only very short breaks, all members of the team were involved in the competition. This experience will be of use in practicing for the season opening game at York on Nov. 19.

Wizards open B-Ball season

By DAVE CAMERON

The Harlem Wizards returned to Queen's on Friday night, and a large crowd turned out to witness their basketball antics and routines. The Wizards, as an afterthought, played the Queen's Golden Gaels basketball team, and, of course, won 66-45. The score wasn't important, though. In fact, the game wasn't even important. After all, when you've won 220 straight games, what's another one?

Instead, the Wizards put on extracurricular displays of ballhandling, kibitzing with the referee and the crowd, and teaching a smaller member of the audience (plus five or six Gaels) how to play basketball.

Early in the game a stray dog provided some extra entertainment. A few people thought it might be a part of the Wizards' show, but it finally wandered into the audience and was taken from the gym. Anything can happen in a Wizards game.

Other highlights: The long-standing pull-down-the-pants routine of the Wizards was reversed by Gale guard Dave Smith, who "pulled" the joke twice on unsuspecting Wizards and was finally chased from the gym for his misdemeanors....A halftime juggling and ballhandling exhibition by LaLa Lawrence, followed by a basketball teach-in. The result were impressive as the pupil, a little boy from the crowd, copied LaLa's ballhandling techniques perfectly and then sunk his first foul shot try. Hope the Gaels were watching...A slow motion baseball game that made the Pittsburgh Pirates look like a high school team...a striptease by a certain Journal photographer who wishes to remain nameless (I wonder why?)...and Lesson I of the Frank Tindall Dance Routine, music provided by the basketball.

Most of the routines were old hat to people who saw the Wizards last year, or who have seen the Harlem Globetrotters, but they were still entertaining nevertheless. The Wizards referee was not present at the game, and one of the local Kingston referees was used as a replacement. This detracted a bit, because much of the appeal of the Wizards is based on their antics with their referee.

A last word on the Gaels: With the loss of most of the regulars from last year, they face a large rebuilding job this year in a tougher league. But if some of the rookies prove capable of playing good basketball, and a few looked pretty good Friday night, the team should make a fairly respectable showing.

Waterpolo Gaels sweep tournament

Sparked by the aggressive play of Gord Hurd and Steve Patterson, and the fine work of goaltenders John Earle and Doug Wilkie, the Waterpolo Gaels swept to first place in the International Meet held here Saturday. Hurd scored 7 goals and Paterson and Nesbitt 5 each as Queen's downed R.M.C. 10-5, St. Lawrence 8-5, and Plattsburg 8-5. Other Queen's goals came from Chlebo, with 4, Craig and Howard, with two each, and Tyreman and Patterson, with singles. Plattsburg finished second, with St. Lawrence and RMC third and fourth

Hockey Gaels split weekend games

By RON PRATT

The hockey Gaels split a pair of weekend games to bring their exhibition record to 2-and-2. Both games were decided in the third period. On Friday, Queen's used seven third-period goals to trounce the Kingston Jr. Frontenacs 11-2, but the tables turned sharply Saturday as the York Yeomen counted four goals in the final 20 minutes to dump the Gaels 8-4.

Queen's completely dominated Friday's action, outshooting the Frontenacs 65-24, and completely controlling the game. Only the spectacular goaltending of D'arcy Walters kept the Gaels under the 20 goal level. Colin Loudin and Bill White both scored twice to lead the Gaels' attack, while John Smith, Morris Mott, Bruce Cameron, Bob Kindon, Murray Douglas, Stan Galt and Norm Goulet added the others.

Loudon also drew two assists while Cameron added three. Mike McKeown and Phil Tracey scored for the Frontenacs.

The extent of the team effort Friday was reflected in the statistics; everyone except for Doug Barton and the goalies picked up at least one scoring point. The forwards checked the Frontenacs into the ice, controlling the puck at will, and finally started to finish off their scoring chances, while the defense continued to move the puck well.

They also began to play more aggressively, a very desireable development. Carnegie appears to have at least temporarily solved the goaltending question, by keeping both Bill Minnis and Al Brown as backups to starter Dlyde Harris.

The Gaels appeared headed to their third victory against York Saturday, taking a 2-1 lead in the first period on goals by Bob Kindon and Dave Melloy. York came back to tie the score 4-4 at the end of the second period, then took the lead on an early third-period goal by defenseman Brent Imlach (yes, that one) that seemed to take the steam out of the Gaels.

After that it was all downhill for Queen's. York got two goals from Steve Latinovitch and singles from Imlach, Frank Grace, Ken Pullard, Don Fraser, John Globensky and Dave Wright. Mott and Dave Nuttall added the Gaels' other markers.

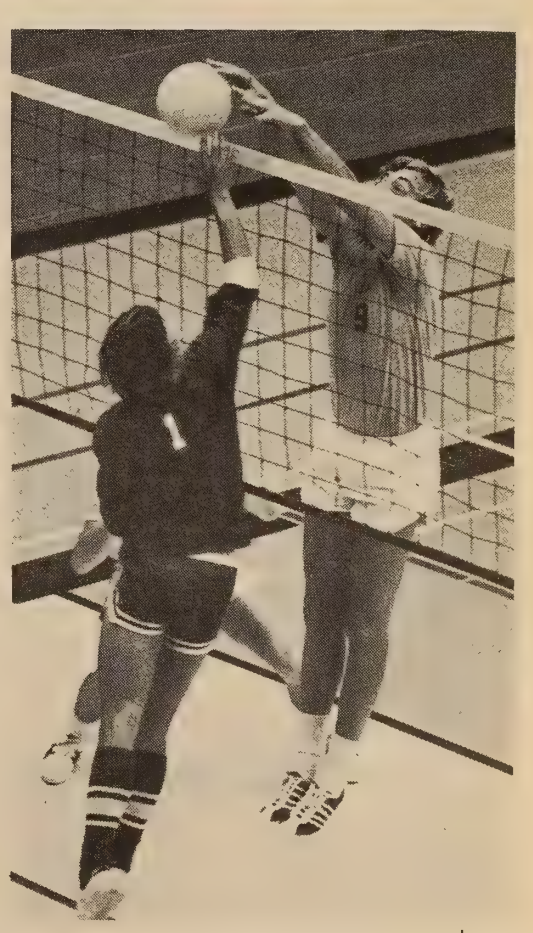
Coach Bob Carnegie attributed the loss to a third-period defensive lapse, but refused to become upset by the defeat. He indicated that it was "a good lesson for our rookies, who now have an idea of what they have to do in this league."

"Carnegie seemed confident that the Gaels would be ready for their league opener against Ryerson, and indicated that York could expect more problems next time round."

The Gaels' defeat is no reai cause for alarm. The Yeomen have a good, fast-skating club, led by ex-pro Brent Imlach, and may be close to the top of the OUAA.

Their final exhibition contest is against St. Lawrence College at 7:00 p.m. tonight, in the Harty Arena. Be there!

B-Ball Gals throw one away



Would you believe 27 turnovers? In one half of basketball? You say no???Wrong! Queen's B-Ball Gals managed to perform this almost-impossible feat Saturday in the University of Ottawa Invitational Meet. Playing the host U. of O. squad in the second round, the Gale Gals stayed close to the hot-shooting GeeGees in a fast-paced first half, but faltered when the parade of errors began.

All was not gloom, however. Queen's displayed their potential abilities in the first game against a hapless Sir George Williams squad, running up an incredible 89-14 victory. The Gals' fast break and stiff full-court press simply overpowered SGU. Pat Patterson picked up 14 points while Sue Higgins and Loney Marshall added 13 each for the Gales. In the second contest, the final score was 76-47, with Higgins again getting 13 points and Karen Carson adding 9.

League play begins November 19th with games against York and U. of T. in Toronto, and Coach Brenda Mackie has every expectation that her girls will be ready. The team is young, and has not had much time to work together, so watch for improvement throughout the season. The first home game will be against Laurentian December 4th.

"Who was that man I saw you outwit last night?"

CANADA

QUEBEC - The Quebec government is considering though new legislation which would hold organizers of "illegal" demonstrations and perhaps even the participants responsible for any violence that ensued.

The government is also investigating Quebec's three main labor union federations to see if they have the right to use their funds for political purposes.

The two-pronged attack on the political militancy of Quebec's labor unions is the latest government reaction to protests over the shutdown of the Montreal newspaper La Presse last week.

Camille Laurin, parliamentary leader of the separatist Parti Quebecois, said last night the government moves are "creating the conditions for a revolution" in Quebec.

Justice Minister Jerome Choquette told the Quebec National Assembly the government may introduce legislation similar to France's controversial Loi anti-Caseurs (anti-troublemaker law) "to ensure that freedom is exercised within legality."

The law, which went into effect last year in France, provides for a jail sentence of from one to five years for anyone found guilty of organizing or taking part in an "illicit" demonstration that results in violence or property damage.

The law was adopted despite a massive protest campaign by opposition parties, labor unions and leading intellectuals in France.

If Quebec does adopt the French legislation it could severely curtail freedom of assembly and protest as at present embodied in the Canadian democratic system.

The French law, in effect, means that a person taking part in a demonstration which has been banned by a mere administrative decision of a municipality can be jailed for any disorder that occurs even if he is not personally involved.

OTTAWA - Smallpox vaccinationhas so reduced the incidence of cases that in the Western world today there is greater danger of death or illness from vaccination than from smallpox itself.

In the past 20 years, only one death in Canada has been attributed to smallpox. The person who died contracted the disease in another country. On the other hand, a Health Department spokesman said, one or two people a year died from the effects of smallpox vaccination and many more become ill.

The vaccination has been dropped in the United States and Britain.

The Ontario Government will hire 500 unemployed young people to work in social agencies across the province this winter.

Thomas Wells, Minister of Social and Family Services said yesterday the program, called Project 500, 18-to-25-year-old high school graduates.

Successful applicants will receive a salary of $85 to $100 a week to assist professional social workers.

They will work in private and government social agencies such as day-care centres, homes for the aged, sheltered workshops and family service associations.

THE WORLD

BHUBANESWAR, India - New storm warnings went out Friday in the cyclone-devastated state of Orissa but shattered communications left many people unaware of returning danger.

As central government relief operations gradually moved ahead from the airport of this state capital, weather reports said another cyclone could strike.

A storm centre with winds of 60 miles an hour, and intensifying, was about 250 miles south of the Orissa port of Paradip and could hit coastal areas by late today, the reports warned.

Communications were destroyed in the Cuttack and Balasore areas of the state by last weekend's storm and tidal wave that killed at least 10,000-possibly as many as 25,000-people.

Government ministers admitted that the population there will not know of the approaching storm unless they have radios - an unlikely prospect in view of local poverty and the cyclone devastation. The main contribution to the relief operation yesterday was the arrival of U.S.-built C-119 transport planes of the Indian Air Force carrying blankets, tents, milk powder - and 40 vital radio sets.

WASHINGTON - President Richard Nixon told Indian Prime Minister Mrs. Indira Gandhi Thursday, that the United States would try to encourage a political settlement of the East Pakistan crisis without openly intervening or abandoning quiet diplomacy behind the scenes.

Mrs. Gandhi had stated publicly earlier that she had come to the White House to seek help for India in its tense confrontation with Pakistan over the East Pakistani refugee problem.

But presidential spokesman Ronald Ziegler said that after "very straightforward" talks, the two leaders had failed to narrow their differences.

MOSCOW - The atmosphere weighs 5 quadrillion, 157 trillion tons, the Soviet Union said today in an announcement of great import to scientists and connoisseurs of trivia.

The official Tass news agency said an electronic brain known as the Minsk-22 computer had figured out the total weight of earth's air cover more precisely than had been done before.

"This calculation is essential for research in cosmonautics, space geodesy and gravimetry," Tass said.

SANTIAGO - Marxist President Salvador Allende told 80,000 cheering workers yesterday that he had achieved more during the last 12 months than Castro's revolution had done during its first year in power.

"This is not meant as a derogatory statement about Cuba, but when Fidel Castro arrives I will put the question to him and I am sure what his answer will be," Allende said.

The nationalization of American copper holdings in Chile, which stirred anger in the United States, was brushed over in Allende's speech.

Both the Anaconda and Kennecott mining companies have appealed a government ruling that they are owed no compensation for their nationalized properties because "excess profits" exceeded their estimated book value of more than $600 million.

DUBLIN. Irish Republic - Moderate Prime Minister Jack Lynch yesterday lost his over-all majority in the Irish parliament after a dissident member of the ruling Fianna Fail party resigned.

Lynch whose strength in the 144 member House was reduced to 72 including the speaker who only votes in the case of a tie, called a crucial confidence vote for Wednesday.

If Lynch loses the vote a general election could be held before Christmas.

Fianna Fail member Desmond Foley apparently resigned to protest Lynch's kid-glove handling of the crisis in neighboring Northern Ireland.

WASHINGTON - Senate critics of the Nixon administration's foreign aid program have moved to keep it alive - at a sharp price.

The Senate foreign relations committee agreed yesterday to authorize $2.3 billion until next June 30 for economic, humanitarian and military aid.

President Richard Nixon had requested $3.5 billion and the Senate had approved $2.9 billion before it killed the entire aid program in a surprise vote last Friday.

The critics stuck to their guns despite a counter blast issued by deputy defence secretary David Packard. He told a press conference Thursday, that last Friday's vote was "an absolute disaster" that "seriously undercut" the Nixon foreign policy at a crucial point.

The Senate critics, however, not only cut the administration request but they added to the complication of congressional approval by splitting the aid program into two parts.

One bill was authorized for economic and humanitarian assistance of about $1.14 billion.

WASHINGTON - A spokesman for Senator Mike Gravel of Alaska said Thursday the senator has been told another hole is being dug on Amchitka Island, site of a planned underground nuclear test, and he fears the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission will use it for another test in the future.

For efficiency, close Parliament?

OTTAWA - Libera whip Grant Deachman says the House of Commons should be shut down periodically to promote greater parliamentary efficiency.

The reason: The MPs are bored with the dull, lengthy debates in the House.

He said members of all parties find the debates dull and this feeling is worrying party whips, who are responsible for keeping up attendance. Mr. Deachman said the MPs' time would be better spent working in committees or in their constituencies.

"We should have much more flexibility in using the Commons. We should be able to close it for days at a time or for a few hours. We are hung up on this procedure that sees the House meeting Monday through Friday."

Mr. Deachman said his proposal would meet with protest from some of the more traditional members of Parliament, particularly as it would mean the occasional loss of the daily question period.

"That wouldn't be the end of the world. As it is, two-thirds of the questions are irrelevant, outdated or out-of-order."

No other legislature spends as much time on debates as the House of Commons, he said.

'It is not unreasonable to predict that some day man will climb to the moon.'

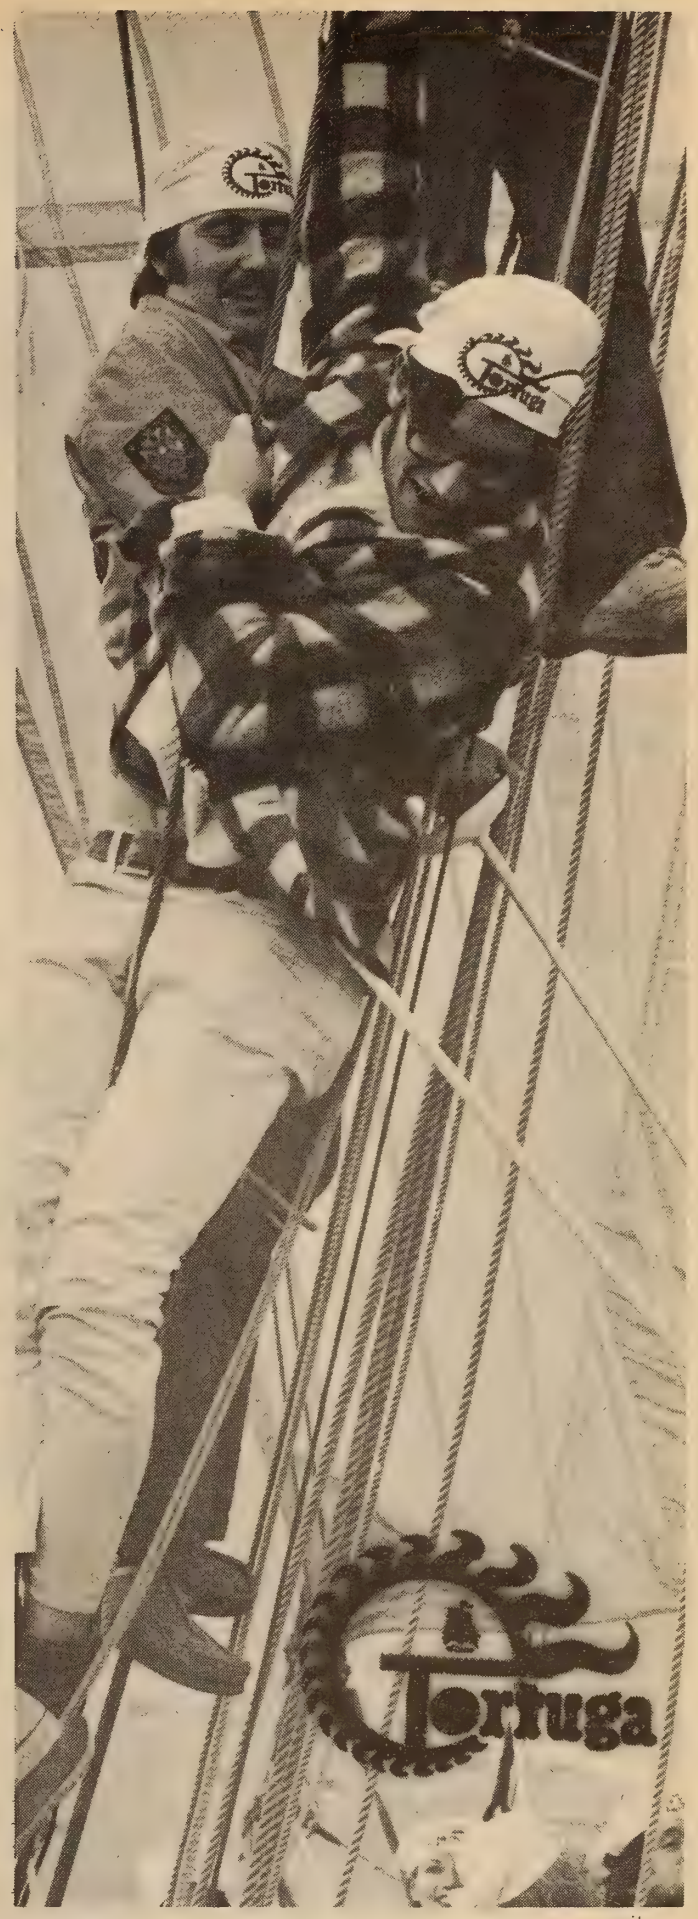
Referendum is called

A referendum on coed residences will be held Wednesday, November 17.

The Women's Residence Council, which decided Monday night, on the basis of last week's "Mock application", that it did not want to call a referendum, was persuaded Tuesday night in a joint meeting with the Inter-Residence Council to call the vote for next week.

It is not binding, but will carry great weight with the WRC, the IRC and the residence boards.



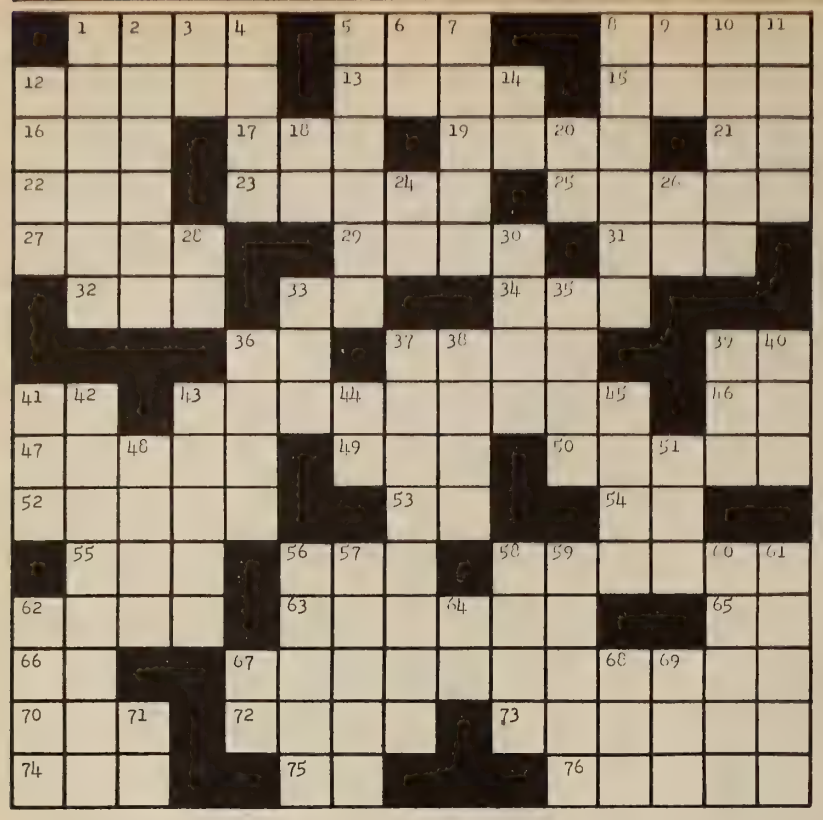
The text of the referendum will be as follows:

1. Regardless of whether you would prefer to live in coeducational residences at Queen's, do you think that the proposal to integrate Gordon Brockington House with the men so displaced being accommodated in the other men's residences, including Chown Hall, should be instituted in September 1972 for those who do so wish?

2. Will you apply to live in Gordon-Brockington as a co-educational residence for the 1972-73 academic session?

3. In which residence do you presently live?

4. In what university year are you presently enrolled?



wilson

"They travelled a short while towards the sun and left the vivid air signed with their honour."

The university pauses today to honour the sacrifice of those who went out and did not come back -- including three hundred and sixty-two Queen'smen -- in the two World Wars; to remember their sacrifice and to resolve that peace will come and mean that sacrifice need not be repeated. The university service in Grant Hall this morning, offered by chaplain Dr. A. M. Laverty, is only one form of that remembrance.

"Would Man but wake from out his haunted sleep, Earth might be fair and all men glad and wise."

That hair on your face.

If you're about to graduate, you're also about to move into a corporate world dominated by older people. Older people have been known to get quite tense about long hair and beards.

What do you do if your hair is longer than theirs? Cut it off and feel like a cop out? Leave it and risk losing a fine job?

Not shattering questions. But they may be part of a thicket of little problems, all twitching at you as you start those job interviews.

We wrote a booklet about going to job interviews. Eight pages only, but we packed it with what we've learned about coming face to face with strangers. The thrust is simple: how to approach, engage in and leave an interview on your own terms.

It's called "How to separate yourself from the herd." It talks about handling nervousness, money, and the guy across the desk from you. It talks about hair and how to turn an interview around. Things like that.

You'll find it tucked into a much larger book, also new, called The Employment Opportunities Handbook. The handbook is yours for the asking at the placement office.

Please understand, though. We don't kid you that eight pages, packed or otherwise, are going to pull off a miracle between now and the time you take your first interview.

But they just might help.

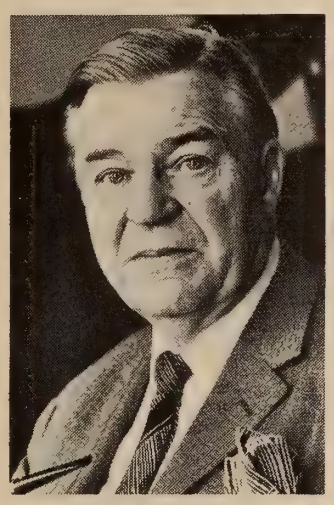
National development misunderstood, visitor says



The 1971 Brockington Lecture, given Monday evening by Dr. Gunnar Myrdal, was on the subject of " the needed radical reforms in underdeveloped countries".

The approach Myrdal followed was to attack the two periods, pre-war and post-war, in which policy for underdeveloped countries seems to have been formalized. The pre-war period was a "colonial period", while the post-war time, Myrdal suggested, was characterized by decolonization, which even up to contemporary times "has swept over the globe like an avalanche".

There are problems with both developmental models, he said. The earlier one is couched in "pessimism", and the present, post-war model is too "optimistic". Both approaches "are static", Myrdal said, and furthermore are based firmly in European ethnocentrism.

Certainly one of the major areas of contention which Myrdal mentioned was that of statistics. The figures so far compiled are "clearly made to order for people of developing countries," Myrdal said.

The problem, he suggested, is that the figures are being quoted and used by academics devising theories. In fact, he went on, the figures often are only intended to influence the developed countries into offering more foreign aid.

"This tendency towards bias has even involved terminology," Myrdal declared. Another popular problem, he said, is the sentiment which he called "apologetic". The term "underdeveloped country" was a replacement for the earlier, possibly pejorative "backward", he said. And "underdeveloped," he went on to explain, was later changed to "developing".

"Such politeness," Myrdal later said, "might seem to be unimportant," but he insisted that it tells much about the underlying feelings of politicians who rely on it.

In any case, he said, the future for development of now underdeveloped countries is quite dim. "We do not yet have a theory of development", he pointed out.

At another point he said, about the current post-war theory, "It is natural that views tend to be distorted," and "a realistic view can never be inspired by optimistic biases."

Closer to the end of his presentation, Myrdal effectively pointed to the basic dichotomy of the underdeveloped country.He quoted a former prime minister of India as saying that "we have atomic energy, and we also have cow dung."

In relation to producing an effective model for development, Myrdal said he could only fall back on the tradition which his academic subject, economics, applies to it. He said that "the tide is still rising, and we economists are, as usual, riding the crest."

The need now is for realistic statistics, Myrdal said, and only in that way can "speedy and safe development" be ensured.

LaPierre to meet Myrdal

Brockington Visitor Dr. Gunnar Myrdal will join Canadian historian Laurier LaPierre tonight for a discussion of Canadian independence "or", its sponsors say, "the declaration of Canadian independence for the near future".

Myrdal is to be the focal point for a discussion which hopefully will be a "free and fruitful exchange of opinions, based on more than just rhetoric".

Everyone interested in looking at the Canadian nation and national consciousness from the political, economic and sociological standpoints is invited.

The session, which is sponsored by Science 44 co-op, begins at 8:30 tonight in the lower common room of Victoria Hall.

Explosion blamed on refrigerator

The explosion which ripped through a laboratory in the basic sciences building on Stuart Street last Tuesday night has been blamed on a refrigerator.

Kingston fire chief Warren Gibson told The Journal that the laboratory refrigerator in the work area of Dr. H. B. Dinsdale apparently caused the blast when ether escaped through a broken seal on its door.

The ether, being heavier than air, apparently settled around the motor at the bottom of the refrigerator, Gibson said, and when the motor started up its spark caused the ether to explode.

There would be no evidence of the ether when an investigation took place, he said; it would have burned off almost instantly.

The fire chief said he had written to the manufacturer of the refrigerator (he would not say who the manufacturer was) to get assurance that no explosive substance was used in the cooling system, as had previously been conjectured. Non-flammable freon, a halogenated hydrocarbon, is used in most domestic and industrial cooling systems, he said.

The blast which occurred at 10:20 p.m. Tuesday, smashed windows and touched off flames, bringing firemen to the scene. Dinsdale said most of the damage was caused by smoke, and that the laboratory instruments were being checked for damage by the manufacturer.

Gibson said damage costs would be between two and three thousand dollars.

Lloyd Cushing, assistant to the secretary of the university -- the office which handles legal matters -- said the laboratory was still being examined by insurance agents, and that the damage probably would be covered by the $127 million fire insurance policy which Queen's carries on the contents of its buildings.

Film department examined

The department of film studies is undergoing a review to see whether it should continue to exist, and what it should do.

Such a review is normal for an academic department after it has been in operation for three years. A review board, consisting of three faculty members from other departments, examines the department and makes recommendations.

The board for the film department, whose chairman is Dr. Peter Leslie of the department of political studies, will be presenting its recommendations to the faculty board in December.

There are two professors in the department of film studies: J. Peter Harcourt and Robin P. Wood. They teach four courses. When the department began, by separating from the department of English, Harcourt alone was the department; Wood joined him last year.

Seventy students take the introductory film course, and 90 more take advanced courses. Offices, film-making equipment and seminar rooms are in Film House on Stuart Street, across from Chown Hall; most screenings are in Ellis Hall auditorium.

There is a definite need for more coursea and instructors, judging from student response to the present programme, according to film DSC chairman Kathy McSweeney.

Harcourt is presently visiting the film departments at other Canadian universities to see what techniques they use that can be adopted at Queen's. His proposals will be presented to faculty board when the review committee makes its report.

Last year, Queen's and York were the only Canadian universities which offered concentrations in film studies.

. . in Victoria

The Women's Residence Council has set up an office in Victoria Hall (behind the main floor desk) and it will be open from 4 to 6 p.m., Monday to Friday, president Cindy Davidson has announced.

The phone number is 544-6038.

Miss Davidson said using the office for business would let WRC executives have more time to themselves. She said messages relating to student government in women's res should be directed to the office.

. . in the gym

Cleerleaders will be a familiar sight at basketball as well as football games this year.

A group of cheerleaders drawn from auditions next week, and headed by veteran Gary Sparks, will appear at home basketball games, cheerleader Lisa Eichhorn told The Journal.

Response to cheerleaders was not enthusiastic when they occasionally appeared in the gym last year, Miss Eichhorn said. She pointed out that an indoor room like the gym can inhibit cheering.

Another difficulty was that cheerleaders have as much homework as anyone else during basketball season, she said.

Cheerleader Barb Brown, an enthusiastic Gaels hockey fan, expressed an interest in having cheerleaders at home hockey games as well. But no decision has been made on that yet, she said.

The Queen's Drama Guild is sponsoring a London Theatre Tour in the February reading break, the 21st to the 27th. The trip, which includes transportation, accommodation, breakfasts and tickets for seven shows is open to everyone and is designed to offer a wide variety of theatrical experiences. These include side trips to the Royal Shakespeare, National, West End, Mermaid, Club and avant-garde productions.

Total cost of the London Theatre Tour is $250 for students and $275 for non-students. The trip leaves Kingston, Sunday February 20 and returns Sunday 27.

The guild is currently engaged in a number of money making ventures which will hopefully reduce the cost of the trip.

If interested in taking the tour please mail a completed application form and $50 deposit to the Drama Guild Theatre Tour, basement of Theological Hall. For more information phone 547-5780 between 2.30 and 3.30 Tuesday through Friday.

in high school

The virtues and need of a traditional, knowledge-oriented education cannot be replaced, biochemistry professor Dr. T. G. F. Flynn told graduates of LaSalle Secondary School east of Kingston at their commencement exercises Saturday.

Somewhere along the line intellectual leaders have "betrayed" young people into believing that feeling is everything, he said.

"To de-emphasize the importance of acquiring knowledge would be disastrous -- for example, to go to a surgeon who was long on empathy but short on surgery," Flynn said.

"Many leading educators seem to have spurned the knowledge and truth which man has struggled to acquire over five thousand years or so," he continued. "Instead, they are telling young people that experience and passion are all.

Protests criticized

Two Queen's physics professors said Sunday that Canadian protests against the Amchitka nuclear test were "misplaced" by focussing only on environmental effects of the test. Dr. J. Duncan MacArthur and Dr. David B. McLay were speaking in a discussion at Chalmers United Church in Kingston, saluting Remembrance Day.

They concluded that the blast was safe but morally indefensible as a threat to world peace.

"The test was held underground roughly one mile, and a large amount of dirt trapped it," MacArthur said, "There is really no danger that I could see of radioactivity coming free."

And McLay said the Amchitka protests were "a tempest in a teapot" when they talked about environmental and health danger.

He referred to the test as a "psychological climate of retaliation, based on the presumption that the Russians are going to send over nuclear warheads"

MacArthur said that Amchitka blast was designed to test a weapon which is supposed to intercept missiles entering the United States. Such interception would take place seventy to 100 miles above Canadian soil, he said.

He said there is no sense in having such a weapon because it would not save the world from war or long-lasting radioactivity. Even if 95 per cent of the missiles sent were stopped by the USSR or the United States he said, the remaining five per cent would destroy the country being attacked.

"Hiroshima and Nagasaki were trivial compared with Amchitka explosion," MacArthur said. "One of a similar size could erase all of New York City."

"The protest I would like to see is against war itself," he said. "Very idealistic – to find ways of preventing war, not of development of offensive and defensive weapons."

Geography comments wanted

The principal's office has invited geography students to say what they think Queen's should look for in a new chairman for their department.

The present chairman, Dr. R. H. T. Smith, has resigned effective September 1 next year, and a committee will be set up to look for a replacement. Meanwhile, students and faculty are asked to comment on the future of the department and the sort of person who should be considered.

Comments should be directed to arts and science dean Dr. Ron Watts.

Freshmen say farewell to Kingston high schools

Four first-year students were valedictorians at high schools in this area during commencement exercises last weekend.

At Napanee District Secondary School,: Life sciences student Larry Keech of Yarker.

At LaSalle Secondary School: French student Andrea Thiel, who told graduates they should use their education to "change and affect our society".

At Kingston Collegiate and Vocational Institute: sociology student JoAnn Kaitting, who said high school training is chiefly memorization.

"What right has any institution to label a person stupid just on the basis of memory work?" Miss Katting asked in her valedictory address.

But, she said, "perhaps it is unfair to expect an institution dedicated to the mass production of diplomas to educate.

"For many of us, education in a real sense has not yet begun," she said. "When we honestly examine our own feelings, when we've talked to and worked with and tried to understand other people, when we've worked with others toward the solution of one or more of the world's many problems, and when we've talked and listened and thought and loved, given of ourselves and received in return, then and only then can we call ourselves educated."

At Prince Edward Collegiate Institute: engineering student Robert Smith of Bloomfield, who said the most important thing students carry away from high school is awareness.

"We came to high school looking for great knowledge and believing that when we left, we would know nearly everything. Now we graduate realizing that this was not the purpose, but we had to search for something of more vital importance," Smith said.

"When we came here we though we would leave as intellectuals, but now our five years are up and we didn't quite make it."

He said students had learned to look for more than just facts.

(The Journal will be glad to hear of other freshmen who were valedictorians this year, not necessarily only in the Kingston area.)

Open house is closed

"There will once again be no organized Open House programme this spring," committee chairman Peter Andrews has announced.

He told The Journal, "Unfortunately, we just haven't time to get it rolling."

At least eighteen people willing to work on the open house project would be needed, he said, to contact high schools, receive replies, organize events, provide for eating facilities and arrange the programme.

The last open house was in 1969, he said, organized by former Tricolor editor and AMS rep Rosemary Leese.

The AMS budgeted $1,000 for Open House this year; fifteen thousand high school students and teachers would have been invited to campus during a two-day programme. Parents, alumni and the general public would have been welcome as well.

An open house could be run next year if someone wants to spend the time on it, Andrews said, but he would have to start work now, and much of next summer would be needed to make the arrangements.

Events for high school students will be held this year as usual, organized through the high school liaison officer of the registrar's office -- former AMS speaker, pub manager and band manager Bob Buller.

War – what is it good for?

By Aldous Huxley
(1937)

Every road towards a better state of society is blocked, sooner or later, by war, by threats of war, by preparations for war. That is the truth, the odious and unescapable truth...

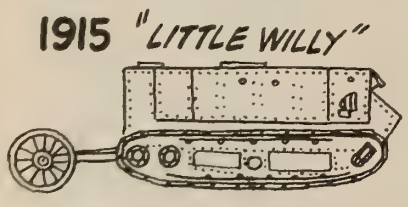
Let us very briefly consider the nature of war, the causes of war and the possible alternatives to war, the methods of curing the mania of militarism afflicting the world at the present time.

Nature of War

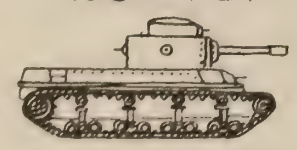
(i.) War is a purely human phenomenon. The lower animals fight duels in the heat of sexual excitement and kill for food and occasionally for sport. But the activities of a wolf eating a sheep or a cat playing with a mouse are no more warlike than the activities of butchers and fox-hunters. Similarly, fights between hungry dogs or rutting stags are like pot-house quarrels and have nothing in common with war, which is mass-murder organized in cold blood. Some social insects, it is true, go out to fight in armies; but their attacks are always directed against members of another species. Man is unique in organizing the mass murder of his own species.

(ii) Certain biologists, of whom Sir Arthur Keith is the most eminent, consider that war acts as "nature's pruning hook," ensuring the survival of the fittest among civilized individuals and nations. This is obviously nonsensical. War tends to eliminate the young and strong and to spare the unhealthy. Nor is there any reason for supposing that people with traditions of violence and a good technique of war-making are superior to other people. The most valuable human beings are not necessarily the most warlike. Nor as a matter of historical fact is it always the most warlike who survive. We can sum up by saying that, so far as individuals are concerned, war selects dysgenically; so far as nations and peoples are concerned it selects purely at random, sometimes ensuring the domination and survival of the more warlike peoples, sometimes, on the contrary ensuring their destruction and the survival of the unwarlike.

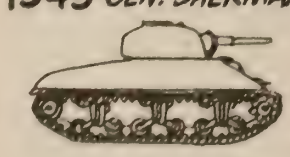
(iii) There exist at the present time certain primitive human societies, such as that of the Eskimos, in which war is unknown and even unthinkable. All civilized societies, however, are warlike. The question arises whether the correlation between war and civilization is necessary and unavoidable. The evidence of archaeology seems to point to the conclusion that war made its appearance at a particular moment in the history of early civilization. There is reason to suppose that the rise of war was correlated with an abrupt change in the mode of human consciousness. This change, as Dr. J. D. Unwin suggests, may have been correlated with increased sexual continence on the part of the ruling classes of the warlike societies. The archaelogical symptom of the change is the almost sudden appearance of royal palaces and elaborate funerary monuments. The rise of war appears to be connected with the rise of self-conscious leaders, preoccupied with the ideas of personal domination and personal survival after death. Even today when economic considerations are supposed to be supreme, ideas of "glory" and "immortal fame" still ferment in the minds of the dictators and generals, and play an important part in the causation of war.



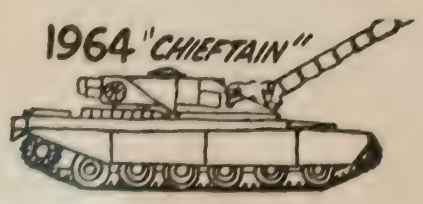
(iv) The various civilizations of the world have adopted fundamentally difficult attitudes towards war. Compare the Chinese and Indian attitudes towards war with the European. Europeans have always worshipped the military hero and, since the rise of Christianity, the martyr. Not so the Chinese. The ideal human being, according to Confucian standards, is the just, reasonable, humane and cultivated man, living at peace in an ordered and harmonious society. Confucianism, to quote Max Weber, "prefers a wise prudence to mere physical courge and declares that an untimely sacrifice of life is unfitting for a wise man." Our European admiration for military herosim and martyrdom has tended to make men believe that a good death is more important than a good life and that a long course of folly and crime can be cancelled out by a single act of physical courage. The mysticism of Lao Tsu (or whoever was the author of the Tao Teh Ching) confirms and completes the rationalism of Confucius. The Tao is an internal cosmic principle that is, at the same time, the inmost root of the individual's being. Those who would live in harmony with Tao must refrain from assertiveness, self-importance and aggressiveness, must cultivate humility and return good for evil.



Since the time of Confucius and Lao Tsu, Chinese ideals have been essentially pacifistic. European poets have glorified war; European theologians have found justification for religious persecution and nationalistic aggression. This has not been so in China. Chinese philosophers and Chinese poets have almost all been anti-militarists. The soldier was regarded as an inferior being, not to be put on the same level with the scholar or administrator. It is one of the tragedies of history that the Westernization of China should have meant the progressive militarization of a culture which, for nearly three thousand years, has consistently preached the pacifist ideal. Conscription was imposed on large numbers of Chinese in 1936, and the soldier is now held up for admiration. Japanese aggression is bound to intensify this new militaristic spirit in China. Within a couple of generations, it is possible that China will be an aggressive imperialist power.



Indian pacifism finds its completest expression in the teaching of Buddha. Buddhism, like Hinduism, teaches ahimsa, or harmlessness towards all living beings. It forbids even laymen to have anything to do with the manufacture and sale of arms, with the making of poisons and intoxicants, with soldiering or the slaughter of animals. Alone of all the great world religions, Buddhism made its way without persecution, censorship or inquisition. In all these respects its record is enormously superior to that of Christianity, which made its way among people wedded to militarism and which was able to justify the bloodthirsty tendencies of its adherents by an appeal to the savage Bronze-Age literature of the Old Testament. For Buddhists, anger is always and unconditionally disgraceful. For Christians, brought up to identify Jehovah with God, there is such a thing as "righteous indignation." Thanks to this possibility of indignation being righteous, Christians have always felt themselves justified in making war and committing the most hideous atrocities.



The fact that it should have been possible for the three principal civilizations of the world to adopt three distinct philosophic attitudes towards war is encouraging; for it proves that there is nothing "natural" about our present situation in relation to war. The existence of war and of our political and theological justifications of war is no more "natural" than were the sanguinary manifestations of sexual jealousy, so common in Europe up to the beginning of last century and now of such rare occurrence. To murder one's unfaithful wife, or the lover of one's sister or mother, was something that used to be "done." Being socially correct it was regarded as inevitable, a manifestation of unchanging "human nature." Such murders are no longer fashionable among the best people, therefore no longer seem to us "natural." The malleability of human nature is such that there is no reason why, if we so desire and set to work in the right way, we should not rid ourselves of war as we have freed tremely interesting, at least during the first years of the war. Rumour runs riot, and the papers are crammed every morning with the most thrilling news. To the influence of the press must be attributed the fact that, whereas during the Franco-Prussian War the suicide rate declined only in the belligerent countries, during the World War a considerable decline was registered even in the neutral states. In 1870 about half the inhabitants of Europe were unable to read, and newspapers were few and expensive. By 1914 primary education had everywhere been compulsory for more than a generation and the addiction to newspaper reading had spread to all classes of the population. Thus, even neutrals were able to enjoy, vicariously and at second hand, the exciting experience of war.

Up to the end of the last war non-combatants, except in countries actually subject to invasion, were not in great physical danger. In any future war it is clear that they will be exposed to risks almost, if not quite, as great as those faced by the fighting men. This will certainly tend to diminish the enthusiasm of non-combatants for war. But if it turns out that the effects of air bombardment are less frightful than most experts at present believe they will be, this enthusiasm may not be extinguished altogether, at any rate during the first months of a war. During the last war, a fair proportion of the combatants actually enjoyed some phases at least of the fighting. The escape from the dull and often stultifying routines of peace-time life was welcomed, even though that escape was bought at a price of physical hardship and the risk of death and multilation. It is possible that conditions in any future war will be so appalling that even the most naturally adventurous and combative human beings will soon come to hate and fear the process of fighting. But until the next war actually breaks out nobody can have experience of the new conditions of fighting. Meanwhile, all the governments are actively engaged in making a subtle kind of propaganda that is directed against potential enemies but not against war. They warn their subjects that they will be bombarded from the air by fleets of enemy planes; they persuade or compel them to subject themselves to air-raid drills and other forms of military discipline; they proclaim the necessity of piling up enormous armaments for the purpose of counter-attack and retaliation and they actually build those armaments to the tune, in most European countries of nearly or fully half the total national revenue.

(ii) A principal cause of war is nationalism, and nationalism is immensely popular because it is psychologically satisfying to individual nationalists. Every nationalism is an idolatrous religion, in which the god is the personified state, represented in many instances by a more or less deified king or dictator. Membership of the exhypothesi divine nation is thought of as imparting of a kind of mystical pre-eminence. Thus, all "God's Englishmen" are superior to "the lesser breeds without the law" and every individual God's-Englishman is entitled to think himself superior to every member of the lesser breed, even the lordliest and wealthiest even the most intelligent, the most highly gifted, the most saintly. Any man who believes strongly enough in the local nationalistic idolatry can find in his faith an antidote against even the most acute inferiority complex. Dictators feed the flames of national vanity and reap their reward in the gratitude of millions to whom the conviction that they are participants in the glory of the divine nation brings relief from the gnawing consciousness of poverty, social unimportance and personal insignificance.

Self-esteem has as its complement disparagement of others. Vanity and pride beget contempt and hatred. But contempt and hatred also in the field of international relations. The divine nation of whom he is mystically a part bullies and cheats, blusters and threatens in a way which many people find profoundly satisfying to their sedulously repressed lower natures. Submissive to the wife, kind to the children, courteous to the neighbours, the soul of honesty in business, the good citizen feels a thrill of delight when his country "takes a strong line," "enhances its prestige," "scores a diplomatic victory," "increases its territory" - in other words when it bluffs, bullies, swindles and steals. The nation is a strange deity. It imposes difficult duties and demands the greatest sacrifices and, because it does this and because human beings have a hunger and thirst after righteousness, it is loved. But it is also loved because it panders to the lowest elements in human nature and because men and women like to have excuses to feel pride and hatred, because they long to taste even at second hand the joys of criminality.

absolutely nothing are exciting emotions - emotions from which people "get a kick." Devotees of one national idolatry enjoy getting the kick of hatred and contempt for devotees of other idoltaries. They pay for that enjoyment by having to prepare for the wars which hatred and contempt render almost inevitable. Another point. In the normal course of events most men and women behave tolerably well. This means that they must frequently repress their anti-social impulses. They find a vicarious satisfaction for these impulses through films and stories about gangsters, pirates, swindlers, bad bold barons and the like. Now, the personified nation, as I have pointed out already, is divine in size, strength and mystical superiority, but subhuman in moral character. The ethics of international politics are precisely those of the gangster, the pirate, the swindler, the bad bold baron. The exemplary citizen can indulge in vicarious criminality, not only on the films, but

Community Health Agency:

Open again after some problems, changes

By Howard Taynen
(Former director of the Community Health Agency)

For almost two years now, the Community Health Agency at 200 Montreal St. has been operating as a part-time evening clinic providing off-the-street, "non-crisis oriented" medical care to local residents. During all this time, the purpose of the Health Agency has been to supply a unique kind of medical service.

There is no shortage of health care in Kingston or any other Canadian city. Anyone who needs to see a doctor certainly can. There are, however, problems in providing this health care to as many people as need it. The Community Health Agency represents one kind of solution. It is intended to supply medical care in a more personal way than can be done at most out-patient or emergency departments and at the same time have greater access to social agencies and the community at large than does the general practitioner. An agency like this one should, ideally, become a centre of community activity -- a place which is received as part of the community and which people feel they can come to informally. It should reach out to the community and educate the people it serves on all aspects of health care. In its mature form, it should have a full-time medical, social, administrative and clinical staff from the neighbourhood and it should be under the direct control of the people who use it. Such a clinic is now operating successfully in downtown Montreal.

These aims have been clearly stated since November, 1969 when the Community Health Agency first opened. They have not, however, been carried out -- the scope of the Health Agency has not grown, recognizably, since its inception.

Up until October of this year, the Community Health Agency was open as an evening clinic during which time acquired records on 800 patients. It was staffed by second and third year medical students, student nurses and about 50 Kingston doctors. The administration, which remained the responsibility of medical students, was passed on to inexperienced people at the end of each academic year and this administration, in the form of a large and often cumbersome executive, did the best they could to carry out an important, demanding job between classes. As a result, the Health Agency suffered from disorganized files, confused drug policy, incomplete and in fact optional patient follow-up, inconsistent student, doctor and even patient participation and above all, or over all, no continuity in its management or in dealing with patients.

In two years, no lasting social service was devised and no community participation has been accomplished. The clinic had not proved itself worthy of trust -- the most basic element of the doctor-patient relationship. It had not been of significant benefit to the community -- in fact, the people in the community were and are largely unaware of its presence. At its worst, the Community Health Agency appeared to be the toy of medical students -- something to satisfy a craving to be useful in people who do not have the knowledge, the experience, the committment or the time to do the job that was required.

At the end of this summer, it was plain that the Health Agency could continue as it had in the past but that it would not grow. Money was available for operating the clinic and patients could be induced to come by means of a few simple public relations manoeuvres. The problems of a student administration might be minimized by restricting the students involved and requiring a greater degree of committment. A part-time secretary was available who was capable of providing continutiy during clinic evenings (greeting patients, instructing doctors and students, keeping records orderly, filing test results.) All these measures, it was agreed, though, were second best. What the clinic really needed was a full-time staff.

About the time a new executive was to be assigned, it was discovered that interest among second and third year students was not high. An executive could only have been found by mild coercion and threats of closing. So rather than threatening, the agency did close in a do-or-die effort to find someone willing to make a serious attempt at making the clinic into what it was intended to be but which after two years was no closer to realization.

At a public meeting on Oct. 6 at the Health Agency, an "interim committee" of interested citizens was established for the purpose of re-opening the clinic as soon as possible and of finding a capable board of directors to take charge of the charter. The members of the committee came from a number of organizations (Hotel Dieu Hospital, Social Planning Council, North Kingston Parish) and after one meeting, they endorsed the original aims of the clinic and set Oct. 18 as a tentative re-opening date.

Ed. Note: The Health Agency actually re-opened on Nov. 1 and has been seeing five or six persons a night. A steady core of 12 to 15 doctors, with help from other doctors who come out less often, now provides the medical services the clinic needs and medical students now act only as assistants to hhe doctors, from whom they also learn a fair amount about the practical problems of dealing with patients in an office situation.

A receptionist has been hired to provide a fair amount of continuity in running the clinic and she works at the clinic for the full time it is open at night, which is 7 to 10 Monday to Thursday. A volunteer receptionist is also in the office for the same four days a week from 1 till 5 to handle referrals.

Arrrangements are now being completed with OHSIP so that all services performed by the clinic will be paid for, and Taynen feels that the clinic is now open permanently. A permanent board of directors has not been appointed yet, but the interim committee plans to do that in January.

Although there have not been a large number of medical students out yet, Taynen feels that things will improve since the amount of work required of them will be less than in the past because they have no responsibilities for running the clinic and will only be supporting the doctors, rather than trying to look after the patients themselves as they did in the past.

Interview and Book Review

On being a woman

by Dr. Gifford-Jones

By Leslie Kaye

W. Gifford-Jones," M.D., author of "On Being a Woman" (McLelland & Stewart Limited, Toronto: 1969), has very definited ideas on the problems of women, particularly from a gynecological point of view, but also from the view-point of someone who has to deal every day with the various minor and major medical and psychological aspects of being female. His book covers, in detail, such things as varied as pelvic pain, irritations of the female sex organs, the pill, therapeutic abortions, and the menopause, but Dr. Gifford-Jones, states adamantly that this book is not for self-diagnosis, but to be used in conjunction with a visit to a doctor. As far as I can tell there is no comparable book on the market, and, being a woman who has suffered from some of the problems he discusses, I found the book very enlightening, as well as easy and enjoyable to read. Fortunately I know who Dr. Gifford-Jones actually is, and managed to have a chat with him about the book and other things that are particularly relevant to everyone (not just women) today.

We briefly discussed the male sterilization operation -- the vasectomy -- which, according to the doctor, is becoming much more acceptable. About 8 such operations are done a week in the city of about 65,000 where Dr. Gifford-Jones practices, and it seems that men are gradually divesting themselves of the misconception that virility is proportionate to fertility. So far the burden of blame for conceiving an unwanted child has fallen on the woman (although the fault is only 50 per cent hers) and the burden of bearing and bringing up these children have fallen on her. Her husband may have to support her and their children, but she has to live with them 24 hours a day. If she would rather have pursued a career than a family, she will resent her situation more than ever. This discussion brought us next to female sterilization, and, later, to abortion.

Female sterilization has become much safer, particularly tubal ligations (tying the Fallopian tubes). Now the tubal ligation can be done by inserting a laparoscope through the abdomen to burn the tubes to seal them. This way there is no incision to cause problems. With the hysterectomy (subtotal and total, pp 134 to 150) the ovaries can be left in, leaving the woman with an internal source of estrogen hormone (at least until the detrimental effects of aging take over), or they can be removed. In the latter case, the doctor will prescribe an oral programme of estrogen, usually taken once a day every three weeks out of four. The estrogen regime has also been recognized as a good solution to the problem of the decreased estrogen supply usually experienced in old age. Many doctors are now treating women with natural estrogens (which have none of the negative side effects of the synthetic estrogens in the Pill) to counteract the negative effects of menopause. This approach has grown out of the realization that estrogen deficiency is a disease similar to other diseases of old age in that it is merely a function of age and should be treated as such. The menopause need not be a difficult or traumatic period in a woman's life.

The discussion then moved on to abortions, Dr. Gifford-Jones stated that 'It is the right of every woman to decide if she wants her baby or not." He said that the abortion clinic of the hospital in his city is probably unique in all of Canada. "Women have taken a bit of a beating when it comes to child birth, job opportunities, and the like . . . They should not have to wander like gypsies to find out where they can get an abortion. The problems in not having them done involve not seeing a doctor in time, and not enough doctors are doing them . . . Women with money can fly to New York. Women without money have to have them done in Canada, or not at all."

He described the hospital committees that one must see to get permission for an abortion as a vehicle for appeasing society's "pseudo-Christian conscience, everyone feels better." but the committee is basically a "ritualistic farce" as well as a waste of precious time. (The doctor predicts they will be done away with.) A woman may not be sure she is truly pregnant until the seventh or eighth week. This gives her perhaps four weeks in which to obtain an abortion. Most doctors refuse to abort after 12 weeks; Dr. Gifford-Jones will do abortions up to 15 weeks after conception. With waiting lists of up to six weeks at many hospitals, most girls are out of luck when it comes to a therapeutic abortion. The doctor described obtaining an abortion as "Russian roulette, with most women losing."

"Basically, the medical profession has not responded quickly enough to changes in the laws . . . Some doctors adopt a punitive attitude. By refusing to do an abortion they punish the mother, and the child. It's hard enough to be born into this world if you are loved. Every child should be loved and wanted." According to the Globe and Mail, Aug. 18, 1971, the number of child beatings in the city of New York "went up 549 per cent between 1966 and 1970 and rose again in the first six months of this year." These children are obviously not wanted. "Abortion is not a good thing, but a necessary thing, until we find something new to do about it. We need practical insight into this issue."

We then went into Women's Lib., which the doctor called "a good thing," but he is afraid that "it will get carried away with itself. As women become liberated, they become more like men, and to every action there is an equal and opposite reaction -- men become more like women. Liberate women, and men too, from the drudgeries of life, but stay different." I certainly agree with the latter part of this statement, but I am not sure that liberated women do become, or even want to become, more 'masculine,' or that they make men, who would otherwise be 'masculine', more 'feminine'. Men have not made a particuarly good showing in the history of the human race, and I think very few intelligent women want to follow the male example. We would rather see a society of equivalency (not equality -- after all, we are different) with all the irrelevant sex-typing removed. Aside from one's lover or husband, being a woman is meaningless in any context in relation to any other human being, except, perhaps, a gynecologist. Enough said.

The Pill, of course, was next. Dr. Gifford-Jones called it a "hot issue for specifically religious reasons." There has been a tremendous amount of research done, and the pill is a safe drug. Doctors emphasize the liabilities rather than the assets, producing unnecessary fear. "Unfortunately, even if your doctor believes in the pill, the mass media have scare-mongers among them, and your neighbour is sure to let you know of all the supposed bad effects. The doctor puts down the local scare-mongers in his section "Some women talk too much," (pp. 2 to 4) In the face of overpopulation the pill is a godsend, and, under the supervision of a doctor, the best thing that could have happened to release women from the heartbreak of unwanted children.

Dr. Gifford-Jones cannot see a quick answer to the overpopulation problem. "Perhaps a major disaster, an epidemic, famine, or even atomic warfare. There will be a solution -- but it may be a desperate one. We must legislate survival -- create a 'dictatorial democracy'" for the good of everyone. The doctor suggested a change in priorities: pull money out of cancer research and put it into contraception research. "I don't mean to imply that cancer research is not as important as contraception research, but can we afford to do both?" He doesn't regret the money spent in space research, although he feels the Vietnan war is a tremendous waste. "There are many scientific techniques being perfected in space research that we may be able to apply to the earth to solve some of its problems."

"There is no greater problem than overpopulation. 200,000 babies are born a day, 72,000,000 a year. That's a lot of people." The doctor noted that while man can see that only so many animals can survive in a given woods or lake, man refuses to apply this natural law to himself. "Perhaps he feels the laws of nature don't apply because he has a soul or god, or a brain. But there is a limit to what man can do . . . Science cannot provide new land where there is none. And throughout history science has proved overpopulation leads to disaster. Time is running out."

Among blacks there is a "theory of genocide -- a sinister plot of white people to eradicate them (the blacks)." It seems that white scientists walked into this accusation when they arranged to have their first experiments with birth control pills done on Puerto Ricans and African blacks. These ideas make the disemination of contraceptives all the more difficult

The final topic was sex. "There is no new sexual revolution in the true sense of the word. Students at university are living together, but they were sleeping together before anyway." Dr. Gifford-Jones agreed that the openness now surrounding non-marital unions is more healthy, but he pointed out that excessive advertising and emphasis on sex may be producing "a compulsive sexual society. We're afraid we're not doing it right, or often enough." He stated that he wouldn't mind his daughter establishing a pre-marital relationship with someone responsible, who would not sleep around and bring home venereal disease. Trial marriages are a very reasonable idea, and might cut down today's divorce rates."

Dr. Gifford-Jones hopes his book will give people "a balanced view of gynecology and women's problems." The book is being published in Canada, the U.S., France, Holland and England, and the English publishers have the rights to publish it in 18 other countries, mostly English-speaking members of the former British Empire. The book has also been chosen at the Book-of-the-Month Club's dividend selection and the Good Housekeeping Book Club's alternative selection for September. It is an excellent book for every woman to have. Illustrations by George Feyer.

Canadian National Coaches Association

"On the Hot Seat"

Over the past few years, there has been a growing concern amongst Canadians about the performances of Canadian athletes in International competition, specifically the Olympic Games. One of the results of this concern has been the formation of the Canadian National Coaches Association.

Mr. Douglas Fisher, one of the founding directors of the association, and a most prominent and active member, will be at Queen's this Thursday for a hot-seat seminar, along the lines of "Under Attack". The event is scheduled for Stirling Hall, theatre D, at 7.00 p.m.

Fisher will open the discussion with a brief presentation of the aims and policies of the association, and an examination of current problems faced by coaches and athletes in Canada.

Following this, a panel composed of Mr. Neil Guppy, past president of P.H.E.S.A., Al Lenard, the current Director of Intercollegiate Athletics at Queen's, and Miss Dale Ketchison, a member of the Women's Intercollegiate Ski Team, will open a question and discussion period with Fisher. The audience will also have an opportunity to grill Mr. Fisher during the rest of the evening.

This seminar-cum-confrontation SHOULD provide Queen's students with a unique opportunity to see what the Association is attempting to do, and how it hope to raise the level of comeetitor representing Caneda in International meets.

Mr. Fisher is also one of the most outspoken advocates of change in the existing athletic structure in Canada; his comments should be well worth hearing.

A reasonable level of attendance (admission is free) would be a most welcome change from the normal heights of apathy that exist here.

Participation ... or Prestige

By Chris Boon

The intercollegiate athletic program, believe it or not, was originally organized by students, to provide an opportunity for those who wished to compete at a high level of skill to do so under conditions compatible with an academic career. As long as you stayed in school, successfully, you could play.

To provide the chance of participation to a larger number of students, most team sports carried two or three teams, supported in part by admission revenues from the varsity games. At lower levels were the interfaculty and intramural programs that still exist.

My, how things do change! The concept of participation at the highest level is still there, but usually there is nothing between the first team and the intramural league.

Intercollegiate sport has become big business, complete with bureaucrats and P.R. men. Prestige, rather than participation with excellence, has become the aim. The big-name sport varies from school to school and area to area (guess what it is at Queen's) but the aim remains the same: Win, so we get better publicity.

This is why we now have an eligibility rule based on the number of years played, and a league, (any league...the weak sisters change from sport to sport, but they exist in all of them) with very uneven competition.

"We want to play with the big-name schools but we better hurry up and dilute the league so we won't get beaten too badly." Yecchhh!

FEEDBACK

letters to the editors

Elrond

Dear Editors;

Reading the article, "Elrond keeps Rising" in today's Journal, I am pleased to learn that Elrond will soon be above water. You claim, "Elrond is 222 feet above sea level and will rise to 262," Just think with only 25 feet more, it will be above Lake Ontario which is 247 feet above sea level.

Who do I see about getting accommodation on the top floor as it should be quite dry.

-Lyle Stevenson

(Ed. Note; The people at Elrond think Lake Ontario is the sea. Substitute "Lake Ontario level" for "sea level" and you have it the way it should be.)

Queen's spirit

Dear Editors,

I was very interested by Bob Bobyk's letter in Friday's Journal. I, like many others at Queen's, agree that athletics deserve our support; however, that is the extent of our agreement.

The very essence of Queen's is diversity - athletics, student government, and ARTSIE activities such as the Arts Festival all provide different means of expression. Not everyone can be an athlete, nor should they have to be to make a worthwhile contribution to life at Queen's. This very diversity is the reason that initiation has been replaced by Orientation in Arts and Science. It is neither practical or desireable to produce 1400 people who think and act alike. During this transition many changes have been tried, not all of them have been for the better. However, I still stick by the change re: tams. The fact that hundreds of freshmen felt free to wear their tams to football games for the first time in many years speaks for itself.

In short, I seriously doubt that Queen's spirit is in any danger.

Women's Lib.

Dear Editors,

I am tired of seeing Women's Liberation made synonymous with women's degradation. Women's Lib is, insofar as it strives for equality and independence of the female sex, a worthwhile and a valuable cause. Why is it, then, that many so-called advocates of this cause feel that in order to present women as equal (if not superior) human beings, they must act as animals?

The two-page article "How to Get Your Man" which appeared in the November 4 Journal, did not shock me, nor did it impress me beyond strong disappointment. In their narrow-minded approach to the motivations of men, the authors seemed to reveal either a vague frustration with the mental capabilities of women, or else a total lack of wit.

If Queen's deserves any of the merit it has as a university, there must be many girls on campus intelligent enough to present their opinions of Women's Liberation, as a movement or as a concept, in somewhat of a more reasoned manner. For God's sake, let's hear from them!

Dear Editors,

Regarding the article by Leslie Kay (What Good Does it Do?, Journal, Nov. 5, 1971): while I sympathize with her aims, I must vehemently denounce her suggested solutions to the problem of world poverty.

Encapsulating briefly her views; Miss Kaye states that Western aid to underdeveloped nations, rather than reducing the poverty problem is helping to sustain it since welfare states are prone to lay back and allow things to be done for them rather than develop the drive and initiative which could propel them out of complacency and out of poverty at a much greater pace.

As Miss Kaye puts it, if aid is cut off, Necessity, the mother of invention, will undoubtedly force these people to abandon their complacency.

Though this view is hypothetical (The example of China is a statistically poor one, since it is a single example, and since we have no way of knowing just how much more or less developed China would have been if it had continued to receive foreign aid after 1939), I will nonetheless treat her hypothesis as true and work from that vantage point.

I would first like to demonstrate by analogy that withdrawal of aid is tantamount ot murder. If an individual in a remote Canadian community served by a single doctor is in need of emergency medical aid and the doctor refuses to treat him, is that doctor, not in essence, committing murder?

Miss Kaye might argue that since these underdeveloped nations were initially without any aid at all, then we are not exactly depriving them of aid, since we are withdrawing aid which they would have to have done without anyway if Western nations had never come to their aid in the first place.

Once again returning to the analogy, the doctor could similarly refuse to treat the patient since if the medical profession had never developed at all then the patient would have been no better off and would have died anyway.

The point is that the aid is available, and to refuse it is equivalent to committing genocide on the poverty-stricken masses.

A second attitude evident in Miss Kaye's article is a complete disregard for either human life or human rights. Playing the role of God in deciding who shall live and die is something that no human has the right to and evidently Miss Kaye has taken it upon herself to do exactly that.

To suggest that because a man is either a physical or a mental wreck, his right to life is diminished is inhuman and anachronistic. Following this train of thought, it would be logically consistant to deny any aid to the mentally retarded of our nation since the economic problem they pose could be most expediently eliminated in this fashion.

In matters such as these, however, expediency should not be our prime consideration. What should be our prime consideration, if man is ever to ascend above the level of a barbarian, is the protection of individual rights, particularly in those cases where these rights are most susceptible to violation, that is, with regard to the weak.

Euthanasia societies, which advocate the mercy killing of hospital patients with terminal illnesses who suffer excrutiating pain, show a much greater degree of humanity, in that they strictly stipulate that the decision to live or die must be self-determined.

A decision to cut off aid to an underdeveloped country necessarily discriminates between the weak and the strong and allows no leeway for self-determination. If it is a society of superhumans that is desired, then why not eliminate all those people who are weak in body or mind?

Undoubtedly, we will have a world then plagued with much fewer problems, but would anyone care to live in this perfect world achieved by such means? It is my hope that few people would.

Miss Kaye has also assumed that to contribute aid to these underdeveloped countries results in the sustenance of human beings "that can never fulfill their human potentialities...". It is arrogant and egotistic of Miss Kaye to suppose that any life which is not as rewarding as the average North American's, due to mental or physical handicap, is a life that isn't worth living.

Her statement is especially aggravating when one considers that it is a stroke of ill luck that sends one individual into a poverty-stricken world and a stroke of good luck that sends another individual into our affluent society.

The fact that she would step all over human rights to attain a better world points out the faulty logic being used.

In summary, then, Miss Kaye contends that her means, though discriminatory, will produce a better end. I have argued that an end is only as valuable as the means used to procure it. How you treat the conflicting views presented all depend on your views on the ideal society.

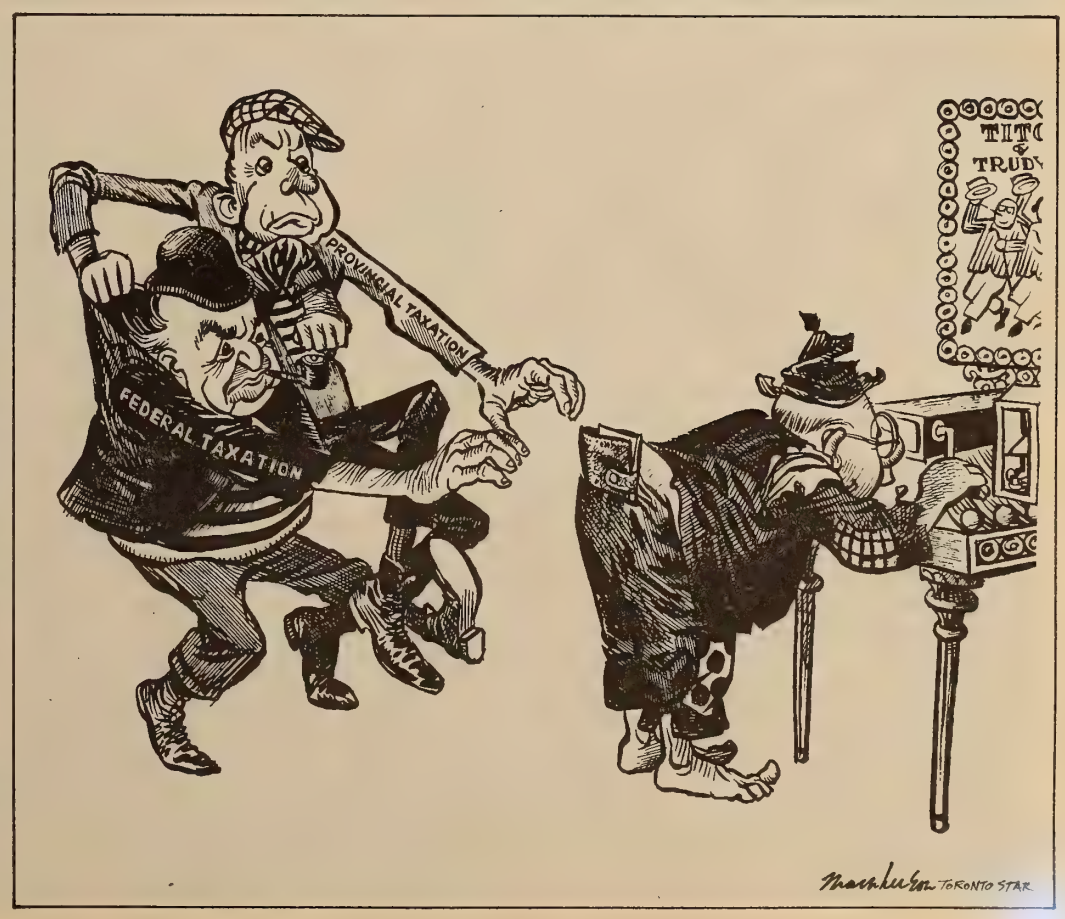
Aid problem

Dear Editors,

I refer to Leslie Kaye's article in your Nov. 5 issue on the Green Revolution.

Is this the Woodstock Generation? It's hard to determine whether the piece was intended to be serious or ironic. If it's meant to be serious I'm frightened. If it's meant to be ironic. I mourn that we should be expected to find humour in such matters.



What do you say about a suggestion that starvation is the best cure for hunger? Should it be purveyed as the final solution?

Detractors might suggest that the discrete use of a handful of atomic bombs could do the job more efficiently and humanely. But then that would be destructive of productive property, and it might cause a threat to the lives of future generations.

-T. Asplund, (Faculty of Law)

Ed. note: My article stated that the present type of foreign aid is not working. The rich get richer, and the poor starve. If you want people to go on starving to death slowly but surely, calling that humanitarian, you can continue to support the present system. I feel it would be more humane to look at the problem reasonably and let the underdeveloped countries solve their own problems. We haven't helped. Apparently we don't know how. I don't want to see people die any more than you do, but I feel that foreign aid as it is now is murder. I would rather see practiceable means towards a better world in general. Why don't you suggest something functional?

By the way, the reason why China was the only example I mentioned is because it is the only example of a country who has made it. The others have all been dependent on foreign aid.

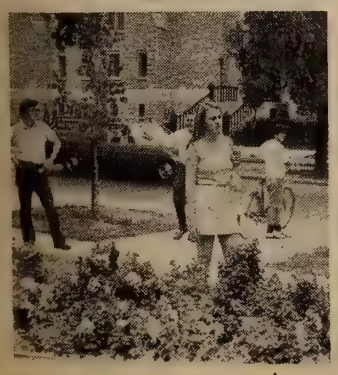
Jacket arms vary widely

It isn't always the standard Queen's University coat of arms that people are wearing on their jackets. There are at least four variations to the standard dark blue windbreaker with white coat-of-arms.

Nursing science students have varied the idea by ordering windbreakers with the coat of arms in pink, the nursing colour, and "Nursing Science" written underneath as well as the word Queen's" above.



Physical and health education girls have also ordered a different colour -- yellow -- according to PHESA treasurer Tom Hargreaves. Again, the name of the subject appears below the coat of arms.

Rehabilitation therapy has developed its own faculty crest for blazers and windbreakers, rehab president Donna Tuck said. The crest appears in red with a border in light blue (the rehab colour) and a red background.

The central feature of the crest is the staff of Aesculapius -- the "medical cross" -- with snakes entwined around it. In the background appears a hand holding a three-leaf branch grafted to another branch.

This symbolizes the regrowth aspect of rehabilitation therapy, Miss Tuck said, and was designed about three years ago.

Law Society treasurer Paul Abell said law students wear the law school crest with its motto, "Soit, fait, droit," rather than the Queen's arms. This crest includes the diagonal cross from the standard coat of arms, with a sword over it and scales underneath.

Hockey Gaels Down St. Lawrence 4-2 Open League Here Friday Against RPI

The hockey Gaels completed their exhibition schedule Tuesday night scoring a hard-earned 4-2 triumph over a determined St. Lawrence College. For the Gaels, the victory was their third in exhibition play against two losses and was a final tune-up for this weekend's opening games in the OUAA against Ryerson and Waterloo.

The two teams played a scoreless first period although the Gaels clearly had the better scoring chances. Only Paul Lindsay's great goaltending combined with erratic shooting by the Gaels prevented the Tricolour from taking a lead. Lindsay was especially outstanding in stopping point-blank shots by Norm Goulet, Bill White and Murray Douglas.

The first period also set the pattern for the rest of the game. The St. Lawrence club came out hitting (something that the Gaels haven't seen much of thus far) and the aggressive trend continued into the second period. The Gaels kept skating long enough to take the lead, and then never looked back.
the lead, and then never looked back.

Queen's opened the scoring when Colin Loudon slammed in a loose puck following a scramble in front of the St. Lawrence net. However, this power-play goal gave the Gaels a short-lived lead as Dave Reilly promptly picked up a loose puck at the Queen's blueline, then deked both defensemen and goalie Bill Minnes to even the score at 1-1.

The Gales, however, continued to press, and Stan Galt's backhander put the Gaels ahead 2-1. Galt's goal came as a result of some fine forechecking by Morris Mott. But St. Lawrence refused to play dead for the Gaels and Reilly scored his second goal of the game to even the count at 2-2.

At this point, the St. Lawrence team appeared to tire and Colin Loudon's second goal put Queen's ahead 3-2. The final Gaels' goal was a thing of beauty as Morris Mott and John Smith combined on a two on one break with Mott's backhander finishing the play to put the Gaels up 4-2.

St. Lawrence continued their rough, aggressive tactics but were unable to catch the Gales although they had their chances when Queen's was shorthanded. But the Gaels' penalty-killing team was outstanding in stopping the Blues' powerplay. Defensemen Graham Closs and Steve Gross were sensational and combined with forwards Dave Melloy and Bob Kindon to thwart the St. Lawrence powerplay.

Finally, this Queen's club is damn good. They have fine goaltending, an explosive offense and a defense which has improved with every game. The acid test comes this Friday night at 8 p.m. at the Harty Arena when the Gaels open their regular OUAA season against Ryerson. The Queen's club is also at home on Saturday at 2 p.m. for a clash with the tough Waterloo Warriors. This Queen's team has the ingredients to become a champion. They are worthy of your support -- so be there Friday and Saturday. You Won't Regret It!!!

W.I.C. News

The W.I.C. extends its programme this week to include 10 pin bowling. Bowling will take place from Sun. Nov. 14 to Sun Dec. 5 between 7 and 9 p.m. at Cloverleaf Lanes. Free bus transportation will be provided each Sun. at 6:45 p.m., leaving from the gymnasium.

Anyone interested in competing should sign up in the Women's Locker Room, or call Laura Ramsay at 544-9273 for further information. A good turnout will make better competition for everyone.

W.I.C. Ringette, like many of its other sports, is running into difficulties with participation. Teams were set out at the beginning of the programme but there is not sufficient response to play organized games as planned.

As the people who did come out were very interested in playing, Ringette will continue but will be organized differently. All persons who wish to play are requested to come to the Arena at 8 p.m. on Wed. nights, and the people there on any given night will be split into teams for play. All a participant needs to supply is a pair of skates.

B-Ball Gaels Win Opener: Meet Loyola on Saturday

The basketball Gaels opened their 1971 season with a 75-60 victory over a small but scrappy St. Lawrence College squad in a game played Wednesday night. Co-captains Andy Daugulis and Paul Howard led the Gaels with 21 and 14 points respectively, while soph forward Dave Wright contributed 10, mostly on spectacular off-balance shots that should please the crowds if not the coaches.

Howard, Daugulis, Rob Smart and rookie Ian Rawes held a distinct edge on the boards, especially in the first half, although it must be admitted that St. Lawrence had little height to go against them.

The Gaels took the lead with 16:57 left in the first half, and never looked back, leading by as much as 26 points on several occasions. Only some unconscious long-range gunning by St. Lawrence kept the score close in the second half, as the Gaels began to show the effects of inexperience with numerous turnovers.

On several occasions, things came close to a brawl, with some of the St. Lawrence players displaying large chips on their shoulders, especially under the backboards.

Fortunately, nothing came of it.

The Gales had problems, naturally enough, and showed an unfortunate tendency to throw the ball away. On the other hand, Frank Tindall and his newly-acquired assistant Bob Wright were taking a good look at all twelve bodies that dressed for the game, and at times had five newcomers on the floor at the same time.

Starting guards Peter Gordon and Dave Smith do not possess a great backlog of game experience, but handled themselves well against the Blues' full court press in the early going.

The play of Ian Rawes was another pleasing point. The 6' 3" frosh is a very strong fundamental ballplayer, with a soft jump shot that is a pleasure to watch.

Given some time and the attention of Wright, who has turned into a top-grade assistant coach, Rawes could be the best forward on the team. Another rookie to watch is guard Stu Bridgeman. Bridgeman is tremendously quick, and a first-rate defensive ballplayer.

Unfortunately, his shooting is not exceptiona, and he showed a tendency to carry the ball when dribbling in a crowd. Both these problems can be cured with work, so look for improvement here.

The Gaels travel to Montreal Saturday for a meeting with traditionlly-powerful Loyola. If the Gaels can show well in that game, look for good things in the upcoming league play.

Commission studying research includes principal

A former Queen's principal is one of two commissioners studying university research across Canada. And the current principal, Dr. John J. Deutsch, is a member of the advisory committee for the study, which is sponsored by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

Dr. J. A. Corry, who was principal from 1961 to 1968, is one of two administrators (the other is Dr. Louis-Philippe Bonneau of Laval) who is heading the study, which is "to examine certain aspects of university research in Canada and to propose means for the rationalisation of university research efforts."

The commission will be holding hearings at Queen's in early December.

Criticism of university scientific research is coming from the government and from the public, a statement by the commission says. Canada has "an inability to define, co-ordinate and adapt a policy of scientific research which reflects the dynamic demands of society," it adds.

The commission is to study how Canadian universities plan their research activities, to advance knowledge, develop the country, and avoid duplicating one another's efforts.

"A detailed and Canada-wide review of the coordination of university research activities has never been undertaken to the extent that the commission will now attempt," the statement says.

It goes on to declare that the universities themselves, through the AUCC, has the responsibility to explain the "return to the public for the financial support for these endeavours" (research).

Besides its own research in a number of universities, the commission has invited "people everywhere in Canada" to comment on the subjects it is considering. Written briefs are welcome until February 1 next year, the statement says, and briefs will be accepted when hearings are held at universities across Canada.

Losers weepers, but thefts down

Petty theft on the campus seems to be on the decline this year. "It's pretty early in the year to tell, thus," said R. I. Luker, director of security for the department of physical plant.

Students using the phys ed centre often don't bother to lock up their belongings; and purses left on desks in Douglas Library have been known to disappear. But the general decline shows that more students are being careful with their possessions, Luker said.

What is important is "taking such precautions as locking up your possessions and challenging a loiterer," Luier stated.

Queen's has no security force -- it is almost the only Ontario university to rely entirely on AMS constables for protection. And there is no central lost and found. Found articles are frequently turned in at the phys ed centre, to departmental offices, or to the AMS office (at the foot of the main stairs in the basement of the Students' Union).

And because there are so many places for losers to look, found articles aren't getting picked up.

The AMS recently donated to charity several pairs of eyeglasses which have been on hand, unclaimed, for years. And the phys ed centre office boasts a full drawer of unclaimed watches, rings and other articles.

What d'ya wanna see?

Just three people responded when the cine guild asked, in The Journal two weeks ago, what movies students would like to see on campus.

The position of the coupon, at the bottom of a left-hand page, may be the reason few students responded, cine guild president Bill Kirby said Wednesday.

Comments are still welcome in the AMS office.

A Frenchman's view of October, 1970

Dear Editors:

The situation can actually be conceived in quite simple terms: you cannot expect a province with a different language, a different culture, a different value system to simply, calmly blend into the mosaic of nine other virtually identical provinces. This being said, the average English Canadian does indeed expect Quebec to function in the same manner as its English counterparts.

I once believed that this was a remote possibility, but having read numerous English articles on the October crisis, I am convinced of the contrary.

Les opinions d'un canadien face a la societe canadienne anglaise: A Frenchman's view of October, 1970:

Whether you are social convenor for the Chenier Cell or whether you think that Rene Levesque is still a Liberal, seeing soldiers and sub-machine guns in the streets of your city guarding your public buildings and your Parlement gives you an eerie feeling. Suddenly, this beautiful autumn day (known, I suppose, to Queen's as "a great day for football") seems to be isolated in time. The eerie feeling is amplified when you read the English dailies (because, of course, you are "bilingue" . . . "why should I learn to speak French, most Frenchmen speak English anyhow".) So you read: The Quiet Revolution is no longer quiet . . ." "Persons apprehended may be held in a jail or in a concentration camp similar to World War II operations . . . " - if you are the light-hearted type, you figure at least you won't be seeing tourists for a while ("Harry, ask him to move so I can take a picture of his paintings . . . ") and if you're the cynical type, you see that, with typical Anglo-Saxon efficiency, the whole situation has been reduced to a science and consequently, the entire point of it all is missed - (again). And if one day you are hitchhiking to Montreal to file past Laporte's coffin and the next you are back in Quebec City attending incognito rallies, thinking (because it is no longer legal to shout it) "Nous vaincrons," it is simply because you're not blessed-cursed with that Anglo-Saxon singlemindedness. Meanwhile, the English Canadian intelligentsia are screaming maniacly about suspension of civil rights and totally ignoring the fact that a man was murdered because to recognize this would be to dim all possible justification for screaming maniacly. And everywhere you hear the terms "nationaliste" and "Felquiste" being used interchangeably.

The crux of the matter lies in the fact that these Anglo-Saxons cannot grasp that "Nous vaincrons" is not spoken in the same spirit as "Come, my friends, 'tis not too late to seek a newer world" and that maybe 300 of the 3,000 students who rallied spontaneously in support of the FLQ were aware of the statistics on such weird and wonderful things as "the economic neocolonialism of Quebec" (see The Journal Oct. 15, 1971). The main concern was, is and always will be (as long as the struggle continues) whether the Quebec "personality" can possibly survive in this country, in this continent of Anglo-Saxon society.

Furthermore, do not for one instant believe that valiantly parading in front of the Ottawa parliament buildings with sympathetic placards was at all appreciated. Terrorists are terrorists, mes amis, they are not your average intellectualizing, vote-seeking politicians calling for a federal "two-nation policy" or some other absurdity. The shallowness of condoning murder simply because it's avant-garde to endorse Leftist views was very easily recognized. For all these years, Quebec was that province where Montreal is, that place that has rowdy political campaigns that are fun to follow (because of the mud-slinging) and also very "enriching" (because "the outcome of these elections could well mean the determination of the future of Canada, folks.") If you had really understood, there would have been no need for desperate measures like admittedly amateurish terrorism (there would also have been an odd number of provinces.)

There exists a song that says "Viens, un nouveau jour va se lever . . ." but English Canada will not see the dawn of this new day. Vous avez perdu votre chance il y a longtemps, durant le temps que vous desirez les statistiques sur "the economic neocolonialism of Quebec."

Nous vaincrons . . . peut etre bien meme cette logique etouffante.

- Brenda

The Chief Librarian replies

Dear Editors, and Your Buddies:

Sure, blame the computer, blame the library. Depends on who you listen to. One student (unknown to me, and no arms twisted) said enthusiastically that the new system was a vast improvement. It was far easier to locate material and find out where books were, if they were not on the stack shelves.

The old howls about periodicals are the same story: you can't please all of the people all of the time. For every one who demands that all periodicals STAY in the library there is someone who demands that bound volumes be allowed to circulate. There is just NO money for duplication of files. I have urged the Senate Library Committee to study the whole policy of lending regulations. ALL periodicals are lent to ALL users for ONE week only -- that has been in effect for over two years.

The real problem about which Rocky and Spike complain is "holds" -- requests that a book which is out be held for someone else when it returns. The computerized system does NOT handle holds. It only lists the books requested for "hold". The actual search for the book, when it returns, is done by staff as it always has been. Rather than keep newly returned books away from potential users, and be accused of hoarding and slowness and all that, returned books are handled on open sorting shelves. It is entirely possible that some eager user can grab a newly returned book before the staff have time to search the "hold" list. Which way would you like it?

The computerized circulation system has had very few bugs, but bugs there have been. These are being killed quickly. If anyone has a specific gripe about a specific item, let him please take it to the Circulation desk and they will straighten it out.

The key words in Rocky and Spike's complaint may be "unprincipled" and "illegally". Any place as rambling and full of books as Douglas Library is vulnerable to ripoffs despite any controls short of frisking everyone. How a book can be taken out illegally? If the student presents an ID card and checks out a book with it, shall we presume it's legal, or slow down the process and require additional identification?

Nice to know that Rocky uses the Gothic Fantasy collection. If he is writing his Piled High and Deep thesis on the Hardy Boys, he can even ask for the computer to get an injection of the charity and mercy he suggests. It can be told about the special need for a particular book, and will date the book as due next month or next June if need be.

The computer has still not been able to tell me who ripped off the 1965 Fraser's Canadian Textile Directory I wanted a couple of weeks ago. The first time I tried it the computer wouldn't take my card at all. But it could be worse. One other university library I have visited, which has a computerized system -- not as good as ours -- is said to have "a million books -- all of them missing."

Chief Librarian.

A Modest Proposal

Being simple but honest chaps who strive constantly to redress our shortcomings through the two gifts which Dame Fortune in all her goodness has, it seems, been kind enough to bestow upon us -- to wit, keen observance and perhaps no mean powers of insight -- it then might not seem too surprising that walking around the Queen's University campus as is our frequent wont (such is the awe with which we esteem the students of that institution) we have tended to notice several pronounced proclivities, the which if pressed to their logical and felicitous conclusion should indubiltably be a source of cherished security and aesthetic joy to all and sundry. In which partial connexion with, we are led to lay before you a (we hope) somewhat modest proposal, which we sincerely hope that all Queen's students (nay, all students across Canada who generally exhibit similar tendencies) might find highly appealing.

But to come directly to the point, our proposal concerns the possibility of a Queen's University student uniform. It has not escaped our notice that Queen's students already have a decided penchant for the wearing of red, yellow or blue windbreakers which we understand identify them to their fellow students as to the faculty to which they respectively belong. The practice is quite understandable. We ourselves recall the sense of security and belonging -- the feeling that we really mattered and meant something -- which was achieved through donning a high-school "identification" jacket. And nobody could have anything but the fondest memories of the old "Linus" security blanket of childhood.

Now the Queen's jacket is important to Queen's students, not only as a symbol that they belong and have a place, so to speak, nor only as a badge of status to wow the ordinary clientele of the local bars, not to mention the chicks - but also as the main indication on the whole that these people have had the benefit of a higher education.

Then, too, no child ever wants to be significantly different from all the others.

However, there is one serious difficulty with the present system -- a peculiarly departmental identification by faculty and indeed by year that can only diminish the quantity of enthusiasm left over for the university as a whole.

The University must reflect society, and as our society and culture have in recent decades exhibited increasingly clear tendencies towards organizational efficiency and centralization, so should the university reflect this trend, not only for its inherent values but also for the benefits it is capable of bestowing. The presently variegated nature of the mass costume at Queen's is both uneconomic and destructive of all concepts of efficiency and effectiveness.

Other large organizations, faced with selfish revolts from departments that somehow thought they had a God-given right to independence, have used the concept of uniformity to impress upon all segments the need for cooperation and unity of purpose. IBM has the IBM tie. The Armed Forces has the new green uniform. So should Queen's have a truly uniform uniform.

No longer would the graduate look back on his years as an engineer, artsman or medsman. All hearts would throb instead of the memories of being a true Queensmen. And so the phalanx of new alumni would advance into the world as the vanguard, preparing the conquered ground for the reinforcement troops coming behind.

And what form would this new uniform take? To compensate for the agonizing feelings of the insecurity and self-doubt that would overcome the formerly-jubilant spirits of the engineer, artsman or medsman who would be robbed of his departmental identification cum all-day sucker, we would tentatively suggest a more blanket approach -- the all-new Queen's multi-purpose poncho (MPP). Plastic on the outside to ward off the rain, woollen on the inside to warm up the belly, and a large marsupila pouch to hold books, bottles and pillows. Held together with cross-shoulder straps and decorated with vibrantly tasteful Day-Glo letters on the back spelling out the magic ringing words "Rah! Rah!" An emergency church key would be sewn into the lining, which would be embroidered with the latest campus cheers so that the new recruit would be more readily drawn into the fold.

Galileo

By Walter G. Spunde

If Galileo's stage was the world, then the world for Galileo at the Toronto St. Lawrence Centre was a huge circular platform sloping into the audience, a spinning world in itself, rather than a stage. Upon this crystal sphere projection the large cast revolved about its central figure - even the Church was symbolically set to circle around Galileo. No other in-door production that I have ever seen, has been able to depart so successfully from the TV-picture stage. "Galileo" is a refreshing visual and dramatic experience.

Not only is it an outstanding production of an outstanding dramatic work, but it is a play that deals with one of the most serious of contemporary problems, that of the responsibility of the scientist, to science, and to society. What personal freedom remains to a scientist? Since Hiroshima, (at which time Brecht and Laughton were working on the English version of the play), this question has only continued to grow in importance as science, now threatens humanity not only through war but through industry as well. At that time, (1947), Brecht rewrote the final scene, changing Galileo from an astute thinker who had out-foxed the Church, to a scientist who had permitted Authority to use him for its purposes. In so doing, Brecht created an enigma, who, like Hamlet, is probably immortal.

Kurt Eris's direction suggested, I think yet a different interpretation for Galileo's recantation. Perhaps through the words of one of the cardinals, that man was not given to know the truth but only to search for it, Galileo, one of the earliest relatavistic thinkers, must surely have noted that the Church, no less than science, had begun with a search for truth, and that "science for science sake" was potentially as dangerous a faith as that of the cardinals. Thus confused, he had to compromise, and then carry the thing through to the end by producing copies of his Discorsi for both sides.

Whatever Galileo was to others, Brecht certainly saw him, like Shaw's Saint Joan, perfectly honest to himself. Tony Palmer, as Galileo, was able to infect the audience with the vitality of a man who lived passionately with both mind and body. Among the dozens of competently played peripheral roles, that of The Little Monk, by Hugh Webster ("Fortune and Men's Eyes", "Rip Off") was absolutely the most delightful. I would fault the production on one point only. This: that Papal astronomer Clavius should not have thrown out his words, "He is right," for laughs. Laughter on words so significant is out of place. But a detailed critical review here is also out of place.

"Galileo" is a play well worth travelling to see. (It has weekend performances again on the 27th of this month, and the 11th of next month.)

Sha Na Na and The Stampeders

SHA NA NA holds the all time record for encores at the Fillmore West (5). SHA NA NA garnered 5 encores at theUniversity of Western Ontario. SHA NA NA performed 3 encores at York University. SHA NA NA puts on great shows.

If you want to see a group that will try their hardest to entertain you, then come and see SHA NA NA. Their excellent vocals and driving instruments bring back the rock 'n roll songs of the 50's and early 60's. Their satire is serious with a polished act that has made audiences stand on their chairs.

SHA NA NA has not had a hit single. An act does not need a hit single to be entertaining. SHA NA NA's albums have concentrated on faithfully reproducing the sounds of rock 'n roll. This music does not sell singles today but it does provide good listening.

If you miss Sha Na Na, you will regret it. They are the most exciting act in North America today.

The Stampeders are a Canadian group. People in Canada put down Canadian groups because they're Canadian (they can't be any good?)

William Morris Agencies in New York have signed the Stampeders to a major U.S. town right after they leave Queen's. Their hit single "Sweet Single Woman" is currently number one in Florida. Don't put them down just because they're Canadian. The Stampeders put on a good show.

Come and see Sha Na Na and the Stampeders on Sunday, November 14 at 3 and 7 p.m. in the Jock Harty arena. Tickets at $2.50 and $3.00. Some reserved seats will be on sale at the door.

'And the tie is from Ottawa.'

VANCOUVER - Premier W. A. C. Bennett called on Saturday night for a free-trade common market arrangement between Canada and the United States.

The B.C. Premier also said it is time Canada decides who its friends are. He said the United States has no desire to dominate Canada politically or economically.

It was stupid for the Prime Minister to go behind the Iron Curtain last spring to make remarks critical of the United States, which "has been Canada's greatest friend and ally," he said. He did not mention Pierre Trudeau by name.

Speaking to the closing banquet of the annual convention of the B.C. Social Credit League, Mr. Bennett blamed leftists for spreading a campaign of hate in Canada against the United States.

He said the establishment of a free-trade area between Canada and the United States would give Canadians in all regions a prosperity they have never dreamed of.

He proposed a three point program to establish a free-trade area.

The first would be a return to the position that existed before the imposition of the U.S. surcharge in August on some Canadian products.

This would be followed by a mutual agreement not to impose any further tariffs against the products of the other, then agreement to reduce present tariffs 10 per cent yearly to provide for a period of adjustment so that within 10 years a free trade area would come into existence.

Mr. Bennett strongly defended the United States against criticism by a group of "small Canadians" who he said are building up a campaign of hate. These leftists are now the "real enemy within our country."

"The leftists say we have much to fear from the United States, that the United States is seeking to dominate us and that we will lose our political freedom.

"That is not true. Canada will never join the United States politically; the United States does not want us to join them politically. They want a strong Canada. What we want and what we need is closer cooperation in trade and commerce.

CANADA

OTTAWA The United Nations is trying to work out a formula for licencing the dumping of wastes and garbage in the oceans.

A convention, in draft form, is being discussed by delegates from United Nations members meeting in Ottawa this week.

The draft convention would make it illegal to transport waste from any of the countries that sign it for dumping in the ocean, except where the dumping is licenced.

Permits would be issued by nations signing the convention. No dumping would be allowed if it endangered "human health, welfare or amenities, the marine environment, living and other maritime resources, ecological systems or existing or future use of the oceans."

If the convention is accepted, it would provide a means for checking how much is dumped and what is dumped.

OTTAWA - Justice Minister John Turner said Monday that federal legal officers will investigate whether the refusal of the Toronto Daily Star to hire columnist Ron Haggart constitutes a violation of the Bill of Rights.

He gave the assurance in the Commons to former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker, who guided the legislation through Parliament in 1960.

Mr. Diefenbaker defended the right of newsmen to hold partisan political opinions, including separatist views. He drew a line, however, at open advocacy of violence in the overthrow of the Government.

Mr. Haggart wrote a column for The Toronto Telegram, which ceased publication on Oct. 30. He had been hired by the Star to write a column on provincial politics, but the paper's managing editor refused to carry out the agreement when he learned that Mr. Haggart had written an article for a New Democratic Party publication.

Outside the House, Mr. Diefenbaker said the Star's apparent monopoly over afternoon newspaper readership in Toronto seemed to be leading to a situation where the men who control the newspaper seem to be able to dictate the political beliefs of their writers.

He drew a distinction between a employer's prerogative to hire and fire employees and the right to free political opinion.

MONTREAL - An attempt to blame Montreal police for the death of Michele Gauthier during the riot here on Oct. 29 was rejected Tuesday by coroner Laurent Lapointe.

Serge Menard, lawyer for the dead woman's husband, tried repeatedly to question witnesses at the inquest to bring out the actions of police during a demonstration that ended in the riot.

But the corner told the lawyer that earlier testimony had established that Mrs. Gauthier had died of natural causes, and that he could not permit a line of questioning establishing how police had handled the demonstration in general.

"If there was a single mark from a riot stick on her body it would be different," Dr. Lapointe said.

Mr. Menard argued that the woman's death was ultimately caused by organized panic deliberately induced as a method of breaking up the Oct. 29 demonstration. The panic in which Mrs. Gauthier was caught brought on an attack of asthma and eventually her death, Mr. Menard argued.

LABRADOR CITY, Nfld. - Thomas Burgess, leader of the New Labrador Party, announced Thursday that he will support Newfoundland's Progressive Conservatives to put an end to the 22-year-reign of Liberal Premier Joseph Smallwood.

He will fly to St. John's for a press conference with Conservative Leader Frank Moores. In the Oct. 28 provincial election, the Conservatives won 21 seats and the Liberals 20. Mr. Burgess won for the New Labrador Party in the riding of Labrador West and for the past two weeks he has been courted fervently by both mainline parties.

He met Mr. Moores at the Chateau Champlain in Montreal on Monday and they reached an agreement. For supporting the Conservatives, Mr. Burgess expects to get improved medical service in Labrador, redistribution to four from three seats, a prorated exemption from Newfoundland's motor gasoline tax, school buses for children and possibly a cabinet portfolio

He talked confidently Tuesday of becoming the next minister of mines, agriculture and resources. And he said Newfoundland will probably have another election in six or seven months, after which the Conservatives will have a comfortable majority.

THE WORLD

WASHINGTON - A comprehensive study of the air war in Indochina by a Cornell University group concludes that while drastically curtailing combat by Americans on the ground, he Nixon Administration is maintaining a high level of bombing and has, in fact escalated the air war in Cambodia and Laos.

The study acknowledges that the Administration has cut by roughly half the over-all intensity of the air war in Indo-China during the peak years of 1968 and 1969, when the United States was waging the most intensive bombing campaign in history. But the study says the average tonnage of bombs and other explosives being dropped is still running at about the same level as in 1967, about 70,000 tons a month.

AMCHITKA ISLAND - In their elation over the apparent success of the controversial Cannikin hydrogen bomb test, senior officials of the Atomic Energy Commission have almost committed themselves to abandoning their nuclear-weapons testing ground on Amchitka.

Amchitka was selected in late 1966 as a place to test underground explosives bombs that are too large to be detonated safely in the desert between Reno, Las Vegas and Salt Lake City, where testing will continue. But the island had been used before 1966 for smaller-sized tests.

"It seems to me we will have no reason to require a second test," said Maj.-Gen. Edward Giller, the commission's assistant general manager for military application. He said the commission would now begin to remove the camps it built here to provide support for the men who mounted the Cannikin test.

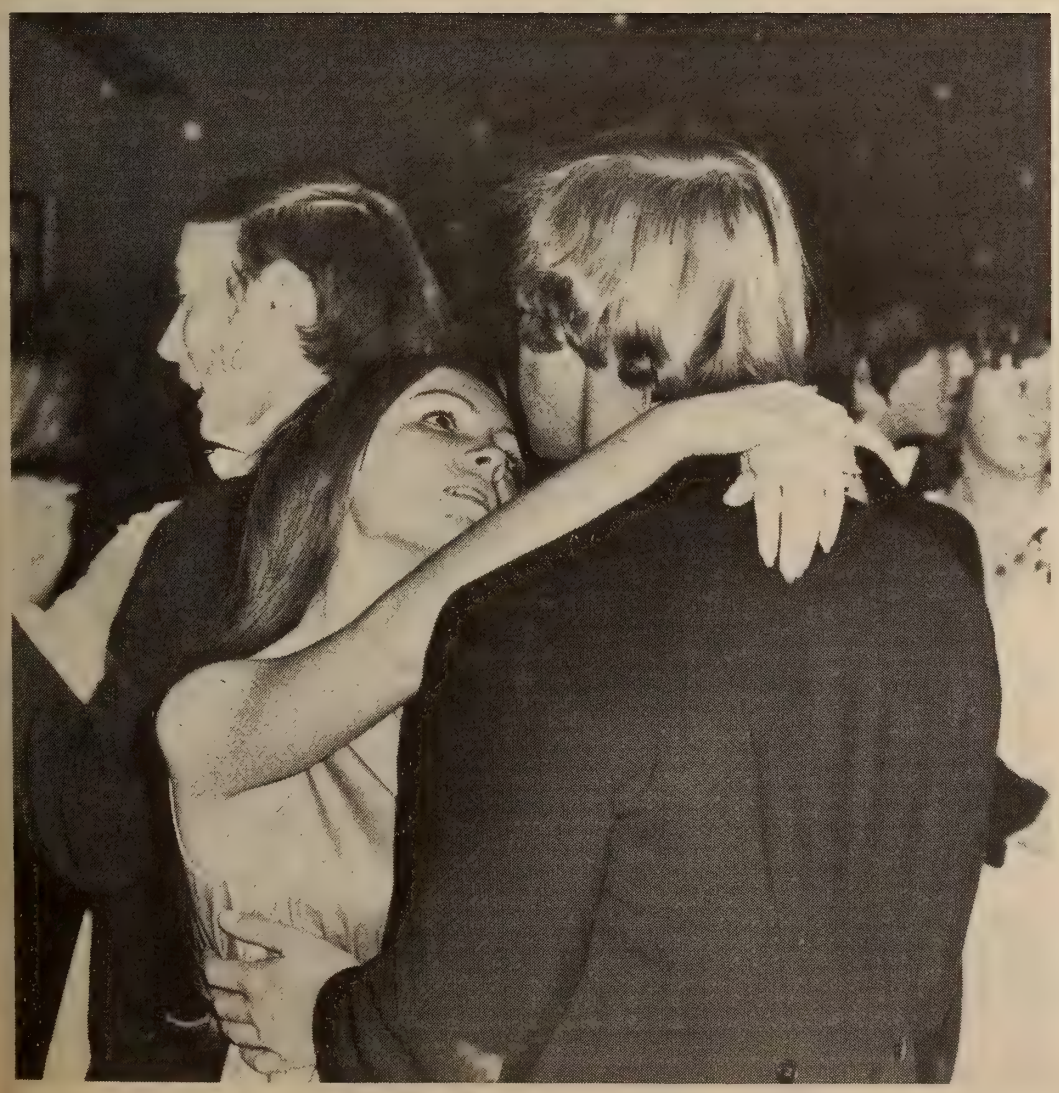
PEKING - The Chinese version of the Little Red Book of quotations from Chairman Mao Tse-tung, whose editions ran officially to 740 million copies, has become virtually unobtainable in Peking during the past week.

Its disappearance from Chinese bookshops and shop windows is sure to raise new speculation abroad about the position of Vice-Chairman Lin Piao, heir apparent to Chairman Mao, who compiled the book and wrote the preface.

WASHINGTON - Norwegian explorer Thor Heyerdahl said Monday that parts of the ocean are as dirty and polluted as city sewers, befouled by man's refuse of cans, plastic containers, bottles and oil.

Testifying before the Senate Ocean Pollution Committee, Dr. Heyerdahl said pollution is no longer a national problem and that international action, through the United Nations, is required.

"What others dump in the sea will come to your shores and what you dump at home will travel aboard, irrespective of national legislation," he told the committee.



PEKING - China called on India and Pakistan yesterday to find a peaceful solution to their dispute over East Pakistan, but warned in the strongest terms it has used to date that it will resolutely support Pakistan in the event that war should break out.

Final answer tomorrow in coed residence vote

The final decision on coed residences will rest on tomorrow's vote in the central campus residences.

The referendum, which is not binding, asks whether the 1004 men on Leonard Field and the 1125 women in the women's residences favour a proposal to make one building, Gordon-Brockington Houses, a coed residence.

Balancing the increase in spaces for women which that change would produce, men would take over Chown Hall, in which women now live.

The referendum also asks each respondent whether he or she will apply to live in the integrated residence for 1972-73.

Although the referendum is not binding, it is the major decision. A substantial majority in favour of the integration will put great pressure on residence governments to carry it through; the lack of such a majority will convince them not to make any change.

The decision to hold tomorrow's vote was made last Tuesday in a stormy joint meeting of the Women's Residence Council--the student government in women's res--and the Inter-Residence Council, which governs the Leonard Field complex for men.

Early in that meeting, the whole idea of coed residence was almost shelved after the Women's Residence Council announced its discontent with the proposal.

That view was based on the "mock application form" circulated in women's residence a week ago, in which only a small number of women indicated that they would want to live in an integrated Gordon-Brockington.

"The WRC is in favour of the principle of coed residence on campus for first-year students," WRC president Cindy Davidson told the meeting, reading a motion passed by WRC the previous night.

But they opposed the specific proposal, and agreed to call a referendum only if three questions were added to the ballot:

-"Will you apply to live in Gordon-Brockington as a coeducational residence in the 1972-73 academic session?"

-"In which residence do you presently live?"

-"In what university year are you enrolled?"

The last two questions will make it possible to tabulate the vote separately for men and for women, to count separately those who are eligible to enter residence again next year, and to see whether residents of Chown and Gordon-Brockington, the buildings affected by the proposal, have different feelings about it than other residents.

The proposal for integrating Gordon-Brockington and moving the displaced men into Chown is the third suggestion to come from the coed residence study committee which, under the auspices of the WRC, the IRC, and the Alma Mater Society, has been working since last spring.

Its first suggestion, to integrate part of Victoria Hall, was scrapped without coming to a vote. The second proposal was to integrate all of Vic and make Gordon-Brockington an entirely female residence. The WRC turned that idea down after an earlier "mock application" showed that filling Gordon-Brockington with women would be difficult.

Since the Gordon-Brockington-Chown proposal came from the study committee, residence governments have been deep in politics and often in hard feelings about it. The IRC favours the proposal, but most members of the WRC are sceptical about it. Tomorrow's vote was called only after a meeting in which the women came under heavy pressure from the IRC and from study committee chairman Doug Romans.

Residence students outside the councils have been active as well. Windows in four residences--Victoria, Morris, Gordon-Brockington and Chown--spelled out "VOTE COED" on Sunday afternoon. And before the referendum was announced, at least one petition was being prepared in women's residence, demanding that a vote be held whether or not the WRC endorsed it.

A flyer headed "A Reconsideration of Coed Residence" circulated in women's residences early last week, countering claims that coed residence would be an undesirable place to live.

"Coed residence is not going to be an unkempt slovenly brothel," it said. The signature at the bottom was simply, "More concerned residents."

This was an echo of the "Concerned Resident" who signed a mimeographed flyer handed out three weeks ago when the Victoria-Gordon-Brockington proposal was being seriously discussed. That flyer concentrated on the considerable differences in physical facilities between men's and women's residences at present.

Tomorrow's vote is not on the general principle of integrated residence, but on the specific proposal the committee has made.

This would see men and women living in alternate rooms in Donald Gordon House and Brockington House, the 356-bed duplex building which is the newest (1965) of the Leonard Field residences.

The 170 men displaced from Gordon-Brockington would live in Chown, which was built in 1959.

The men in the integrated residence would be in approximately the same proportion of first-year and upper-year students which prevails on Leonard Field now. Women, however, might have a higher concentration of upper-year students than exists in the women's residences now.

Any opinion given in tomorrow's vote goes to the WRC and the IRC this Friday for their action. From there, a proposal would have to clear the Ban Righ Board (which, despite its name, governs all women's residences), the Men's Residences Board, and the general Residences Board before going into effect for the next school year.

LaPierre gives his views on Canada

The people of Quebec are beginning to see what it is they want as a country. But no one in English Canada seems interested in what Canada is supposed to be about or even whether it continues to exist as a country, Laurier LaPierre, Canadian historian and French-Canadian nationalist said Thursday night.

Sharing the stage with Gunnar Myrdal, LaPierre said that he was very disturbed by what he sees happening in English Canada, and particularily Ontario.

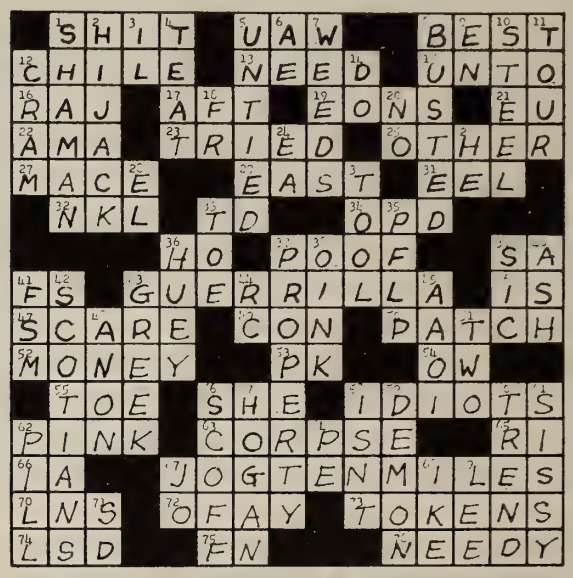
"It is sad to see the people of northern Ontario not asking why things are so bad up there," he said. He added that the reason is that the government cannot do anything because the Americans own Ontario.

LaPierre said that he was also shocked by the reaction of English Canadians to the American surcharge. They view the surcharge as a good thing for Canada because Canada will be better off financially if the United States becomes richer. This view accepts without question the fact that our economy should be so tied to the American economy, he said.

The recession which has been worsened by the American moves has also given companies a chance to weaken the labour movement, LaPierre noted, since they can go into increased automation after they lay men off with the excuse that the company is doing poorly because of the general bad times.

The American economic measures, which are especially harsh for Canada, have also had the "benefit" of getting Canada talked about in the US, LaPierre suggested that the "sheer delight of being talked about in the New York Times" has blinded Canadians to the many dangers for this country of American economic measures of recent months.

Given this peculiar attitude, LaPierre suggested that "maybe Canadians don't want a country maybe they just want to go on making money."



Certainly, no one has been asking "what is their country all about," he said.

The situation in Quebec (LaPierre referred to Canada and Quebec as separate countries) is quite different, he said.

"We in Quebec are beginning to see what we want as a country," LaPierre said. "We want a modern society in the French language, which will have different goals and value systems and be a different society than Canada."

"We have had enough of being subtenants in a house subrented by the Ontarioans from the Americans," he said.

May-June special session planned

The arts and science faculty board has approved, in principle, a recommendation to hold a special summer session in May and June next year. Students could take up to two courses during this extra six-week period.

A special meeting Friday afternoon will consider details of the experimental session, which would fill most of the gap now existing between the winter academic year and the regular summer session.

It has not been decided what courses will be offered. However the committee of departments has recommended to the faculty board that the departments of psychology, English, sociology, math, drama, film, economics, history, biology, geography and computing science be asked to suggest courses they could offer during that session.

Another question which Friday's meeting will consider is whether faculty members who teach in the May-June session should be paid--or, perhaps, have a lighter teaching load during the regular session.

The additional summer session would make it possible for students to finish their degrees faster--a general B.A. would take only two winter sessions and part of two summers for a student who wanted to go to school year-round.

Similarly, a student who wanted to change his subject of concentration could take extra courses to catch up in his new subject. And, courses could be offered which are unavailable in the winter because of the shortage of staff.

During the 1971 summer school, and at registration in September, students were asked if they would be interested in attending a May-June session. Of those who answered the survey, 38 percent said they might be willing if courses they wanted were offered.

This gave a total of 685 potential students for the inter-session period.

Open hours referendum held today

Women in the central campus residences vote today on a proposed extension of "open hours"--the times during which women can have men visitors in their rooms.

At present these hours are from noon Friday continuously until midnight Sunday.

This "open weekend" policy has existed since November 1970, and was reconfirmed by a 95 percent vote early last spring. Before open weekends began, men visitors were allowed during more restricted times--first Sunday afternoons only, later Friday evenings, Saturday evenings and finally Saturday afternoons.

Except for special occasions, the first regular open hours were in 1969.

At press time, according to Women's Residence Council Cindy Davidson, the text of today's referendum had not been decided. She said it would probably ask women to decide on four possible sets of open hours:

-Open at all times.

-Open from noon to midnight weekdays, plus full open weekends.

-Open from suppertime to midnight weekdays, plus open weekends.

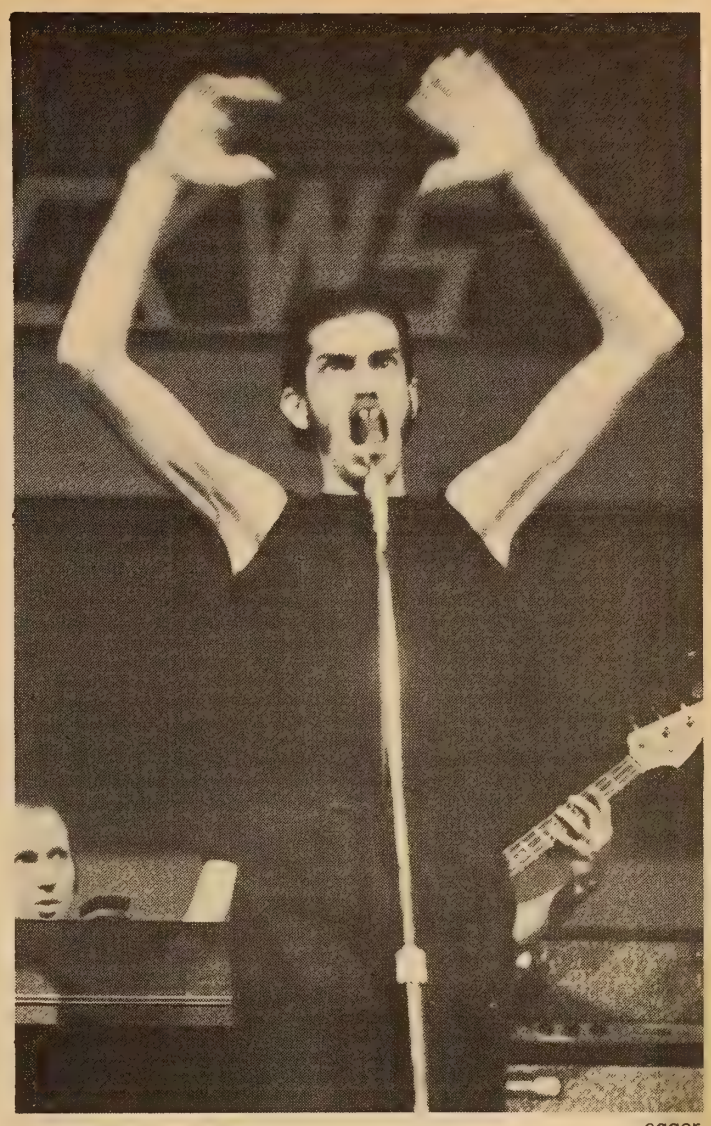
-Only open weekends, as at present.

Any change in open hours regulations would require a two-thirds vote of the 1125 women in the central campus residences--Victoria, Adelaide, Ban Righ and Chown Halls.

The results of the referendum will go to the Ban Righ Board, the body which governs women's residences and must approve regulation changes.

Raffle winners named

Science 72 has announced that Mrs. R.O. West, wife of Dr. R.O. West of the cardio-pulmonary laboratory at Queen's, won the two-week trip for two to Barbados in the Tortuga raffle which ended last weekend.



Second prize in the raffle, a $750 stereo set, went to third-year sociology student Bob Speagle.

Third prize, a 19-inch color television, was won by Mark Stewart of mining 73. Forth prize was a 10-speed bicycle and went to third-year history student Dee Roberts.

The fifth prize, gift certificates from Kingston merchants, went to P.M. Poaps of Rock Island, Quebec (and was sold by his son Tom of fourth-year mechanical engineering). The sixth prize, also gift certificates, went to John G. Hall of Beaconsfield, Quebec.

Salesman for the winning ticket was Brian Clifford of chemical eng 72.

The top salesman was Randy McNaughton of fourth-year mechanical, who sold 625 tickets and helped make mechanical engineering the winning division in ticket sales.

Faculty discusses course guide

Discussion of the 1971 course evaluation guide, and of course evaluation in general, has been deferred until December by the arts and science faculty board.

Marv Bloos, president of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society, read an "open letter" apologizing to the faculty for the errors in the 1971 course guide which ASUS published. Most of the errors, affecting about 129 of the courses listed, were caused by a machine error in calculating student answers.

Bloos expressed hope that the concept of course evaluation would not be damaged by past mistakes.

Planning for the 1972 course evaluation guide is in the early stages; third-year economics student John Bankes has been chosen course guide coordinator.

Collins Bay Drama Club

On December 3rd and 4th at the Grand Theatre, inmates of Collins Bay Penitentiary will present a high-spirited contemporary lookatlife in an institution. The play is "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest" by Ken Kesey, and is based on one of the most popular novels of the last 15 years. The play is about a mental hospital and centres on the conflict between the head nurse and a patient who is transferred to the mental institution from a prison farm. The result of the conflict is an evening of raucous comedy full of insights about big institutions and the society that runs them.

Featured in the cast are Rocky Thibeault and Kip Kully. Both men played large roles in last year's production of "A Criminal Record", which was shown to the public at performances inside the penitentiary and then went to Ottawa where it appeared in the Dominion Drama Festival. Nancy Helwig, who directed "A Criminal Record" is also the director of the new play.

Five local actresses are appearing with the inmates in this production. Beverly Stewart and Judith Thompson, both actresses who are well known in Kingston, and the leads in last year's Domino production of "The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie", play the two largest female parts.

The play will be produced only twice locally, at 8.30 p.m. at the Grand Theatre on the evenings of December 3rd and 4th. Tickets are $2.00 regular, with a special rate of $1.50 for students and Senior Citizens. There are also group rates according to the following schedule:

Groups of 10-25: Regular $1.75 Students and Senior Citizens $1.25

The standard of perfection in rock and roll vocal precision and tightness in arrangements since about 1961 has been, and remains, under the sole ownership of the Wilson Family & Friends from Hawthorne, California. The Beach Boys' musical contribution to Americana has to late left the regimens of Surfin', drag-strips, and California Girls, to enter the great Ecology craze, with a second Reprise rerelease entitled "SURF'S UP".

Treating of "pollution and slow death", and leading off with the plea "Don't go near the water", the lyrics never allow their message to intrude above the richness of that expected Beach Boy harmony. One of the better cuts is Bruce Johnson's nostalgic "Disney Girls (1957)", with subtle reference to the "Ozzie and Harriet Show" which spawned country-rocker Rick Nelson -- "Hi Rick and Dave, Hi Pop...Well good morning mom."

Johnson's tune has a changing melodic structure which displays his talent for writing in the same light as his "Tears In The Morning" which highlighted the SUNFLOWER album.

In addition to Johnson, four other Beach Boys contribute either lyrics or melodies to this album -- the only exception being Dennis Wilson. Two of Brian Wilson's songs " 'Til I Die", and "Surf's Up", are exceptional, while "A Day in the Life Of A Tree", is merely a monologue recital tracing the life cycle of a tree, and featuring the voice of their publicist Jack Rieley.

Most Beach Boy fans will wish to add this album to their set, while those of us who were more impressed by the Sunflower set will await anxiously the next offering from Brian and his talented brothers and pals. SURF'S UP THE BEACH BOYS...REPRISE RS 6453.

Under the tutelage of ex-Beatle mentor George Martin, and hailing from the sailing capital of the World--Marblehead, Massachusetts -- comes the second Capitol album from Seatrain. If Martin accomplished technical improvements with the raw talent of writers Lennon and McCartney, he is again displaying this flair for offering direction and discipline to novitiates in the rock world's overcrowded cloisters.

Seatrain is of the new breed of rockers -- combining the high-pitched whine of violin with a strongly funky underbeat of heavy bass and some flashy drum-licks. The resulting impression is that of a country band gone London sophistication -- perhaps this is George Martin's "proper" British influence. Whatever it is, it is good!

Sounding just a bit like the Band on several cuts -- particularly those in which Lloyd Baskin's keyboards come into play -- Seatrain nevertheless has a distinctive vocal blend and style. The title song effectively blends in such disparate rock instruments as flute and violin, as the Marblehead Messenger is seen as a modern Paul Revere who must "take the message from the people -- lay down your arms".

"London Song" is one which features some of the thoughts of a Yank alone and drunk "in an empty London bed", as well as a vocal pairing that has a tenor harmony closely blended into the lead baritone that earmarks the Seatrain style. "Mississippi Moon" is a hillbilly lament given that city-fied Seatrain transition which takes it from the Ozarks to the Seaweed Studios in Marblehead Mass.

MARBLEHEAD MESSENGER, as an album shows Seatrain's remarkable progress from their first Capitol album, and the production techniques of George Martin can't help but improve their distinctive country-rock sound. MARBLEHEAD MESSENGER SEATRAIN CAPITOL SMAS 829.

Like the old proverb about books and covers and judgements appended thereto, you can add album covers to the old appearance - reality admonition. Judging from the cover of an album called Marc Ellingon, one might have thought that the materials therein would treat of evil, drak, treacherous deeds. Instead, this sinister looking songster has more affinities with Lightfoot than Machiavelli.

The cover photo depicts a goateed Ellington, while the musical portrait portrays an extremely talented and sensitive songwriter. Marc penned all of the songs contained on RAINS-REINS OF CHANGE himself with the exception of Carl Perkin's "Blue Suede Shoes".

As far as session-men go, Ellington travels in very exclusive company. He is aided by the King of Steel players, Sneaky Pete Drake, and ex-Byrd, Chris Hillman (now a Flying Burrito) and ex-Southern Comfort namesake Ian Mathews, who add some effective harmonies to Marc's already capable baritone. (Mathews' voice is a welcome addition on "Song For A Friend" in particular.)

Ellington's Ampex album is heavily acoustic-guitar dominated, evoking that folky-country rock sound that has become identified with the Grateful Dead. Not an alien direction to rock these days at all, when even Jagger's Stones roll out the pedal-steel for "Wild Horses", and utilize the uncredited extensive mandolin and slide guitars of Ry Cooder on their LET IT BLEED collection!

Ellington's songs have a poignant quality as on "Song For A Friend" and "Days Used To Be Much Warmer". Sounding a lot like Paul Stookey, (whose "Wedding Song" has been released as a single from his album as soloist without Peter & Mary.) When Ellington gives his rendition of the traditional folk epic "Yarrow" the similarities between his and Stookey's voice are really uncanny.

Guitar playing is the watchword on this album, with Marc Ellington's efforts only being slightly eclipsed by the lead work of one Richard Thompson and the acoustic fingering of Mike Deighan. Extremely easy on the ears is RAINS-REINS OF CHANGE MARC ELLINGTON AMPEX A-10131.

$1 billion has not ended prov

BY BILL JOHNSTON

It is one o the central facts of Canadian life that the ten provinces have not shared equally in the economic growth of this country, and that Ontario and British Columbia have prospered while most of the rest of the country has lagged behind.

Over the past decade, the federal government has spent well over one billion dollars on programmes specifically designed to overcome the vast economic differences which exist in this country, and yet the Atlantic provinces still trails far behind the rest of the country in income, unemployment rates are still about twice as high in the east as in Ontario, prices are much higher in the Maritimes and British Columbia than in central Canada, and large chunks of the younger members of the labour force continued to move from their homes in the Atlantic provinces and Saskatchewan and Manitoba to search for jobs in the rest of Canada. Incomes for people in the Prairie provinces, particularly Saskatchewan, still fluctuate tremendously from year to year, depending to a large extent on whether or not there is a good market for grain, and unemployment in the Maritimes continues to nearly double in the winter months over summer rates that are already well above the national average.

The result of the continuation of these conditions is a growing tension between the provinces, as they compete with one another in trying to attract industry to their province. The Maritimes, and, even more, the Prairies are resentful that they have to pay the high prices charged on manufactured goods largely produced in central Canada because of the protective tariff which has existed in this country since the turn of the century, while they know that the raw materials they produce must compete at world prices, both inside and outside of Canada. The frustrations with the great differences in the benefits derived by the provinces other than Ontario from confederation has led to talk of separation of the Prairie provinces from Canada and has given separatistes in Quebec one more justification for their efforts to get Quebec to leave the country.

That these economic disparities between the different regions of the country continue to exist in spite of the vast amount of money spent by the federal government in the past ten years may seem surprising, but a closer examination of some of the programmes which were established to try to overcome the disparities might make some of that clearer.

Perhaps the most surprising aspect of the programmes is that, although greater differences have existed between the provinces since most of them joined Canada, the federal government did not get into the act until 1961. In his book The Canadian Political Nationality, Donald Smiley commented that, until the 1960's, the federal government was somewhat insensitive to the regional aspects of the Canadian economic problems. Their concern was mainly for creating economic growth at the national level, on the assumption that the benefits from such growth would accrue to the entire country. However, S.E. Chernick, an economist, has found that boom times for the country as a whole do not necessarily lead to a lessening of regional economic disparities.

Because of the federal government's lack of activity in the field, much of the effort to reduce economic disparities came from the have-not provinces themselves. These efforts were generally based on the idea that if industry could just be attracted to the province, there would be employment for more people, more money would be available for people to spend, more new inudstry would be attracted to the province to take advantage of the growing market and economic growth and development would occur.

Thus, for instance, in Nova Scotia, Robert Stanfield, then premier, tried to carry out an election promise he made in 1956 to reduce the trend of under-development in Nova Scotia and to provide jobs by creating the crown corporation, Industrial Estates Limited. Industrial Estates invited industries to locate in Nova Scotia, and to attract them, offered to finance 100 per cent of the cost of land and buildings, 60 per cent of the installed cost of machinery and gave substantial tax concessions (often industries paid no property taxes for up to ten years.)

The failures, at least so far, seem to have been more numerous than the successes. United States-owned Deuterium Corporation of Canada was brought in to build a heavy water plant at Glace Bay to supply coolant for nuclear reactors. To date, after some $120 million of public money has been spent, the plant has yet to be completed, let alone to operate. The plant may operate some day however, as Prime Minister Trudeau announced on October 29 that another $95 million, this time in federal money, would be allocated for the project.

Several other industries which have been enticed into locating in Nova Scotia have done badly. For instance, the Clairtone plant at Stellarton was built in 1964 with an $8 million government loan and then was sold to Industrial Estates in 1967. Shortly thereafter, an $800,000 loss was reported for the first half of 1967 and its total deficit by 1969 was $18 million.

Not all of the industries that have been attracted have done badly, of course, but even those doing well have often failed to benefit the province as much as was expected. For instance, Michelin Tire located in Nova Scotia instead of Quebec and created 500 new jobs. However, at the same time, it ended the operation of a local supplier of Dunlop tires when that firm merged with Michelin, so the net gain on jobs was only 100.

Moreover, one of the purposes of attracting industry was to increase the tax base of the province, since there would be more productive land to tax. Yet, the tax concessions often offset this gain. Also, many of the companies falter, after an initial successful period of operation, when the tax concessions end.

Much of the problem with this method of trying to create growth and development is that no real attempt is made or has been made to determine why industries locate where they do, so that efforts could be directed towards supplying the type of facilities in a province which would make it attractive to industry without incentives. Thus, in Nova Scotia, a great deal of mental effort has been expended for the past several years on a plan to harness the tidal power of the Bay of Fundy for hydro electric power - but it appears that no real effort has been made to determine the extent to which such a tremendously expensive project would attract industry or create growth.

Similarily, in attempting to attract industry, there is frequently a failure to pay attention to creating an organized economy or to anticipating future changes in the economy that could lead to the decline of certain industries or to growth in others. It generally appears that the assumption is made that an industry is good for a province if it will come to the province.

Also, with numerous provinces and regions contending with each other for industry, it often happens that far too much is spent for the benefits gained, simply because industries tend to locate where the grants and other incentives are greatest. Not only does this lead to a waste of resources but it also creates tensions between provinces. Kari Levitt notes in Silent Surrender that large American corporations favour the growth of provincial autonomy for just this reason, since policies set at the provincial level for attracting industries allow them to choose among attractive offers from various provinces before they decide where to locate. It is not uncommon, either, for firms to move from one location to another to take advantage of development incentives offered.

Other problems with provincial development agencies, occur because the provinces have often lent large sums of money to companies without taking any ownership in them. The Manitoba Development Fund in some cases lent 80 per cent of a plant's cost without participating at all in ownership of the company or in its profits. Also, because of the size of the provincial agencies and their lack of finances, at least for operational expenses, the provincial agencies have often lacked the expertise needed to judge the value and Moneo, called the Prairie Community System, agrees with the farmers' gut reactions. They noted that Canada is simply repeating policies which were tried ten years ago in the United States and which failed at enormous cost, and they also emphasized the value of small communities which can counterbalance the excesses of our technological society.)

The same problem arises in concentrating the 70 fishing villages of P.E.I. into 16 villages where services such as bait, holding tanks, ice and boat repairs could be concentrated and made more efficient. But the people in the 54 villages which cease being fishing centres are reluctant to move to the new, more concentrated centres.

The federal government has had numerous other programmes, many of them similar to ARDA. Another one was the Atlantic Development Board, created in 1962 to implement an overall plan for the Atlantic provinces and to build up the region's roads, electric power and services at industrial sites.

In 1963, the Atlantic Development Agency was created to encourage industrial development in areas of chronic unemployment. In 1965, ADA began offering cash incentive grants of up to $5 million to any company building new manufacturing or processing facilities in certain designated areas, which contained some of Canada's highest unemployment rates and lowest incomes.

The idea of trying to stimulate development in areas of chronic depression has been criticized by many people, who suggest that better results in developing a region would be obtained if the efforts were concentrated on areas which appear to have some growth potential. T.N. Brewis, for instance, has suggested that some very poor areas should be encouraged to decline, since they are a drain on the economy and that effort should be concentrated on potential growth centres. To some extent, this has been the aim of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which was created in 1968. DREE also works on an incentive grant scheme, but the regions designated for help are much larger than those under ADA. Grants are available in most of the Maritimes, eastern Quebec, a band across central Ontario, the southern quarter of Manitoba, strips of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the southeastern corner of British Columbia. The programme will grant up to $30,000 per new job created or up to 50 per cent of the capital employed in the operation.

DREE, too, has its critics. Len Poetschke, who worked for DREE in Nova Scotia, has said that too much money is spent without clear planning for what it is supposed to accomplish, and all too often, the provinces accept money from DREE for things like road improvements without any other reason than that the money is available. Poetschke contends that the governments should be spending their money creating decision making mechanisms that allow people, not governments, to do what is socially necessary. Too much of the planning now, he feels, is just handed down from some bureaucracy to the people who have to live with the "solutions" the experts come up with.

A type of programme, using ideas like Poetschke's, has been attempted in the Gaspe under the BAEQ (the Bureau d' Amenagement de l'Est du Quebec.) The idea is called social animation and the aim is to get the people in a depressed area to examine their own situation and needs and then to form committees to plan for what they want. Between 1963 and 1966, social animators worked with the people of the Gaspe to develop an overall scheme for development which was given to the Quebec government as a report in 1966. The idea of the programmes of social animation require of course fairly sweeping changes in the power structure of an area, as committees of the people decide what is to be done, thus largely replacing the traditional power structures. This may well have frightened off the Ottawa and Quebec governments, since little action has been taken to implement the plan for the Gaspe, although an agreement for a development programme in a modified form was signed by the federal and provincial government in 1968.

Thre have been other criticisms, too, of many of the government's regional policies. An Economic Council report in 1967 noted that the hundreds of millions of dollars spent under ARDA and similar programmes were not producing a net benefit to the economy. The report stated, "From the hundreds of projects listed in the ARDA catalogue,it would not be difficult to pick out many in which the taxpayer pays one dollar so that the farmer somewhere in the fringe area can make 50 cents." More recently, Tom Kent, deputy minister of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, resigned, saying that DREE has been a disappointment.

There are numerous other programme of the federal government which play a part in lessening the economic disparities between regions in Canada, but which have other aims as their main purpose and thus will be mentioned only briefly here. For instance, some programmes designed to aid certain sectors of the economy, such as the Canada Forestry Act, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration and, to some extent, ARDA, have also had effects on regional economics, since the sectors being dealt with (here, forestry and farming) happen to be concentrated in regions of slow economic growth.

Spending per pupil for year 1966-67.

Federal government transfer payments to individuals, in the form of welfare payments, family benefits etc. and federal personal income taxes also tend to reduce the gap in average personal income between the "have" and "have-not" provinces, since those in the "have-not" provinces tend to receive more of these transfer payments (especially as a percentage of their income) and pay less in taxes than those in the "have" provinces.

One programme of the federal government should be noted however in this regard and that is the Canada Assitance Plan, begun in 1966, whereby the federal government has promised to pay 50 per cent of any provincial or municipal payment made to the poor which could be called assistance. While these payments are transfer payments, it could well be that they do little or nothing to overcome regional disparities because, the offer to pay 50 per cent of cost by the federal government is less likely to be taken up by the poorer provinces than by the richer ones. The plan requires that provinces first pay the full amount of any assistance to the poor which they decide to make and that they then submit an accounting to Ottawa for reimbursement for the 50 per cent. Thus, since the federal government made the same plan available to all the provinces, regardless of their wealth, it is likely that the wealthy provinces will be more likely to establish assistance programmes and to pay larger amounts than the poorer provinces could, which could actually widen the gap between the rich and poor provinces by raising the income of poor people in the richer provinces, and thus raising the provincial average.

Vote co-ed.

At least eight months of discussion, planning, bickering and debate will climax tomorrow when everyone in residence will vote in a referendum which will quite likely determine whether there will be co-ed residence here next year.

If well over 67 percent vote yes on the first question and over 70 first year women vote yes on the second, it will be very difficult for the Women's Residence Council to continue its opposition to the co-ed proposal, and we feel that this would be a highly desirable outcome.

The idea of co-ed residence seems to us to be a far more reasonable way of living than the present system of segregating the sexes. With both men and women living together, it would become easier for people to become comfortable with members of the opposite sex in a situation in which there is much less pressure to make an impression than is the case in most other situations in which men and women get together. The opportunity would be easily available for men and women to become simply friends and possibly to relate to each other as people, rather than as potential mates or dates. Of course, there would also be the increased possibility that one could meet someone for that purpose as well, and increasing the opportunities for members of the opposite sex to get together informally on that or any basis would certainly be welcome to many a frosh or freshette who would like to go out, but doesn't know anyone to ask.

But beyond the question of the advantages which we see in the idea of co-ed residence is the question of giving people the choice of the type of residence life they would like. Indications from the numerous referenda which have been held, are that there are large numbers of first year men and women who would have chosen to go into a co-ed residence if there were one, and, given the Women's Residence Council policy of always trying to give applicants their first choice in residence location, it should have been possible for these people to have lived co-ed.

There are too many advantages to co-ed residence and too many people who would like to live in co-ed residence for the present system of segregated residences to continue, and we hope that the results of tomorrow's referendum will make that clear to some people who are still trying to block the idea.

Why bylines

Those words "by Joe Somebody" which sometimes appear over news articles and other stories seem to puzzle some people, who think that the by-lines are there to inform them of whose biases they are reading. Although this is true to an extent in the longer features, it is not the main purpose of by-lines in the news section (which, if you don't think you have found yet, is usually at the front of this paper.) The purpose of the by-line on a news story is mainly to reward somebody, with a touch of public recognition, for doing a lot of digging on a story or just doing a plain good job.

They also have the purpose of informing people that Joe, who you thought was just an average dummy, is working on the paper, and if he can do it, you will think that you can, too, and you'll come tripping into our office some Sunday, Tuesday or Wednesday full of eagerness to get your own by-line in the paper.

Or maybe you could at least pass on a news tip to Joe.

"I've got nothing against men! I just wouldn't want one living next door to me!"

the Dormouse

BY Alan Broadbent

The step-over-toe-hold. The flying drop-kick. The jui-jitsu commando death hold. The Claw.

Who could ever forget them? These and many other favorite combinations are the domain of the world of wrestling. And wrestling is coming to Kingston this week.

I remember all of those rainy Saturday afternoons, when there was nothing to do, when out of boredom we would turn on the television and watch the wrestling. It was something like watching a W.C. Fields movie, for you knew it was such a fraud, and you knew that nobody believed it, but you had to watch it.

It was always so predictable. There would be the old wrestler, with an incredible name like Whipper Billy Watson, who would wander out with his paunch well in control looking little like a whipper or a Billy. He would be roundly cheered by an audience comprised largely of old women in big coats, carrying umbrellas. The old wrestler had once been young and fit, and had thus been a villain, but the years had mellowed him, mostly physically, and now he was the darling of the post-menopause set. He carried himself with a relative dignity, reflective of his years of paying dues in the ring.

Once the old-timer was in the ring, the challenger would bluster his way to the centre of the arena. He was young, active, fit, and he had a gimmick. The old ladies hated him, and while he was on his way to the ring they would hammer away at him with their umbrellas, as they would a piece of meat to make it tender. Sometimes he would take a swipe at some woman, thus making her somewhat of a folk-hero among her peers. He would leap into the ring, a fluery of evil motion.

The stage was set. Good versus evil. The old-timer would come out to shake hands with the villain, and the villain would slap his hand away.

The fight was programmed. The active youngster would beat the daylights out of the veteran. He punched, gouged, kicked, and generally ignored the rules. He taunted the fans, and the hero would lie upon the floor of the ring, seemingly moribund, grunting and gurgling.

The old women were livid. They screamed, shrieked, even shouted obscenities. Some tried to rush the ring, umbrellas threatening. The villain goaded them, bringing them to a point of near hysteria.

But suddenly the tenure of the fight would change. The hero would pull some fantastically clever move, baffling the younger opponent, and within seconds the fight would be over. Experience over inexperience, knowledge over ignorance, the confrontation was resolved.

The jeers changed to cheers, the old women had won. The hero's hand was held high, while the villain lay prone at his feet.

The referee was an integral part of the spectacle. He started out in complete authority, but as the match progressed he gradually lost all control. The villain would flaunt the rules, and the referee became powerless. The villain would secure the hero in a headlock, reach into his trunks and pull out a bottle-cap (was it really a bottle-cap), and make gouging motions at the hero's face. In a deft waltz, the villain would keep this illegal action from the referee's view, moving in ellusive harmony with the arbiter's wondering glance.

After the match, the ring-side announcer would interview the hero in a vacuous exchange. Excitement was provided by the revived villain who would attempt to reverse the decision. However, the hero would deliver the villain several adroit blows, coupled with some microphone smashes by the announcer, and the vanquished youth would retreat to the locker-room beneath a hail of flailing umbrellas.

The formula remained the same in all professional wrestling, but the circumstances would vary. Tag-team matches were a mainstay of any evening of wrestling. The heroes would play by the rules, sending only one man into the ring at a time. The villains would send anyone they could find in there, including their managers, trainers, and wives. The tag-team match provided the one forum where the villains could win, for they would gang up on the heroes, two against one, and pin him for the required time. This victory was permissible under the moral structure of wrestling, for everyone recognized that two against one was just not fair.

The tag-team format was also a vehicle for the younger fighter to become a hero. He would team up with an old-timer, and gradually, if he did it enough, his bad image would wear off.

The old women ultimately controlled wrestling, for only with their consent could hero and villain be named, only with their consent could fights take place, and only with their fanaticism and money could wrestling be a spectacle. And only with the concurrence of Granny-power could wrestling assume the wierd moral stance that it has.

Myrdal on world poverty, Canadian economy and USA

by Bill Johnston

For five days last week, people here had the opportunity to enjoy the wit and wisdom of one of the world's most renowned economists, Sweden's Gunnar Myrdal.

Everyone who heard him seemed charmed by the quiet manner of this brilliant man who called everyone Brother, who spoke so highly of his own country and government and who much preferred the give and take of a small seminar to the formality of lectures. Even Laurier LaPierre, normally arrogant and assertive in his French-Canadian nationalism, seemed subdued and attentive in listening to Myrdal Thursday night, calling him "Sir", and occasionally allowing himself to speak as a Canadian, rather than a Quebecois.

During his many appearances (Myrdal half-jokingly commented that the way he had to run around made him think we are just like the Americans) he discussed a wide range of subjects, including those dealt with below, which were discussed on Thursday and Friday.

World poverty

Economists have contended for years that there is a fundamental contradiction between the pursuit of an equitable distribution of income and the pursuit of economic development in a country, a belief which has shaped most of the efforts of developed countries in giving foreign aid to underdeveloped countries and which has insured their failure.

Speaking to students in Ellis Hall Friday afternoon on the subject of world poverty, Gunnar Myrdal claimed that the opposite of the traditional contention has in fact been proved true; namely, that not only can an equitable distribution of income occur along with economic development, but in most underdeveloped countries, economic development will not take place until all the people in the countries are equal.

Myrdal cited a number of reasons for this contention. First, because of the great inequities in the distribution of income in most underdeveloped countries, most of the people live in abject poverty and are nearly always underfed, if not starving. The result is that, because of their poor nutrition, they are unable to work well and this in turn results in low levels of productivity for the whole country. A more equal distribution of wealth would give the people the necessary nutrition to allow them to work better.

Secondly, economic inequality is almost always tied to social inequality, so that certain people are relegated by birth to certain types of occupations. The result is a tremendous waste of human resources, as many potentially intelligent or talented people are denied the chance to fully use their abilities.

Thirdly, those in the upper strata of society who have the money tend to often indulge in conspicuous consumption, to flaunt their riches rather than using them for some constructive purposes. The result is a tremendous waste of whatever resources the underdeveloped country possesses.

Thus, Myrdal contended that removal of the obstacles to equality would free the resources now squandered by the rich for better use, free people to fully use their talents and abilities to their own as well as the countries benefit, and would allow people to work their best through being properly fed.

> Foreign aid should be channeled through revolutionary groups in underdeveloped countries, not the reactionary ruling regimes.

Myrdal believes that their are four basic things which must be pushed in order for there to be equality in these countries. They are land reform, birth control, education and an end to corruption.

The type of land reform Myrdal refers to is a sweeping change in the pattern of land ownership, from a system where most of the people are merely renters from a small class of owners to a system where the vast majority own or at least can own their own land.

Birth control has been pushed in many of the underdeveloped countries in recent years with some good results but Myrdal believes that much more effort has to be put into birth control efforts so that the population no longers grows faster than the food supply.

Education, to Myrdal, is probably the most essential ingredient for economic development. Myrdal said that it is essential that most of the money spent on education be put into primary level education and adult education in which the emphasis is on teaching people to read. Yet, at present, the vast majority of the money that is spent on education is spent at the secondary and university level, producing a whole class of people whose training suits them only for work as bureaucrats and civil servants.

Finally, Myrdal feels that much of the money that does go to the underveloped countries gets wasted and sisetracked through corruption in all levels of the government bureaucracies, and that there is so much corruption that the people's faith in their governments and the government agencies is destroyed. Myrdal also claimed that many of the foreign companies which locate in these countries contribute greatly to this spread of corruption, since they often bribe officials to get concessions that they desire. This type of bribery is so common and even accepted that companies can usually claim the money they spend on bribery as legitimate tax-deductible expenses.

Stopping corruption is essential, Myrdal claims, if the underdeveloped countries are to make any concerted effort at reform and development.

All of these reforms are essential before any real strides can be made in creating development in these countries, Myrdal claimed, but the reforms have to be made by the people themselves. The developed countries, either in the west or the communist countries, cannot make these reforms for the countries.

However, Myrdal feels that the western countries could put some pressure on the underdeveloped countries to make these reforms giving foreign aid only to those countries which will make efforts at real reform. In fact, Myrdal contends that aid should really be channeled through the revolutionary groups in the underdeveloped countries, rather than through the reactionary regimes which control them.

However, Myrdal also acknowledged that this is highly unlikely to happen. Businessmen who locate their companies into the underdeveloped countries naturally align themselves with the reactionary leaders of the countries, since maintenance of the status quo creates the stability they need to operate businesses. Similarily, governments in the west feel that they have to protect the foreign investments of their citizens and thus, they too tend to support the reactionary regimes.

Canadian economy

Strong controls of business, foreign and domestic, the creation of national, rather than international trade unions and the strengthening of trade unions was recommended by Gunnar Myrdal as a way of freeing Canada from American domination Thursday night.

Although he recognized that there are very many differences between his country of Sweden and Canada, Myrdal nonetheless felt that the above steps, all of which were taken by Sweden decades ago, would make a great deal of difference in the Canadian situation.

In Sweden, Myrdal said, the government has nationalized very few industries and instead has taken over many of the functions that we in North America feel should be carried out by the owners of businesses. Thus, the Swedish government has ensured that businesses operate in ways that benefit the entire nation, and should some company do something which is not in the interests of the Swedish people, the government simply passes a law forbidding that practice.

Thus, for instance, in the area of ownership of industry by non-Swedes (which is not a big problem in Sweden), there are Swedish laws which say that no foreigner may buy Swedish land or shares in Swedish businesses without permission from the Swedish government. Myrdal noted, also, that recently Americans have been buying into information processing businesses in Sweden, so the Swedish government, feeling that this is an important industry for the nation, is going to nationalize those businesses.

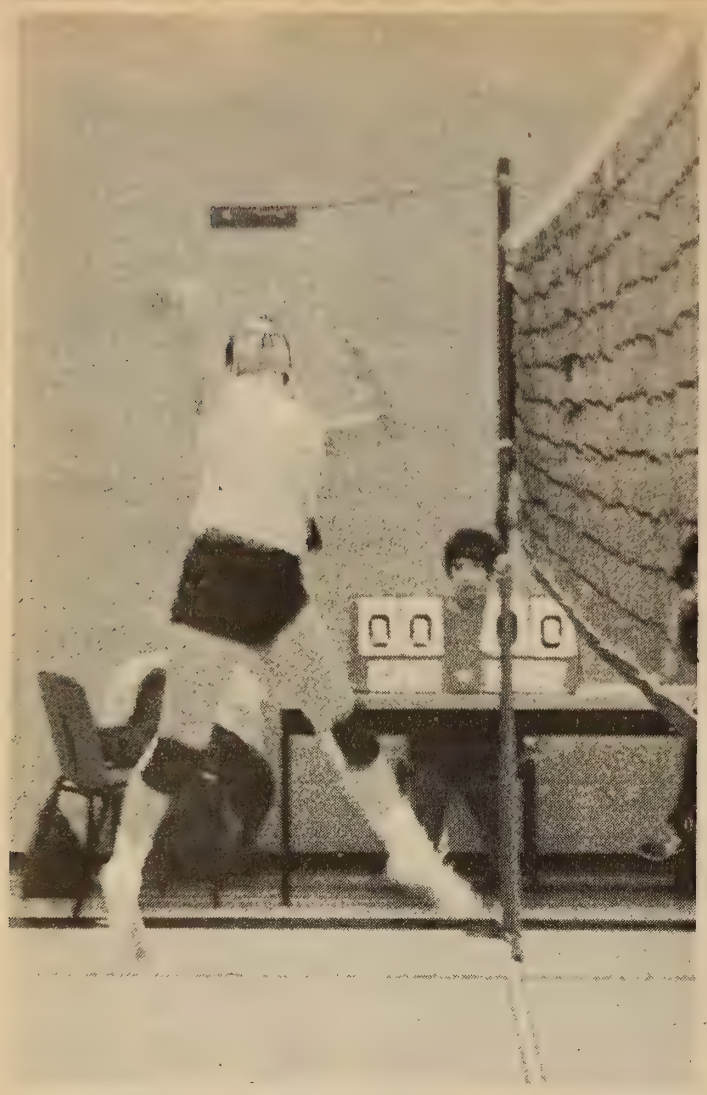
Myrdal suggested that Canada should adopt similar laws for control of all business, not just foreign businesses, but he also noted that nationalization of at least some industries, particularily the natural resources industries, would probably be necessary in Canada because we cannot rely on Canadian businessmen to promote nationalism, or to work for the good of the country.

One of the main strengths of Sweden is the fact that it has a very strong labour movement and equally strong unions of employers, Myrdal noted. The result is a "balance of terror" in which both sides behave reasonably because they know that they cannot force the other into bad situations or decisions. Also, there are very few strikes in Sweden because of this balance and because of the broad scale of union and management solidarity which means that any strike that could occur would have economy wide ramifications. He suggested strengthening Canadian unions to create a similar situation here.



Myrdal also felt that the situation which exists in Canada, where most of the labour unions are international (ie. American) unions is unfortunate largely because the American (and, thus the Canadian unions) have accepted the "queer" ideology of free enterprise which predominates in the United States, and thus have become unions of the upper class of workers in this country whose values are nearly identical with management's. He also believes that it would be easier to build up the Canadian unions if they were not affiliated with the American unions.

Myrdal also dealt briefly with the question of poverty and programmes designed to overcome poverty, and said that he was in favour of helping the poor by "giving in kind, and not in cash." By this he meant that he felt it was better to provide the poor with health services, dental care and housing, rather than simply giving them money which, given the type of values of western society, they would most likely spend on cars and TVs rather than on their health.

There is also an "absolute lack of planning" in this country by the central government in attempting to raise the depressed areas of this country out of poverty, Myrdal claimed, and particularily a lack of far-seeing planning. He said that such central planning was essential if depressed areas are to be developed, since the people of the area are so poor, backward and apathetic that they could not do it themselves.

America isn't rich

"American is not over-productive", Myrdal contended Thursday night, and elaborated by adding that America is also "not very rich, not that progressive and not that strong." He said that part of the reason that Americans feel they are a rich country is the fact that they have forgotten their debt to the poor, which he feels is about $3 trillion.

W.I.C. News

Although participation has been relatively poor, the W.I.C. reported the successful conclusion of another event and the introduction of two new sports.

Last Sunday, the Co-ed Badminton Tournament was held. Veena Rowat and Bill Hart emerged as the winners.

Bowling and Co-ed Volleyball were the new introductions over the past week.

Paddleball, ringette and basketball are continuing according to their schedules. The basketball schedule for this week is:

League A

7.15 Meds vs P.H.E. (3)
7.45 Law vs Rehab. (1)
8.15 Arts 73 (1) vs Arts 73(2)
8.45 Arts 75(1) vs Arts 75(3)

League B

7.15 Nursing vs P.H.E. (1)
7.45 McArthur vs Rehab. (2)
8.15 Arts 74 vs Arts 72
8.45 Arts 75(2) vs Arts 75(4)

The basketball standings have Arts 73(1) and P.H.E.(3) tied for first place in League A, and Arts 75(4) alone in the top position in League B.

Cumulative points and faculty standings have now been calculated for the events up to badminton. They are as follows: P.H.E. - 4639, Arts 73 - 3198, Rehab. - 1693, Meds. - 1055, Arts 75 - 1034, Arts 72 - 778, Nursing - 723, Arts 74 - 667, Commerce - 112, and Law and McArthur - 0.

For those of you at the bottom (or at least not at the top), there is still lots of time to catch up. And remember, your participation is more important to your faculty than winning.

(Ringette)

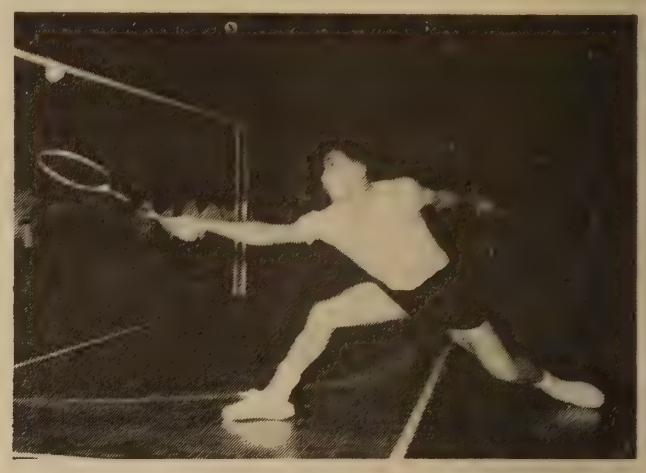
In the scheduled games, Arts 74 & Commerce cleaned PHE & Meds 7-1 on Nov. 3 and 9-4 on Nov. 10. Arts 75 & Arts 73 have defaulted both times despite the keen interest of a few in these years. As a result all interested are welcome to come out and participate at 8.00 Wednesday evening to form two teams and have a good game. It is an easy game supplying a lot of fun.

Intermediates keep winning

Trent University's Intermediate Volleyball Team was defeated in three games straight by the Queen's girls this past weekend. Queen's won by scores of 15-12, 15-9, and 15-0. In the last game, Judy Bierma, a first year P.H.E. student, served 9 straight times before the Trent girls managed to return the ball and take possession. The initial game was very close as the Queen's team learned a new system, however this quickly jelled and Trent was no contest thereafter. The girls will face stiffer competition next Saturday as they meet Ryerson here.

The Intermediate Women's Basketball Team won their first game of the season this past weekend. In an exhibition match against Trent, the Queen's girls came out on top by a score of 25-18, led by Jean Crichton who netted 10 points. Queen's played short, with only 7 team members available for the game. Although play was somewhat chippy on both sides, Queen's made up for any looseness in offensive play by their fine defensive work. It is difficult to tell how the girls will do in the future because of the small turnout and the fact that this was their first game.

Hockey Gals down Western



The women's ice hockey team under the auspices of Kathryn (Cookie) Cartwright, travelled to London early Friday morning to challenge the Western girls. Queen's were victorious 2-1. This is the first time Queen's has beaten Western in four years.

Western showed great passing and skating ability but suffered three self-inflicted injuries which helped lead to their defeat. (ie. the captain got her stick caught in the net and now is a little stunned.)

With a backhand slapshot in the second period, Cathy Collins scored the first goal with Karen Howatson assisting. Debby Gilmour followed with the second Queen's goal. Wanda Gyde, our goalie, showed great goal tending on a penalty shot as she did in five point blank saves.

In a desperate attempt to tie up the game Western pulled their goalie in the last minute of play. However Queen's managed to keep the puck in Western's end until the buzzer sounded.

The hockey gals play their next game against Trent University this Thursday at 7.00 p.m.

Queen's hosts World-class Badminton team

Queen's Badminton enthusiasts will have a chance to see two of the world's finest players in action here Tuesday night. A visiting contingent from the People's Republic of China will be staging an exhibition against the best at Queen's. These players are reputed to be the best in the world, and have a competitive record to prove it. Since their first visit to Sweden in October, 1966, they have dominated men's badminton competition. Playing against Denmark, then ranked second behind Indonesia, the Chinese won 39 straight matches. A reported exhibition between China and Indonesia ended in a 4-4 tie, according to available reports.

The two visitors to Queen's, Tong Hsien-Hu and Hou Chiachang, have been top players for at least five years. Tong, China's National Champion in 1966, is believed to still hold the crown. Both players participated in the tour of Scandanavia in 1966, and played return matches with the Danes when they visited China allowing only 16 points in six games. Come out at 7 p.m. Tuesday. Admission is $1.00 for students, and it should be worth every penny.

Hockey Gaels explode: Beat Ryerson 8-2 , Waterloo 9-4

By Ron Pratt

The Queen's Golden Gaels hockey club exploded for 17 goals in weekend action crushing the Ryerson Rams 8 - 2 Friday night and the Waterloo Warriors 9 - 4 Saturday afternoon to move into first place in the OUAA with four points.

In Friday's game,the Tricolour attack was led by Murray Douglas and Colin Loudon who each scored twice and picked up an assist. Morris Mott contributed no less than four assists while Bruce Cameron, Norm Goulet, Bob Smith, and John Smith added the other Queen's goals.

The Gaels came out hustling and hitting early in the game and continually carried the play as they surged into a 4 - 1 first period lead on 2 goals by Loudon and single markers by Douglas and Cameron. Loudon's two scores were the result of great team work as the Gael's wingers forced the puck loose with their heavy hitting. On Loudon's first marker it was Murray Douglas' hustle which allowed Bruce Cameron to pick up a loose puck and feed Loudon in front of the net for the Gael's first score. On his second goal, Loudon deked Ryerson goalie Rick Neal after taking a great pass from John Smith who had picked up the loose puck after Gaels' Stan Galt had flattened a Ryerson defender with a heavy body check.

The Gaels continued their hustling in the second period and added two goals (Goulet and Douglas) to jump ahead 6 - 2. But the score could easily have been 10 - 2 as the Gaels hit the goal post four times in the period with Mott hitting it twice on the same shift. But the big play of the period was an outstanding save by Gael goalie Clyde Harris on a breakaway by Ryerson's Glen Nicholson. Had Nicholson scored, Ryerson would have been trailing by 4-3 and the outcome of the contest might have been different. After that save, the Ryerson team lost much of its desire and the two quick goals by Goulet and Douglas selaed the victory.

In the third period, the Gaels concentrated on their checking but still managed to score twice with Bob Smith's low slapshot and John Smith's deflection off Mott's blast from the point beating Neal. For the Gaels, it was a fine team effort. The powerplay clicked for three scores while the penalty-killing team and the Gael defense played their best game of the year. Gaels outshot Ryerson 43-33 in the contest.

Saturday afternoon's game against Waterloo's Warriors appeared to be a much more difficult contest because the Gaels had played the night before and the Waterloo club was supposedly better organized and better coached than Ryerson. The first period of the contest was ample proof of that and ended in a 1-1 deadlock with Gaels' Bill White and Warriors' Bill Carr trading goals. White banged in a rebound after Gaels' Dave Nutthal had blasted a shot at goalie Doug Snoody. The Warrior's fate may have been decided then as Snoody suffered a hamstring when trying to stop the shot and had to be carried off the ice on a stretcher.

The injury forced backup man Murray Childs into the cage and the Gaels greeted him with five straight goals in the first 11 minutes of the period as the Warriors' defense broke down under Queen's tremendous forechecking. Morris Mott and John Smith scored twice in the period while Colin Loudon, Murray Douglas and Bruce Cameron added the others. Mott's two goals were the result of some fine individual effort. The first came as he stole the puck from a Warriors' defenseman, deked the other rear guard and drilled a shot between Childs' legs to put Queen's ahead 2-1. His other marker came on a great wrist shot from 30 feet out that was mesmorized by the drive.

The Gaels headed into the third peiod with an 8-3 lead and the outcome was never in doubt. Stan Galt's goal early in the third period completed the Gaels' scoring. Waterloo goals were scored by Bill Carr, Jim Morris, with two and Roger Kropf. Queen's outshot the Warriors 40-29.

The Gael's defense of Graham Closs, Steve Gross, Mike Lynch and Bob Smith were outstanding in both weekend games and goalie Clyde Harris gave the club clutch netminding when they needed it. Morris Mott had a fantastic weekend scoring two goals and 8 assists to lead all Gaels' scorers. Colin Loudon and Murray Douglas also had fine games while John Smith continues to be the Gaels' best two-way performer.

But it was team play which gave the Gaels' their victories. An example of this team play was Bruce Cameron's power play goal in the second period which put the Gaels in front 4-1. Mott took the puck behind the Queen's goal, passed up ice to Loudon who relayed the puck to Douglas at the Warriors' blueline. Douglas, in turn flipped the puck to Cameron who drilled a sizzling wrist shot to beat Childs. If the Gaels continue to play this well and play as a team (like they did this weekend), they will be extremely difficult to beat. The Gaels' next contest is this Saturday at the Harty arena at 2 p.m. vs. the powerful Laurentian squad. See you there!!!

Waterpolo wins, loses

Queen's emerged from the first of three OUAA Round-robin Waterpolo meets with a split Saturday, dumping York 7-3 before bowing to a powerful U. of T. squad 6-3. Toronto trounced York 13-3 in the other match. Archie Nesbitt netted four goals for the Gaels against York, with Steve Patterson adding two and captain Gord Hurd one.

The final match, between Queen's and Toronto, lived up to earlier expectations. The Gaels checked the powerful Blue squad very tightly, stopping their fast swimmers from reaching the rhythm that had destroyed York.

Queen's opened the scoring with a goal from Chelbo in the first period and extended their lead on a long hard drive by Nesbitt early in the second before Toronto replied with a beautiful lob shot off a fast break. The half-time score was 2-1 for the Gaels.

U. of T., with a pair of National Team players in the lineup, had not been expecting the close game that Queen's was forcing upon them. However, the depth and experience on the T.O. squad began to tell in the second half.

Toronto scored five unanswered goals three in the third and two in the fourth period, before Patterson was able to net a backhand shot to make the final count 6-3.

The Gaels' performance was even more than encouraging,given that three of their key players did not make the trip. Two Toronto goals came with Queen's shorthanded, and a third resulted from a penalty.

Rookie David Kay played an outstanding defensive game while Gord Hurd and Steve Patterson completely dominated their mid-bath positions. Next week the same teams meet at U. of T. for the second stageof the OUAA competition. With a full squad, the Gaels may well be able to trounce the traditionally - strong Varsity team.

The third round-robin tournament and the league finals are scheduled for the Queen's pool November 26 and 27.

Doug Fisher: On the hot Seat

By BRUCE MCGILL

On Thursday November 11th in Stirling Hall P.H.E.S.A. presented Mr. Douglas Fisher, columnist for the Toronto Sun, CTV commentator and founding director of Canadian National Coaches Association in a hot seat seminar to a small but select audience.

Mr. Fisher introduced himself as a sports enthusiast with a good knowledge of sports sociology and history gained from his work a few years back in the Queen's Douglas Library. He has promoted sport in Canada through a variety of means, being a founding director of Hockey Canada and also a ghost writer of the Task Force Report on Sport, and a supporter of the Fitness and Amateur Sport Act.

The Canadian National Coaches Associaton came about primarily through the enthusiasm and research of Lloyd Percival and the political influence of Mr. Fisher. Their combined efforts convinced Health and Welfare Minister John Munroe to give them the go ahead to appoint a director and board. The aims of the Association, Mr. Fisher said, were to develop Canadian coaches in greater numbers, to compile a body of coaching knowledge and to develop standards of excellence in the field. The association will be financed from three equal sources, the federal government, the Canadian Olympic Trust and private donations.

Mr. Fisher lamented the attitude of many Canadian politicians to sport and blamed this attitude for retarding the growth of sports programmes and facilities across the country. He feels that Canada should have moved ahead in sports development and says that if there is one thing he has learned in politics it is not to do any more research or form any more committees. We have waited too long already.

Mr. Fisher is optimistic about the future of the association and feels the enthusiasm for the '76 Olympic Games in Montreal will generate interest and provide impetus for the Association and Canadian sports in general.

At 7:30 p.m. on Thursday November 18th P.H.E.S.A. will be presenting "The Role of Intercollegiate Athletics in Higher Education". This symposium will be held in the Dupuis Hall Auditorium.

Volleyball Men Split Matches

Queen's volleyballers remained tied for first place in the OUAA Eastern Division as a result of splitting two matches played in Ottawa on Saturday. The Gaels lost a three-hour heartbreaker to U. of O. in the first match, in an unusual best-of-five series. The scores were 15-10, 3-15, 15-10, 14-16, and 8-15, with the Gaels running out of gas towards the end.

In the other contest, the Gaels easily outclassed Carleton 15-4, 15-4, 15-5. Unfortunately, there were several complaints about the quality and quantity of refereeing in these matches, as well as the five-game format. The Gaels' next outing will be this coming Saturday at Carleton; if the Gaels can sweep this meet, they will be in sole possession of first place.

'Can you help?'

Poverty Report:

OTTAWA - Taxpayers and poor people alike are so outraged at existing welfare measures that they will force the Trudeau government to begin implementing a guaranteed annual income plan as a replacement, the chairman of the Senate committee on poverty said Wednesday night.

Senator David Croll, a Toronto Liberal, predicted a swell of popular support for his committee's recommendation for a guaranteed income scheme to lift an estimated 5,000,000 Canadians out of poverty.

The committee, in a 224-page report released yesterday, urged the implementation of a guaranteed income and a package of other social service reforms that it said could wipe out poverty in Canada by the end of the 1970s.

Under the committee's scheme a family of four, for example, would be guaranteed an income of $3,500 a year. As the plan was phased in - it would replace family and youth allowances and old-age security payments - this figure would be raised to $5,000, the amount the committee says a man, his wife and two children need to live decently and stay out of poverty.

Within hours of the report's release, both Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and Welfare Minister John Munro said the proposals are too costly and Canada can't afford the price of elminiating poverty in the near future.

CANADA

OTTAWA - Toronto lawyer Mabel M. Van Camp has been named as the first woman to be appointed to the Ontario Supreme Court.

OTTAWA - The Company of Young Canadians is initiating 44 new projects across Canada and will hire an additional 82 volunteers.

The 44 additional projects will bring the number the CYC is involved in to 92.

Gray Report:

A government agency should be formed to screen activities of foreign firms and have the power to block foreign investment.

Rules requiring majority Canadian control would be too costly and may not be beneficial.

The high degree of foreign control of Canadian business activity has led to an industrial structure which largely reflects the growth priorities of foreign corporations.

Foreign-controlled firms now constitute a high proportion of Canadian corporate activity, concentrated in resource exploitation and manufacturing.

Foreign takeovers often result in no significant growth in Canadian employment, nor do they necessarily release funds to be used elsewhere in Canada to create jobs.

The heavy Canadian dependence on foreign financial institutions is greater than it need be and tends to draw foreign investment where economics often do not require it.

During 1969, about 30 per cent of total Canadian imports were in the form of transactions between two companies in a multi national corporation.

As Premier William Davis met his four senior Cabinet Ministers in Muskoka earlier this week to begin charting the course of their Government, a score or so of the province's top Conservatives were called to a Toronto hotel room and told to start getting ready for the next election.

The guests were told that both the Government and the party had been in very poor shape before the election and the party was very lucky to make the substantial gains it did.

OTTAWA - External Affairs Minister Sharp indicated yesterday that Washington wants to include access to Canadian oil and gas resources in bargaining over removal of the U.S. surcharge on imports.

"It is my understanding," Mr. Sharp said in the Commons yesterday, "that a U.S. official would like to come up to Canada and talk to us about the matter."

Until yesterday, there had been no clear indication that the United States wanted to include oil and gas in the bargaining over the conditions on which Washington would be willing to abandon the surtax.

In past energy discussions, Canada has used the U.S. demand for Canadian natural gas as a lever to open the U.S. market to Canadian oil exports.

But the Trudeau Government has shied away from the continental energy resource pool first proposed by a Cabinet-level advisory committee to President Richard Nixon.

The committee proposed a pool of all energy resources, including oil, gas, coal, hydro-electric power, uranium and guaranteed access across Canada to U.S. energy resources in Alaska.

Energy Minister J. J. Greene initially reacted favorably to the proposal in an enthusiastic Washington press conference at which he scoffed at economic nationalism.

But in the face of a strong backlash in Canada, he revsered his position and said any bargaining between the two countries on energy matters should be done on an item-by-item basis, rather than on the basis of a package deal.

Intervention by the office of Premier William Davis in a rezoning application this spring helped a major Brampton developer bypass the objections of the provincial Government's Community Planning Branch and gain speedy approval at the Ontario Municipal Board.

Many of the usual planning procedures were bypassed as approval was given to turn the Shoppers' World commercial complex on the southern outskirts of Brampton into a major regional shopping centre. The plans were approved by the Ontario Municipal Board without a hearing the same day as the board received the relevant documents.

This was made possible when Brampton's Mayor J. E. Archdekin personally persuaded the only resident who was objecting to the development to withdraw her opposition.

CALGARY - Non-returnable soft drink containes will be banned in Alberta Jan. 1, 1973, the Progressive Conservative government announced yesterday.

Similar legislation has been in effect in British Columbia since Jan. 1 of this year.

OTTAWA - Federal officials, studying the conditions under which columnist Ron Haggart was refused employment at the Toronto Daily Star, have concluded there was no violation of the Bill of Rights, Justice Minister John Turner told the Commons Friday.

Mr. Turner told John Diefenbaker (PC, Prince Albert) that contracts and the negotiating of contracts fall under provincial jurisdiction.

He said Mr. Haggart, a former Toronto Telegram columnist whose offer of employment with the Star was withdrawn after he wrote an article for a New Democratic Party publication, still has recourse in the courts.

OTTAWA - Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau announced Friday the appointment to the Senate of Renaude Lapointe, well known former Montreal reporter and editorial writer.

In 1965, Miss Lapointe, who will be 60 in January became the first woman to be appointed to the editorial board of the Montreal daily La Presse. She will sit as a Liberal.

THE WORLD

He had lived through a three-month ordeal, and when the Very Rev. Gonville Aubie ffrench-Beytagh, the Anglican Dean of Johannesburg, emerged from a Pretoria courtroom last week, his supporters were there to cheer him on. They sang "Onward Christian Soldiers," and a casual passerby might have thought that the dean had won his fight. But, in fact, ffrench-Beytagh had just been sentenced to five years in jail for terrorist acts against the South African Government.

The prosecutor had failed conspicuously to prove the white-haired cleric, 59, had advocated violent revolution and sabotage. But ffrench-Beytagh was convicted of encouraging anti-apartheid sentiment and of giving aid to the relatives of political prisoners Acknowledging the dean's prestige, the judge imposed the lightest sentence possible under the draconian Terrorism Act, and released him on $14,000 bail pending appeal. The verdict was meant as a warning to other militant churchmen, but it may only increase opposition to the racist policies of Prime Minister John Vorster. "The dean was the accused," editorialized The London Daily Mail, "but as usual it is apartheid that has been found guility."

DUBLIN - Prime Minister Jack Lynch won narrow parliamentary backing Friday for his policy of seeking to reunite Ireland by peaceful means alone. The Dail rejected, 72 to 69, a motion of no confidence in his government.

The vote climazed a two-day debate in Parliament. Mr. Lynch's victory was expected after he had beaten down attacks on his policy from within the ruling Fianna Fail party at a caucus on Tuesday. The Fianna Fail holds exactly half of the 144 seats in the Dail.

WASHINGTON - President Richard Nixon reported Friday that the U.S. offensive combat role in Vietnam has ended and announced that he will increase the U.S. troop withdrawal rate by more than a third in December and January.

Holding an unannounced news conference in the White House press centre, Mr. Nixon disclosed that during the next two months the authorized ceiling for U.S. forces in South Vietnam will be cut by 45,000 to 139,000.

More than half the forces will be brought home before Christmas.

LONDON - Britain and France formally embarked Wednesday on a new and closer relationship now that Britain is about to enter the European Common Market.

The Queen will visit France next May at the invitation of President Georges Pompidou.

At the same time, the two countries made a joint declaration pledging a series of steps to ensure that their "long and deep rooted friendship" will flourish in their new role as fellow members of the European Economic Community.

AMS Amchitka money

..(The letters which follow were duplicated and distributed at Monday night's AMS executive meeting.)

David Steer

Chris Dundas

"I am awaiting your reply"

The President
Alma Mater Society
Queen's University, Kingston
Dear Sir:

The Friday issue of The Queen's Journal (vol. XCIX No. 19, page 2) stated that a sum of AMS money had been spent to further the protests against the United States nuclear experiment on Amchitka Island. If it is true that the money was spent, I would appreciate it if you could inform me of the amount involved and the rationale used in justifying the expenditure.

The attacks against the U.S. government over the experiment appearing in The Queen's Journal do not represent the reasoned arguments one expects from a university community, and I feel the AMS had no business supporting such foolishness.

I am awaiting your reply.

Yours truly,
DAVID STEER
Science 72

"I regret to hear"

Mr. David Steer
Kingston, Ontario
Dear Mr. Steer:

Your letter of November 6 concerning the expenditure of AMS money on the Amchitka issue was discussed in the last meeting of inner council on Sunday, November 7. In direct reply to the questions you raised, the answers are the following:

a. $50.20 of AMS money was spent.

b. Of that sum, $26.00 came from a budget authorized by outer council for publicizing the debate surrounding the underground test. The remainder was authorized by the external affairs commission as direct advertisement of a planned demonstration. In the latter case, I felt that the students of Queen's should be aware that such a demonstration was taking place and whether or not they chose to participate was very much a personal decision.

Unlike other university student governments, the AMS as such did not make a policy statement in the debate. It simply was a case of facilitating a forum for what many people (and I hesitate to call them "fools") thought was a very controversial issue.

I regret to hear that you consider such AMS activity as "foolishness", but I'm sure that as one who appreciates reasoned arguments you must also realize the importance of the university's critical role in society.

If you still believe that AMS money has been unwisely spent this past year, then I suggest that you voice your criticism at our upcoming general meeting scheduled for December 7, 1971.

Sincerely yours,
CHRIS DUNDAS
External Affairs Commissioner
Alma Mater Society

More open hours asked

Women in residence voted Tuesday in favour of extending open hours to include weekday evenings.

(Results of yesterday's coed residence referendum were not available at press time.)

Of the 880 women who voted, 634 favoured extending the present "open weekends" (noon Friday to midnight Sunday) to add open hours from 5 p.m. to 11 p.m. every day.

Open hours are the times during which women may have male guests in their rooms.

AMS battles through tough meeting

by Chris Redmond

The Alma Mater Society executive -- the student government -- discussed publications and did some routine business Monday night in a meeting which at least two council veterans said afterwards was the worst AMS session they had ever seen.

Though the council left almost half its agenda untouched, several major items of business were settled: AMS court appointments, a pay raise for constables, and policy on athletic training table. But much of the meeting was spent in procedural confusion and disjointed questions, plus an argument about meeting times, texts of motions, the order of business and the quality of the annual budget.

Seventeen of the evening's questions were raised by arts and science rep Barbara Slater.

It was during the argument about meeting times that senior AMS officers became most impatient. "If we want to hold our meetings on Tuesdays, can't we decide without all these fucking rules?" cried president Patrick Riley.

And vice-president Victor Bradley went a step further a few minutes later when he angrily dropped a note in front of Riley, called out, "I'd like that announcement made right now, Mr Speaker," and walked from the room.

"Can't we talk about this, Victor?" Riley called after him, and ran out after him. The meeting dissolved in confusion, faced with the prospect of going on without Bradley and aware that he was on the brink of resignation.

A meeting to adjourn was narrowly defeated and the meeting went on with routine business until Riley and Bradley returned ten minutes later.

That return, in fact, produced the biggest laugh of the evening, coming moments after the meeting moved into closed session to talk about appointments to the AMS court.

"Can we have the agreement of the council," a voice came' "that if the president and the vice-president decide to return, they may be admitted?"

In closed session, the council discussed and finally approved appointments to the court: law student Richard Lane as chief justice, and students Smirle Forsyth (politics), Susan Hall (psychology), Hildi Adelhelm (politics), and Jim Young (law) as junior justices.

Miss Adelhelm had previously been criticized as a potential court member because she has been an AMS constable. But internal affairs commissioner Jim Richardson, who proposed the appointments, said she had not been a constable at any event from which a case is pending before the court.

With only brief debate, the council agreed to raise the wages paid to AMS constables, with the minimum hourly wage going from $1.40 to $1.65 and the maximum from $1.70 to $1.80.

This would bring constable payments in line with minimum wage laws, vice-president Bradley pointed out.

During the weekend a petition was circulating among constables, asking for the raise, which was tabled at the previous council meeting October 25.

And, after argument about possible precedents and other dangers, the AMS agreed to pay $565 to Queen's Entertainment Agency manager David Merrick to cover damage to his car for which his insurance did not pay.

Merrick's car was virtually destroyed when it went off the road in a blinding snowstorm January 29, while Merrick was bringing performer David Rea to Kingston to play in the Snowball concert.

Other AMS action during Monday's meeting

Publications

The AMS "theme meeting" discussion of campus publications was basically a question-and-answer session with representatives of several media on hand to talk with council members.

The Journal was questioned mostly on minor points, but several members asked its staff to justify this year's policy of publishing three issues per week (last year it was twice weekly, Tuesday and Friday).

Co-editor Bill Johnston told the meeting the thrice-weekly experiment probably would continue. He said its purpose is to make news coverage more immediate and to provide students with smaller, more readable papers rather than large ones in which not so much is read.

Arts and science president Marv Bloos suggested the Journal should carry notices of employers who will be conducting interviews on campus; he was contradicted by AMS vice-president Victor Bradley, who said The Journal is a newspaper rather than a mere bulletin board, and added that the engineering society's paper, Golden Words, carries such notices every week.

Golden Words was discussed again after its co-editor, Norm Horofker, said the money which pays for one of The Journal's three issues each week should be given to Golden Words instead. At present GW revenue comes from the engineering society and from advertising; the paper will probably apply for an AMS grant, Horofker said.

"I really think you're not functioning as a newspaper," Bradley told Horofker, adding that Golden Words is too engineering-oriented.

Replying to a question, Journal managing editor John Solman said the printing of The Journal is done by St. Lawrence Printing Co., Ltd. of Prescott, Ontario. He said the presswork on the paper -- one stage in the printing process -- is subcontracted by St. Lawrence to a firm in Ogdensburg, New York.

Services commissioner Glenn Hall, who is responsible to the council for publications, said this system might be called "hypocrisy" in light of the Journal's pro-Canada editorial policy.

Arts and science rep Kathy McSweeney disagreed: "It's cheaper and you get a better copy" and she said political considerations were irrelevant.

"I'm an American," said Miss McSweeney, who comes from Scarsdale, New York.

Solman told the meeting that wherever the paper is printed, it would be with an American printing press. "You can't escape that." And, he said, wherever it is printed, Canadian newsprint would be used.

"You can't escape that either," called out co-managing editor Charles Schwier, whose home is Saint Louis, Missouri.

Artsci rep Barbara Slater asked whether sweven, the Journal's magazine, would be published this year, and was told that it was appearing soon under a new name.

Training table

Almost without debate, the council passed a motion strongly recommending that Queen's abolish training table -- the system by which intercollegiate athletes, chiefly in the major men's sports, get free meals during practice seasons.

The recommendation was discussed at the October 25 meeting but left in a procedural limbo at that time.

It passed narrowly, 13 to 11, and goes to the university council on athletics, the body which has jurisdiction over the entire athletic budget and programme, including the $10,000 spent each year on training table.

One council member, engineering rep Gord Hurd, spoke against the motion, pointing out that the $12 increase which raised the per-student athletic fee to $20 two years ago made it possible to provide training table food to athletes in minor sports -- including swimming, in which Hurd participates -- as well as in football.

Students at Queen's support intercollegiate athletics, Hurd declared. He mentioned the basic arguments in favour of training table: that it improves team spirit and compensates athletes for the time they spend at practices.

The only speaker in favour of the motion was AMS president Patrick Riley, who (together with vice-president Victor Bradley) had sponsored it. He pointed out that students who represent and benefit the university in such fields as journalism, drama and government do not have training table privileges and that the system unduly favours athletes.

Riley also pointed out the exception specified in his motion: that the university might well continue to pay for meals where athletes must attend practice at meal hours and therefore miss meals for which they have already paid, such as if they live in residence.

Who's Where

The AMS executive decided that as a general principle the student listings in Who's Where should not be sold or given away for commercial purposes.

They reversed an earlier decision by inner council (the AMS cabinet) to let Bob Gulyas, Kingston agent for Canadian Premier Life Insurance Company, use the book to line up sales prospects.

But there was less unanimity about joining in a plan, organized by the Association of Student Councils, of which Queen's is a member, to centralize student listings, and let commercial mailers negotiate for tens of thousands of names from universities across Canada.

AMS president Patrick Riley told the council Queen's would be able to say yes or no to use of the Queen's names every time a potential purchaser tried to buy the list from AOSC.

And vice-president Victor Bradley pointed out that whether or not Queen's takes part in that plan, mailers such as Time Incorporated, oil companies and insurance companies do obtain the list every year by buying it under-the-counter from a student.

Since the list goes to them anyway, and since the AMS is always blamed, the AMS might as well benefit financially by selling the list, Bradley said.

The council voted to join in the AOSC system of pooling lists, but not to allow the Queen's names to be generally sold.

The trickle down your armpits.

Some things make us nervous.

Some things turn us into a kind of stranger to ourselves. The old dryness of the mouth sets in. The sweat starts down.

How about those job interviews, where all of a sudden you've got to stand out very clearly from the herd? Inside half an hour you've got to establish yourself to a world you never made and may not even like.

Does the prospect make you just a little nervous? No? You're lucky.

Oh, it does? Join the club. It gets us all, even those over thirty.

You could write a book about being nervous about interviews. As a matter of fact, we have written a book. A little one: "How to separate yourself from the herd". It's packed with practical tips on how to go to an interview on your own terms.

We wrote it because we've been there. Without any modesty whatsoever we can tell you we're a company whose very life depends on our skill at coming face to face with strangers.

Our little book is tucked into a bigger one: The Employment Opportunities Handbook, a kind of dictionary of the companies who are looking. This brand new handbook is yours for the asking at the placement office.

"How to separate yourself from the herd" won't work any magic between now and your first interview.

But it just might help.

Commerce must take lead, meeting told

By Bob Mutrie

"The Commerce Society must take the initiative in distinguishing our faculty on campus," commerce president Bill DeLucia said Monday night, addressing about thirty commerce students at the year's first general meeting of the Commerce Society.

There was much discussion of the $878 loss which resulted from the two events commerce sponsored in October -- Banquet One with Judy LaMarsh, and the Barn Bash.

But DeLucia stressed that the society must look beyond the short run and plan for the future. This is the first year such events have been held, he stated, and if they are held annually they will soon become better known and more lucrative.

"A rising awareness of the Commerce faculty has been awakened," DeLucia said, "and through such events the society as a whole may be distinguished on campus."

The Commerce Society executive presented a number of proposed events for approval, most importantly the Commerce Formal and the raffle which will go with it.

The raffle is in part a fund-raising venture, but convener Bruce Rutherford also stressed its importance in building up a reputation for commerce. Tickets, priced at $1, are for a chance on a trip for two to Las Vegas -- a $1200 vacation including a week at the Sands Motel.

The Las Vegas theme extends to the formal, organizer Phil Grubbe announced. It is to be held at the Round Table restaurant, he said; the group has not yet been decided.

Commerce faculty board representative Glen Wakabayashi also reported to the meeting. He said he has been working with faculty members in an attempt to make the commerce curriculum more flexible, and to determine a direction in which commerce should be going.

Arts and science course evaluation guide coordinator proposed to the meeting that the guide include commerce courses this year. By having such an extensive guide available, Bankes said, commerce students would be helped in choosing both their commerce courses and their arts and science options.

The proposal is to be considered by a student-faculty committee and then put to a referendum of commerce students.

Wakabayashi told the meeting that a new student-faculty committee would be set up to consider professors' tenure, providing a student view when teaching abilities are judged.

De Lucia presented the report on the 1971 commerce orientation programme, saying that it was "a resounding success" and that the executive was satisfied with the level of hazing which had existed but thought academics should receive somewhat more stress.

An amendment was made to the society's constitution setting up an organization which will provide liaison between commerce students and Kingston businessmen. It is also intended to help students find jobs in Europe, provide for exchanges of business ideas, and bring speakers to the campus.

And a position was created for a student to coordinate graduating commerce students with the career planning and placement service; he will be responsible for providing information, arranging interviews, announcing job openings and publicizing lists of potential employers.

Union hearing is today

A government hearing today will decide whether the staff of the public relations department at Queen's will be certified as a union local.

The Ontario Labour Relations Board is hearing representatives of Queen's and of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, arguing over the five employees in the department, which is located at 131 Union Street.

The associate personnel director for Queen's, Harry Fleming, told The Journal that the university will oppose the union's application for certification. He said he could not legally make any comment beyond that.

CUPE filed the application to make the public relations staff a union after four of the five employees petitioned for that action. They include public relations director Larry Moore, information officer Brian Flynn, and two secretaries.

Information officer Cathy Perkins, who is in exile in the alumni association office after a staff dispute in public relations, was not invited to sign.

Moore has told The Journal that the major issue between the staff and the university is not salaries but policy.

Birth control information centre planned

By Maureen New

Few Queen's students know that birth control and abortion facilities are available to them, according to third-year arts and science student Mary Ellen Marus. And to help them, she has begun action to set up an information centre.

Miss Marus said the questionnaire recently circulated was intended to show how much Queen's students know about contraception and abortion facilities. It also asked students whether they thought it would be a good idea to set up an information centre.

About 350 of the 500 replies said yes, Miss Marus said, and about 80 people signed their names and said they were interested in helping to set up such a service. About half of these were male -- "which came as a surprise", Miss Marus added.

Those who signed their names were invited to meetings to discuss an information centre and Miss Marus said the meetings produced a good deal of enthusiasm.

She said the centre will be established at 165 University Avenue, which also houses the student affairs centre and the student counselling service; and, like them, it is to have an informal atmosphere. It will work with the student health service, she said, but students will run it. Miss Marus said the centre will be a place where people can drop in to talk, be comforted, or be given direction if they need it. Most students, she said, have little or no knowledge of the available abortion facilities. For example, few girls realize that it is quite possible to get an abortion in Kingston without great difficulty.

Dr. H. W. Greenidge of the student health service said a therapeutic abortion can be granted when the mother's health is in danger -- and this can mean either physical or mental health. In order to get an abortion a woman must have the signatures of two doctors saying that it is a medical necessity. The request is then submitted to the abortion board -- three doctors -- at a hospital.

Greenidge said most therapeutic abortions are granted for psychological reasons, and that he could recall only one recent case in which a request for a therapeutic abortion was denied.

Miss Marus said she first became interested in birth control and abortion information when she worked for Zero Population Growth.

Indian speaks tonight

Kahn-Tineta Horn, the Indian woman who began as a model and ended up as a spokesman for the Indian way of life in Canada, speaks tonight at eight o'clock in Grant Hall.

She became prominent during the protest several years ago, when Indians closed the international bridge at Cornwall, Ontario. Since then she has spoken across Canada on behalf of Indian rights.

Returning from a tour of western Canadian universities, Miss Horn will be speaking at Queen's about Indian affairs of all kinds. There will be a question period afterwards.

The event is sponsored by the AMS.

BS&T cost us $9500

The Blood, Sweat and Tears concert October 14 cost Queen's students just over $9,500 from the $3 per student concert fee.

Total expenses for the concert were $24,963.48, according to a financial statement issued by the AMS. Of this amount, $22,000 went to Blood, Sweat and Tears, including the folk-singer who performed with them; the rest paid for publicity, constables, the arena, and other expenses.

Receipts from ticket sales were $15,365.80. This left the $9,500 deficit, which was taken from the concert fee pool of $3 per student, or about $25,200 altogether.

Gunnar Myrdal

Universities are far too oral

Educational systems, in all western countries, get worse as one progresses into their more senior levels, Gunnar Myrdal contended last Friday while sipping coffee with some students in the Union. He said that a good job is done in nursery schools, a fairly good job in the primary schools, a fair job in high schools and a pretty bad job of education is done in the universities.

His two major complaints about university education are that there is too much spoonfeeding and too much oral work. He lamented the fact that methods of teaching at universities are stuck at a pre-Gutenberg level, with the major emphasis being on the spoken word, as exemplified by the lecture.

Students spend so much time attending classes that they seldom have any time to read or think, Myrdal said, and he claimed that the effect of the emphasis on lectures is even worse for the professors, since not only can they not let their minds wander, as students can, during lectures which they are giving, but, after they have repeated the same lecture three or four times, they come to believe what they are saying and then they are no good for doing research.

What the universities should be doing is showing people how to acquire knowledge. The first few weeks of one's university career could be spent learning to use the library, to find references and to quote them properly. After that, universities should let people orient themselves so that they can pursue studies which they feel relate to something which has relevance to them. The majority of their time would be spent in reading, since Myrdal believes that even bad books can help one acquire knowledge if they are read critically. Critical reading should be the point of all reading, of course, so that one can really come to grips with what is said in books.

Periodically, when they feel the need to discuss what they have been doing, students would meet with their professors, who because they no longer had to prepare class lessons, could have more time to spend working with students, Myrdal said.

Bill Davis broke the law

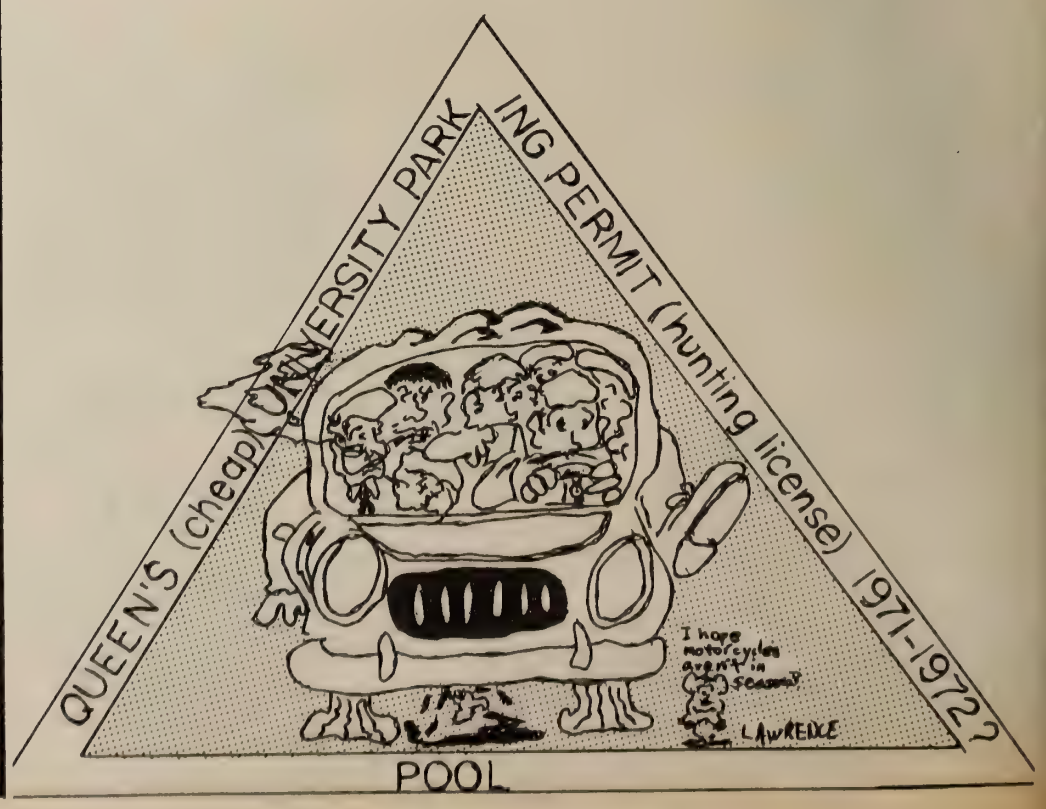
One of the minor furores of Ontario's election campaign was whether Premier Davis "compromised" the civil service by having government officials do a cost analysis of the opposition parties' platforms.

"Compromised"? That's putting it mildly. A more clearcut case of violating the law would be difficult to find.

The Ontario Public Service Act contains numerous edicts against political activity by civil servants. One says an employee of the crown shall not "associate his position in the service of the crown with any political activity".

Another says he shall not "express views in writing for distribution to the public on any matter that forms part of the platform of a provincial or federal political party." Still another states he "shall not during working hours engage in any activity for or on behalf of a provincial or federal political party".

Any one of these would seem to prevent the deliberate use of the civil service by the government for political purposes during an election campaign. Mr. Davis not only admitted that "acknowledged experts in the offices of the treasury board" had done costing of Liberal and NDP programs at his direction, he sought to justify it.



"The public could be rightfully skeptical of such an assessment," he said, "if the source of the analysis were a purely partisan one." In other words, the voters could believe the figures he was putting out because they had been compiled by the independent, impartial officials of the treasury board.

This was adding insult to injury. The voters never saw the treasury officials' cost analysis: Mr. Davis refused to release it. All they heard was the premier's version of it, which on cross-examination proved to be as phony as a three-dollar bill.

He made no allowance, for example, for "offsets" such as would occur if, as the opposition parties proposed, health care programs were financed out of general taxation instead of largely by premiums. He also included, as current expenditures, proposals for capital projects and loans funds which are not financed out of budgetary revenue, all in order to get to the astronomical figures of $2.2 billion and the statement that only by a doubling of provincial taxation could it be achieved.

If treasury board officials really prepared such an assessment, they are incompetent and ought to be fired. If, as seems more likely, they prepared something (there is no question they prepared something) which Mr. Davis perverted to his own political ends, they have been seriously maligned and the law broken - at the instigation of the premier himself.

-Harold Greer, Ottawa Citizen.

The silencing of columnist Ron Haggart

By Bill Johnston

The story of the career of Toronto newspaper columnist Ron Haggart, which reached its most recent low point in his being fired by the Toronto Star because of his political affiliations, presents an interesting and rather unflattering picture of the way that Canadian newspapers are run. For what it reveals is that newspaper publishers are quite prepared to silence columnists whose views differ from their own and to suppress news stories which might prove embarrassing to friends and business partners of the theirs.

Haggart, who until a month ago was a columnist for the Toronto Telgram, was hired by the Toronto Star to report on the activities of the Ontario government after his job with the Telegram ended when that paper ceased publication October 30. However, arrangements for Haggart's Queen's Park column were cancelled by Martin Goodman, managing editor of the Star, after it was drawn to his attention that Haggart had written an article in a New Democratic Party election campaign publication. Goodman said in a letter to Haggart that "in my view one cannot assume a partisan political stance of this kind and still achieve the elements of fairness in a Queen's Park column that the Star policy demands."

The important words, of course, are " of this kind" since it is apparent that the real objection is not to Haggart's having political views, but rather that he holds NDP views, which do not match the political stance of the Star (which supported the Liberals in the provincial election), nor are they apparently as acceptable to the Star as the Progressive Conservative views expressed by Dalton Camp in his regular Star column.

But the important aspects of this case go deeper than just a difference of political viewpoint. First, there is the fact that the column was killed on the basis of a prejudgement of what type of things Haggart would write, and secondly and more importantly, is the human rights question relating to the right of a person to practice his profession regardless of his political beliefs.

Unfortunately for Ron Haggart, and unfortunately for the newspaper reading public of Toronto, this is not the first time that a Haggart column has been silenced, and not even the first time by the Star. Haggart wrote a regular city hall column for the Star between October, 1958 and August, 1967, during a period when the Star was trying to transform its image from that of a working-class paper to that of a middle-class, liberal paper. Haggart was hired largely to fit into this liberal image, as he wrote a muck-raking column which disclosed many shady dealings of the city council and the city businessmen, a column which Haggart himself said appealed to liberal minded people who felt that simply by reading his column, they were doing something good. As an example of the type of things he got into, in 1964 he discovered and then wrote about a city council plan to expropriate a lane-way for construction of the Toronto-Dominion building, at a time when Toronto-Dominion had assets of over $2.2 billion. Partly as a result of his column, T-D was forced to buy the lane-way instead.

Such was the nature of his column that Haggart had, by 1967, become a considerable burden to a fair number of people such as four different mayors, numerous land developers and the T. Eaton Co. By then, the Star had successfully completed the liberalizing of its image, and Haggart noted "when papers are successful, it's harder to tolerate people within them who are a pain in the ass." When the Star's competitor, the Telegram, launched its Action Line column that fall, (a column that deals with and solves basically the small problems of citizens confounded by some government or business bureaucracy, the Star decided to copy the idea, relieving Haggart of his duties as a columnist and putting him in charge of their own Action Line, imaginatively called Help Wanted. That move temporarily silenced what another writer, Jack Batten, has called "the liberal conscience of the city" of Toronto.

Haggart left Help Wanted fairly shortly thereafter and began doing a column for the Toronto Telegram which was similar to his Star column, although John Bassett, the Telegram's publisher, refused to let Haggart write anything about the Eaton family, which provided Bassett with financial backing when he bought the Telegram and which had been one of Haggart's favourite targets when he was with the Star. (Bassett once killed a column Haggart wrote in which he discussed the firing of nearly 200 maintenance employees by the T. Eaton Co. and their subsequent rehiring at lower pay by a private company that had a contract to do Eaton's maintenance work.) Bassett gave Haggart a free hand on all other subjects, including the Argos football club and Maple Leaf Gardens, in which Bassett had financial involvement, as well as the Telegram itself.

This fall, however, Haggart was muzzled again as Bassett cancelled his five-day-a-week column on October 8 because Bassett did not want Haggart to write about the closing of the Telegram, Haggart, as a member of the Newspaper Guild's bargaining committee, had been allowed to see the Telegram's financial accounts, and Bassett apparently did not want this information to reach the public. While Haggart felt that "the (Telegram's) losses were not as serious as those who wanted to kill the paper would make out," he has also indicated that he had no secrets about the Telegram's management and their decision to close.

While the fact that a columnist has been silenced three different times (at least) is deplorable in itself, it is particularly sad in the case of Haggart who almost alone of the Toronto columnists regularly exposed many of the ways in which public officials have attempted to bilk the public. Scott Young, writing in the Globe and Mail, described Haggart as something of an institution in Toronto and praised him for his battles on behalf of the taxpayer, the oppressed, the gypped, and the ordinary rank and file of humanity, and Jack Batten noted after Haggart's column ended with the Star in 1967 that the death of Haggart's column reflected the "sad decline in purpose in all Canadian dailies, especially in the largest and by tradition the most daring Canadian daily of them all."

If Batten was worried about the Canadian press then, his dismay must know no bounds now, given what has happened to Haggart since 1967 and given the fact that the Star now has the Toronto afternoon completely to itself since the death of the Telegram, (about which more later.)

A quarter million and then some

The excuse offered [illegible] the Ontario Government for giving a $500,000 cleaning contract to a company whose price was higher than the others is so patently fragile as to be unbelievable.

For the next two and-a-half years, an American-owned company called Consolidated Maintenance Services Ltd. will be cleaning Ontario Place, for which it will receive $446,030 plus many thousands in extra-service charges.

This price happens to be 120 per cent more than the lowest bid received which came from a Canadian-owned company that operates its cleaning and janitorial-service [illegible] other continents.

Among the five companies which bid lower than Consolidated (all of them Canadian-owned) were two companies which cleaned Expo 67 — and there was hardly a visitor to Expo who did not comment on its remarkable orderliness and cleanliness.

The Government's explanation is that its ex[illegible] in the department of public works est[illegible]d "50" [illegible]ld be needed (but [illegible] adv[illegible]

He said THAT?

The champion news twisters and suppressors are in the Maritimes, as this example from the Davey Commission report on the Mass Media indicates:

"One of The Mysterious East's contributing editors, Dr. Donald Cameron, supplied another example. When Laurier LaPierre, in October, 1969, addressed a student gathering outside Moncton, he devoted nearly all his speech to the shortcomings of capitalism, the press, and K. C. Irving, and to a plea for "decentralized socialism" as a solution to the problems of the Maritimes. En passant, Dr. LaPierre also mentioned that he was against Maritime union, since he favoured less, not more, centralization. According to Dr. Cameron, the New Brunswick dailies covered the story this way:

On Monday, October 27, the Moncton Times headlined its front-page story MARITIME UNION "WASTE OF TIME AND RESOURCES."

It devoted twenty column-inches to LaPierre's speech in a story labelled "Staff Special." Of those twenty inches, one and a quarter was devoted to the attack on Irving. Two inches covered the comments on the press. The rest of the article was devoted to Maritime union and economic development, but the economic development was made to appear as simply a variant of the existing economic system, and the word "socialism" did not appear anywhere in the article.

The Saint-John Telegraph-Journal clipped the inessential last paragraph from the story, and instead of calling LaPierre simply "the head" of McGill's French-Canadian Studies programme it called him "the articulate head." Otherwise the Telegraph-Journal story was, word for word, identical with the Moncton Times story. Naturally the Moncton evening paper, the Transcript, followed its morning sister. So did the Evening Times-Globe in Saint John. And the Fredericton Wiener picked up the Telegraph-Journal story complete. So far as any New Brunswick reader could tell, LaPierre simply came down from Montreal to tell us what to do about Maritime union. Oh, these cheeky bastards from central Canada!

What is even more puzzling, however, is the fact that the story printed by the Irving press contains a good deal that is not in the transcript. Why? Very simple, because the reporter who wrote the Times story did not hear Mr. LaPierre. Instead he relied on some mimeographed notes which Mr. LaPierre passed out in advance. When he actually spoke, Mr. LaPierre threw away the notes and delivered a rousing committed speech. But the reporters had taken the handout and left - with one exception. The one exception, the one New Brunswick daily to report the story reasonably accurately, the one daily to mention socialism, to quote the vigorous criticism of the Irving empire, was the one daily in the province not owned by Mr. Irving: I mean, of course, L'Evangeline, the Moncton French-language daily."

It's just an internal matter, anyway

Dailies in the smaller towns and cities are even more sensitive than those in big cities about printing information which might upset advertisers or friends of the publisher, and frequently the issues which are hushed up are things no more serious than strikes or even comparative-price shopping columns. (Women's pages can wax righteous over consumerism, but let's not mention that it is cheaper to shop at one store than another.)

A more concrete example occurred in Peterborough when the Examiner there almost ignored a strike at the Examiner of the members of the American Newspaper Guild in December of 1968, a strike which was one of the biggest local news stories of the year. Publisher and general manager of the Examiner, William Garner, explained this omission: "If we gave day-to-day coverage of the strike, of our side of it, it could be termed biased." Perhaps, but so could omitting the story.

Freshette plans French Cub group

Queen's freshette Ginette Rivard is organizing a cub scout pack for the French-speaking boys of Kingston.

Miss Rivard has been involved with French cub packs in Toronto, her home, for the past three years. She told The Journal that she hopes to start a similar group in Kingston because cub scouts are "a very worthwhile organization".

She said the French pack would be similar to any other cub scout pack except that all its activities would be in French. (Cub scouts, the junior branch of boy scouts, is for boys aged 7 to 12).

Miss Rivard said there are about 3400 French-speaking people in Kingston. She is working in cooperation with the Champlain Club, which is a French service club in Kingston, and with the Roman Catholic parish of St. Francois d'Assise.

At present, she said, she is concentrating on trying to interest as many French boys as possible in the organization.

She is organizing the venture alone so far, she said, but would welcome some help in the actual running of the pack.

The cub motto in French is "De notre mieux" ("Of our best"), Miss Rivard said. Nobody on The Journal staff could remember the English version.

Hoechst thinks ahead

Moving with the Times

This year Canadian Hoechst marks its eighteenth year of growth in Canada by moving into new custom-built Montreal headquarters. The Canadian expansion has been closely linked to the worldwide development of Hoechst, which is now among the world's top five chemical companies, with worldwide sales that last year totalled approximately 3.5 billion dollars.

In Canada, sales have almost doubled in the past three years. The new St. Laurent head office and warehouse buildings will provide space for a 100% increase in the company's head office staff, and have been designed for expansion to accomodate increased Canadian production.

Research: Window to the Future

Today's research creates the products of tomorrow. One-third of Hoechst's current sales come from products which did not exist 10 years ago. And with worldwide sales approximating close to 3.5 billion dollars last year, Hoechst spent close to 100 million in pure research, and on laboratory buildings and equipment. The results of this investment decide Hoechst's position in future markets, including Canada.

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organization, Canadian Hoechst has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

This new building is just one of the more visible indications of Canadian Hoechst Limited's continuing investment in Canada.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the Company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. Hoechst likes it that way. So do their customers, here and around the world. Hoechst thinks ahead.

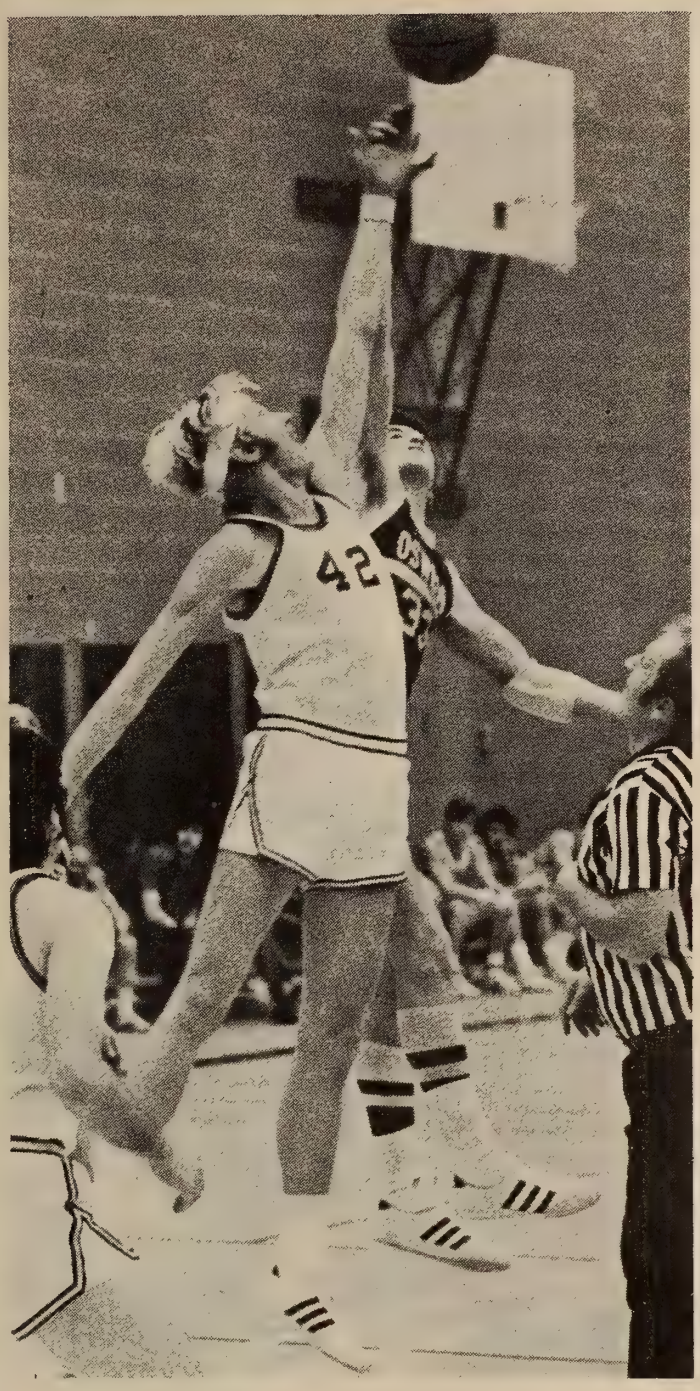
Gaels show promise in close defeat



When you put an inexperienced team with three new starters up against a bigger, older squad that ranked nationally last year, you expect to get beaten, right? The only question is by how much. Last Saturday the B-Ball Gaels met a perenially-tough Loyola squad in their second exhibition match, and the answer was, not by much.

The Warriors came from behind in the fourth quarter to eke out a 62-54 victory after the Gaels had led by as much as eight points in the third period. The lack of experience began to show when Loyola went to a tough full-court press, preventing the Gales from bringing the ball upcourt, and running into the lead. Queen's couldn't come back, and that was the ball game.

There were many reasons for encouragement, especially on defense. The Gaels clung to their larger opponents like flies, while forwards Rob Smart and Andy Daugulis were able to crash the boards at both ends. Centreman Paul Howard up against a taller (6'7") and much heavier (250 lbs.) opponent, picked off 18 rebounds but managed only 7 points.

This provides the key to the Gaels' downfall: they didn't take enough shots. Queen's managed only 47 attempts from the floor, while Loyola tossed up 80-odd shots. And Daugulis, with 21 points, was the only consistent threat the Gaels had.

This weekend the Gaels will make a two-game road trip through T.O., playing York Friday night (8:00 p.m.) and Ryerson Saturday afternoon (2:00 p.m.). York is a big, physical team that likes to crash the boards, while Ryerson is a small, fast running squad that will press anywhere, any time. Guards Peter Gordon and Dave Smith played well against Loyola, but the Gaels will have to prove that they can break presses as a team to win this year.

Paul Howard-18 rebounds, 7 points

Western, U. of Alberta to meet in College bowl

For those diehards who fancy football till the snow flies, take heed. Canada's best college teams will (for a change) meet in Toronto on Saturday in the fourth College Bowl Classic. Game time is 2:00 p.m.

The protagonists, for those functional illiterates who missed the Sub, will be the Western Mustangs and the U. of A. Golden Bears.

Both teams buried their respective opponents on the weekend, the 'Stangs dumping St. Mary's 44-13 and Alberta destroying Bishop's 53-2. (I really wonder why sportswriters keep ranking teams from the QUAA and Bluenose conferences so highly.

They haven't won an outside game in years, McGill excepted. Both teams are big, with strong defense, but Alberta appears to have an edge in the air (QB Joe Petrone is a good one) while the Mustang ground game is nothing short of devastating, with McCrae and Quigly doing the work.

P.H.E.S.A. SYMPOSIUM

The role of Intercollegiate Athletics in Higher Education

Over the past few years, there has been an increasing unrest upon Canadian campuses with respect to the role of intercollegiate athletics in the university setting. Many students, faculty and administrators have questioned the priorities placed upon sport in an Academic environment.

The question has been before both the University Senate and the Alma Mater Society of Queen's in the last two years. Many questions have been settled but discussion still centres upon the intercollegiate athletics program.

Should students finance the program at all? Will recreational sports fulfill the avowed objectives of the intercollegiate program? Should the university strive for excellence in the field of athletics and hence produce Olympic athletes?

Tonight in Dupuis Auditorium at 7:30 p.m., Jon Tondeur, Bob Wright and John Hudson will speculate upon the direction, orientation and philosophies which should be a part of the athletic program.

Mr. Tondeur is chairman of the University Council of Athletics, Mr. Wright a former basketball player at Queen's and Simon Fraser and Mr. Hudson is the Executive Director of the National Coaches Association.

Mr. Hudson will take the most radical approach, if, as in all probability, he proposes his pet theory, that the intercollegiate program should be the breeding ground for our international athletes. His views will be contested by Miss Donna Gallagher, Mr. Patrick Riley and Mr. Geoff Smith.

All are welcome to attend.

Students tutor Kingston kids

More than 100 students from Queen's and from St. Lawrence College in Kingston have volunteered to work this year in a tutorial programme sponsored by First Baptist Church and Sydenham Street United Church.

The programme is, for underprivileged Kingston children "who need the advice and friendship of older young people", according to D. B. McLay, Queen's physics professor who, with Mrs. Mary Kaitting of Sydenham Street church, coordinates the programme.

Student tutors, found through the Student Volunteer Bureau, become "big brother" and "big sister" to a child. They meet for one hour a week with their young friends to help them with their schoolwork and their personal problems.

The programme has been enthusiastically received by both tutors and children. Tutors have often spent extra time with the children, McLay said, taking them to sports events or on tours and weekend trips.

When originally started in 1968, the programme included only 30 tutors and children, but the increasing number of requests for tutoring spurred expansion of the programme when the SVB became organized and could supply more tutors.

The tutorial programme is finding itself cramped by lack of staff and space, Mrs. Kaitting said. And three Kingston public schools have asked for students to come and tutor children within the school.

The programme has also branched into Brockington House, where warden Dr. M. P. Griffin is coordinating a tutorial session with eight students who live there and eight Kingston children.

The Brockington students are providing transportation for the children to the residence, where the tutorials are held in a common room.

McLay and Mrs. Kaitting both said the programme could not exist as it does without the enthusiastic help of the SVB and the students of Queen's.

Eh bien, que fait-il, ce club ?

par Louis Vadboncoeur

C'est la première fois depuis quelques années qu'un club français a été mis sur pied à Queen's. Mais quels sont les objectifs de ce club?

Premièrement le club offre à qui veut en profiter, la chance de s'exprimer en français, indépendamment que le français soit salangue maternelle.

Ce club oriente vers les réunions socials espère créer un atmosphère cordial où il peut facilement y avoir, des échanges d'idées. C'est sur ce point d'échange d'idées que j'insiste, car je crois que ce n'est que pour cet autil que l'on peut parfaire son éducation.

Plusiers personnes m'ont demandé: Eh bien qu'est ce que l'on fait dans ce club, quelles sont les activitées?".

Nous avons des réunions hebdomadaires, ayant lieu le lundi soir. Les membres viennent discuter entendre de la musique, parfais quelques uns d'entre eux apportent des instruments de musique et font valoir leurs talents d'artiste. Ces soirées sont reposantes étant à la fois divertissantes.

Samedi le 6 novembre, trois chansonniers, deux filles et un garçon, venant de Montréal ont donné un spectacle digne d'éloges. Aux qui assistaient au spectacle pourront temoigner que cette soirée était des plus agréables. Lundi prochain, le 22 novembre, aura lieu un smoker dans le second floor common room du student union, Cette soirée mettra fin a nos activitées du premier semestre.

Aprés les vacances nous tentérons d'organiser un souper "canadien français". Durant ce semestre le club présentera quelques films français que certainement interesseront plusieurs personnes. Plusieurs autres activités sont encore au stage de projet, mais certainement voiront jour avant la fin de cette année scholaire.

John Orr Room gets new use

The Union Programme Committee has announced that in future all ticket sales being held in the Union will happen in the John Orr Room, just inside the main door. Nobody is allowed to sell tickets at the foot of the main stairs or opposite the coffee shop.

Programme committee spokesman Sue Dowler said that any group which is selling tickets in the John Orr Room will be allowed to put up one poster outside it.

YES 505 - NO 266

Men strongly in favour

Women gave coed residence a majority, but not two-thirds, in Wednesday's non-binding referendum.

Men passed it easily, by 89 percent, giving the proposal to make Gordon-Brockington Houses coed 752 votes out of the 843 cast.

The most serious opposition to the proposal was in Chown Hall, which would become a men's residence if the proposal went into effect. Only 25 of the 147 women who voted there favoured the proposal.

The vote in women's residence was 505 in favour, 266 against, making the turnout there 771, or 69 percent of the residence population.

The men's turnout was 84 percent.

The quota for upper-year women in coed Gordon-Brockington apparently would be filled: 109 freshettes and 39 upper-year women said they would apply to live in the building next year.

Freshettes gave the proposal a 66 percent majority.

The vote among freshettes and among first-year women split almost identically: freshettes were 312 to 162 in favour, and the rest 193 to 104.

First-year men went 488 to 419, for 53 percent; the rest were 264 to 195, for 58 percent.

Law wants applications early

Ontario law schools are anxious to receive applications early this year because of an expected increase in the number of students applying.

Miss Mary Alice Murray, secretary of the faculty of law at Queen's, said she expects that about 2000 people will apply to law school here this year, 200 more than last year.

There are 145 openings available in law at Queen's for 1972.

The applications deadline is May 1, 1972; however, applications take until mid-July for processing, Miss Murray said.

The faculty of law is urging candidates to take early admissions tests. The law schools at Queen's, the University of Toronto, the University of Western Ontario, and York University (Osgoode Hall) require all applicants to take the Law School Admission Test as part of their standard admission requirements.

The tests will be given at Queen's December 18, February 12 and April 8.

Miss Murray said the earlier tests are recommended so that applicants can have a second chance if their first standing is poor. More information about the tests is available at the faculty of law in Macdonald Hall.

Graduates asked to name candidates

Queen's graduates -- including those who are still students in grad studies, law, meds and so on -- are entitled to nominate candidates, and then to vote, for two of the university's top governing bodies.

Two alumni representatives on the board of trustees, the body which has charge of university financial and planning matters, are to take office April 20 next year.

And sixteen representatives are needed on the university council, an advisory body; they take office March 31.

Written nominations are invited for both sets of positions. Nominations for the board of trustees are due by December 31 and should be directed to the Secretary of the University. Nominations for the council are due December 15 and should be directed to the Secretary of the University Council.

All Queen's graduates are eligible for the positions (except that faculty and staff members cannot serve on the board of trustees). Further information is available from the alumni association.

Under Attack cancels November visit

Under Attack, the television panel discussion, has cancelled its plans to tape four shows at Queen's November 25 and 26.

Three Americans and a Canadian were scheduled to appear, to be questioned by student panelists and then the Grant Hall audience.

Two of them had been named: national defence minister Donald Macdonald, and the honorable Richard Ichord, chairman of the congressional House Internal Security Committee, which is successor to the House Unamerican Activities Committee.

The other two were described only as "an automobile executive" and "the president of a multi-national corporation with operations in the third world".

The programme will not be coming to campus this fall, but may try again in the spring, according to AMS campus activities commissioner Wally Palmer.

Planning begins, course guide chairman says

John Bankes, coordinator of the 1972 course evaluation guide for the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society, told the Commerce Society on Monday that this year's guide has several advantages over the 1971 edition.

"The computer problem can be corrected," Bankes said, "we are starting earlier, and our committee is larger."

Work on last year's guide was rushed because it was not started until December, Bankes pointed out. But this year's committee has already started compiling questions, notifying departments and planning format, he added.

The committee has also grown from the one person -- editor Peter Raymont -- largely responsible for compiling last year's guide, to five people this year.

Bankes told the meeting, at which about thirty commerce students were present, that the aims of the 1972 course guide will be "to improve teaching methods at Queen's, to analyze curriculum, and to help students make a logical choice of electives".

The new guide is to be a compilation of individual department efforts, he said, so that each department can make its section closely applicable to the courses and professors it offers. And at the same time, the work load of the committee will be lessened.

Last year only one department, mathematics, varied its format from the rest.

Bankes said that again this year the guide will include comments from the professor and the departmental student council representative.

The 1971 course guide, Bankes said, cost more than $7000 and was distributed to 3400 arts and science students. The cost was thus about $2 per student, he pointed out, though the fee increase put in effect to pay for it was only $1.50 per student.

Biology comments invited

Biology students have been invited to say where they think the biology department should be headed.

The invitation comes from the principals, in announcing that biology chairman Dr. B. N. Smallman is resigning effective in 1973.

Students are asked to comment "on the present state and future prospects of the Department and the type of person they would like to see as Head".

Comments should be directed to arts and science dean Dr. Ron Watts at his office, 131 Union Street.

International Centre programme is explained by director

By Jennifer Grass

Kaspar Pold, foreign student advisor at Queen's, says that "the International Centre aims to provide a designated place where Canadians and foreign students can meet."

But, he says, "The extent to which this occurs is minimal."

A major feature of the International Centre is its sponsorship of several national and ethnic clubs in which foreign students can associate with their countrymen, cushioning the shock of coming to Canada and a new culture. Such clubs include the Indian Society, the West Indian Student Society, the Chinese Club, and the Islamic Club.

The centre also sponsors or cooperates with the World University Service, Canadian University Service Overseas, and the Student Christian Movement.

And there is the International Club, with about 250 members this year.

All the clubs provide social events, seminars, films and other occasions which are open to everyone on campus who is interested, Pold said.

The International Centre begins its activities each fall with an orientation programme for foreign students, he said, in the days before orientation week itself. This programme, Pold added, is designed to clarify for overseas students aspects of life and education in Canada which they might find confusing.

New students are offered tours around Kingston and the area, he said, and are encouraged to take part in discussion groups which cover a wide variety of subjects, including immigration rules, housing, health laws, clothing and finances.

The centre handles any difficulties students encounter, or sends them to the proper place to get help.

The International Centre is also the campus office for Canadian University Service Overseas, and Queen's was host for a regional CUSO conference late in October.

Several informational meetings will be held soon for students interested in joining CUSO, Pold said.

Chinese dazzle Queen's audience

Tuesday night Hou Chia-chang and Tang Hsien-hu of China defeated Lane Bickel and Rick Howell of Canada with apparent ease. They showed none of the exhaustion of their Canadian competitors, with Hou appearing as at ease at the end of the six matches in which he played as he did before he began.

Bickel is quoted as saying that they are probably the best in the world. The Chinese have done exceedingly well in any world class competition which they have entered, but they are not members of the International Badminton Federation and therefore are not ranked for world standing.

Hou and Tang defeated Bickel and Howell 15-4 in the doubles match, while Hou outclassed Bickel 15-6 and 15-3 in earlier singles play. They also played a match with one Canadian and one Chinese on each team.

In the opening games Tang paired with Henry Fei, who plays on the Queen's team, and Hou played with James Lim of Queen's. It was an enjoyable and spectacular display for the some 400 who came to see the matches.

Re: "A Frenchman's View of October, 1970". You took the word "derivez" to be "desirez."

Brenda

The English view of the French view

Dear Editors:

I do not understand Brenda's letter in the Journal of Nov. 12, '71. There is a deficiency in communication somewhere. Perhaps I simply refuse to understand what she is saying or perhaps she does not understand the English language enough to communicate effectively. It could be anything. So much of what she says makes no sense to me.

Somehow, she seems to be mad at the English, or frustrated with them. We don't really understand, we "cannot grasp," we are "blessed-cursed with that Anglo-Saxon singlemindedness." What is it we don't understand, what is it we cannot grasp, what are we singleminded about?

What do French-speaking people like her want?

Security for the French language, culture, and "personality" it seems. Well, the English can't give it to them. We can't sign some paper which says, "We give our permission for the French to speak French as long as they want."

It is not our permission to give, since we couldn't keep the French from speaking French even if we wanted to. And that's just it: we don't care. We don't care whether they speak French or not.

It's not really any of our business what language they speak. If we want then to remain in Canada, we will have to learn their language whatever it is, even if it is Mandarin Chinese. Do they care whether we speak English or not?

Will independence from Canada give them the security for their language and culture which they want? That's a good question. Nobody will know unless they try it. But I doubt it. It seems to me that the French community of North America has to trade with the rest of North America in order to keep its standard of living.

And the only way independence will secure its culture is through "splendid isolation" - no trade - which means poverty.

However there's another problem: What is it that is so magical about the French language that makes the people who speak it insist that they are so different from everbody else?

It seems to me that what Brenda and all the other French-speaking people who seem so frustrated with the English are saying is, "I am discontented, and my discontent is the fault of the English. However the English are incapable of knowing the nature of my discontent because I am French.

Nevertheless, I am discontented, and something had better be done about it."

Can't anyone see how illogical that is?

R.A.B.

The right to be poor

Has not every man the right to be poor? May he not protest against exploitation of labour by starving? How much of the nobility of his provocative slap to the face of society is lost with that most Christian reply of turning the other cheek by offering him a guaranteed income just sufficient to keep him alive!

Certainly his dignity is lost. I defend the right of every man to choose not to work, to be poor, and to starve.

I question the right of any man to be rich.

Thus is seems to me that the only sensible approach to the question of poverty is, not a guaranteed minimum income, but rather a guaranteed maximum income - guaranteed in the sense that no-one will exceed that upper limit.

Who in this world needs more than $50,000 a year? And who is worth more than $30,000 p.a.? I assert that anyone who is worth more than this figure is a rare genius, whose personal needs are, if anything , less than those of the common man.

Society has little need for those financial wizards whose only demonstrated ability lies in the accumulation of money, (to the detriment of others) nor of those geniuses of gracious living, whose only ability lies in extravagance.

I therefore see no reason why a system imposing a maximum income should not be employed. Of course, the poorer people will be among the first to oppose such a suggestion as it would mean the loss of one of their dearest (unattainable, and pathetic) hopes.

So too with the bourgeois. The "gilded" would not have to raise a finger to have such a suggestion laughed to scorn as undesirable, impracticable, and ridiculous.

Such are the mores of our primitive society!

A society in which men will struggle their whole lives to lay down offerings before an empty chair, a hallowed place! A society which will permit these hallowed emptinesses to horde and increase their wealth at the expense of flesh and blood.

A society that even permits these "corporations" to retard progress in social fields that might harm their financial status. All this so that the high priests of these companies might live in luxury.

Surely this is absurd?! How can our responsible '?) schools of economics continue to work in such a mediaeval system of crystal spheres?

But, as Gunnar Myrdal intimated last Friday, self interest, bound inextricably to the system, knows no bounds.

Walter G. Spunde.

WRC attitude - responsible for what?

Dear Editors,

We should like to bring to attention an incident that occurred during the open hours referendum held for members of women's residence on the evening of Tuesday, November 16. The polling station outside the lower Ban Righ dining hall failed to open with the serving of dinner as was expected in conjunction with the management of previous polls.

Our argument is not that polling booths ought to be accessible or even open during all evening meal hours. We believe, however, that a standard election procedure ought to be established and publicized. The casual attitude reflected in the supervision of this past referendum diminishes both the validity of elections controlled by the WRC, and our own confidence in this organization's manipulation of student opinions.

Will the current method of assessing student judgment in women's residence be extended to future elections, specifically those concerning the institution of co-ed residence?

Hopefully those who have accepted positions that determine the activities of the WRC will acknowledge their Council's need for more responsible management. For currently, it is only through the channels of the WRC that female residents have the opportunity to mold the structure of their environment, and if these channels continue to be blocked, student opinion will remain effectively subdued.

Celebrate

It is in an effort to protect every resident's right to have her vote recognized that we respectfully submit this letter.

Queen's students - Queen's snobs?

Dear Editors:

It is high time that university students, those at Queen's in particular, became a little less snobbish. Graduates no longer have the world at their feet when they leave these "sacred halls of learning" -- but one would never know it by encountering a group of Queen's people.

At a recent social function I had the opportunity to introduce a friend to some of the student body of our fair institution. The immediate question asked by all was, "Oh, and what faculty are you in?" When my friend mentioned the name of a local college, she was greeted with a disappointed, slightly derogatory, "Oh".

What gives these tri-coloured, "make-belief millionaires" the right to treat everyone else as second class citizens? The world is full of interesting, intelligent people who have never set foot in Grant Hall!

Speaking as a senior student who has experienced this phase of childish snobbery, I would like to suggest that we swallow our arrogance and take people for what they are as individuals, not what they are not as a group. With the present shaky status of the University in society, I don't feel that we can affort this self-indulgent delusion of superiority.

- Rod Croskery

"Engineering mentality"

Dear Editors:

David Steer exhibits classic symptoms of the Engineering "Mentality" (so-called). None of the authors of the Journal articles were "firmly convinced that the Amchitka experiment would lead to great destruction of life on earth," as far as I can determine.

In my article it is written : "We may discover that the predictions of the AEC will be borne out. I would say, in all fairness, that the odds are on that side. The possibility of an accident is only that - a possibility, not a probability. But the risk is there because the test is a gamble with the unknown."

The real issue is this: should the U.S.A. or any other country be allowed to conduct potentially disastrous experiments for such questionable purposes? In all the many writings about Amchitka, I have never seen a coherent argument as to why the tests should be conducted at all.

Exactly what information are they trying to learn from such a test? Nobody in the AEC has ever bothered to say! Mr. Steer, like many other engineers, thinks you need irrefutable arguments to stop a project, but absolutely none to go ahead with it.

As for Mr. Steer's astounding contention that the U.S.A. has "seldom if ever made such an obvious technological blunder," I suggest that he investigate the history of groups such as the AEC and the Army Corps of Engineers; the Atomic Energy Commission has made so many mistakes so often that the only thing which prevents them from being totally discredited is the soft-pedalling of these facts by the mass media.

What does Mr. Steer think of the radioactive cloud that was sent as an emissary of good will over Thunder Bay this past summer?

There is now an enormous amount of radioactive waste buried beneath Amchitka, which could escape into the oceans in 10 years or 20 years or 30 years as the result of a natural earthquake or from slow seepage. Don't count your chickens, Mr. Steer, before they hatch.

Gordon Edwards

AEC known for gross negligence

Dear Editors:

David Steer was not one to be "taken in" by the Journal's "scare headlines" during the Amchitka controversy (see his letter to the Journal, November 9).

Arguing quite logically that since AEC officials "are human beings who must inhabit this planet just as we do, they no doubt took very careful precautions" to prevent a 'calamity," he does, however, allow that the United States may have previously "made such an obvious error."

It is perhaps with a knowledge of U.S fallibility that others joined the protest. This is the same AEC whose gross negligence has cost the lives of hundreds of uranium miners, whose obstruction of public safety measures against radioactive tailings has imperiled the health of thousands.

Having first denied there was any serious danger to the miners and those living near the tailings, the AEC then blocked studies of chromosomal damage in children throughout the U.S southwest who had been exposed to "radon daughters" emanating from the tailings

It is precisely because the AEC has previously subjugated its technological judgment to economic considerations that so many have already suffered. Just as it refused to pay the price of safeguarding the public from radioactive contamination in Colorado, so it refused to scrap the expensive Cannikin operation which may ultimately do far more damage.

Because AEC operations are suspect, AEC officials stoop to illegitimate public relations campaigns in the U.S and suggest a countersubversive campaign against critics in Canada.

Needless to say, many protested out of an abhorrence of the arms race and its effects from Ypres to Hiroshima and Vietnam; others, with the hope that active protest will ultimately reverse the course of North Americ's continuing suicidal abuse of the ecosphere.

Thus while Mr. Steer kept the faith here in Kingston over the weekend, Pierre Berton took a petition signed by 130,000 protesters to the White House.

And nearby, three U.S. Supreme Court Justices ruled against Cannikin only hours before its detonation. Perhaps the gravity of the issue does deserve the serious consideration of Queen's students.

Charles H. Rannells

The Chief Librarian should be fired?

Dear Editors:

In his letter of November 12, Mr. Redmond, the Chief Librarian, defends his policy of allowing periodiclas to circulate, with the argument that as many people agree with it, as disagree.

This may be true, although most likely his sample is irrepresentative. In any case, it is a question of minimizing the total inconvenience for the student body as a whole. If periodicals were to be prevented from circulating, those who wanted to take them home would have to do their work in the library or photocopy the relevant article.

This would be a minor nuisance for them, but it can't be compared to the present situation, where several people may simultaneously want the same periodical, but none of them can obtain it.

I have spoken to students from other universities in Ontario. Every major one restricts the circulation of its periodicals.

Mr. Redmond should do likewise. Or else he should be fired, for he is not doing his job of maximizing the ease with which students can obtain material.

The timeless cycle of renewal and change . . .

by Alexander Ross (Toronto Star columnist)

I was horrified to see the first flurries of snow this week, because I haven't written my Autumn Column yet. As you know, it is mandatory for every columnist in Toronto, four times a year, to dash off prose-poem on the Changing of the Seasons. I knew about this regulation when I took my job at The Star, The requirement was carefully explained to me, along with the content regulations pertaining to Nostalgia Columns, I'm-Fed-Up-With-Demonstrators Columns, Royal Winter Fair columns, CNE columns, Cute-Sayings columns and, of course, Our-Readers-Write columns. The Star is quite flexible about these requirements, I was told. "Don't worry about deadlines," they told me. 'But get off a Nostalgia, you know, maybe six times a year. And keep the Letters column down to one a month."

Here's your chance

I made notes on these requirements, and even pinned up a little schedule on my bulletin board. The Autumn Column was supposed to be completed two weeks ago. But what with one thing and another, I just didn't get to it.

To avoid further slip-ups later on, I've decided to include all four Seasons Columns in today's offering. That way, I won't find myself in the idiotic position of scrambling to complete my column on the verdant summer pastures and the good old lazy days down by the Palace Pier at a time when the leaves are starting to turn. Please clip these and file for future reference:

AUTUMN: The timeless cycle of renewal and change is stealing into our souls once again, as the melancholy onset of autumn enfolds Toronto in a russet mantle that forebodes the approaching winter.

Will end of summer be the end of us? Those lines flickered across my mind as I strolled through the deepening drifts of leaves in High Park the other day. Mortality! Breathes there a man who has not strolled beneath the gray, lowering skies of fall, and failed to think sere thoughts? Mortality!

The Wisdom of a Mother

And yet, I thought, there is Wisdom here. Beneath the heavy manacing clouds, amid the rustling presence underfoot of last summer's glory. For just as Life assumes a more serene rhythm, a more luminous tranquility in the later years, so does Mother Nature reserve her most extravagant displays to herald the approaching end. What colors! I thought. Indeed, what mortal artist could rival Mother Nature's palette?

WINTER: The timeless cycle of renewal and change is stealing into our souls once again, as King Winter tightens his icy grip on Toronto.

Will it ever end? I asked myself the other day, as I shuffled on snowshoes through the deepening, crystalline snowdrifts of High Park. The world seemed dead. Naked branches etched themselves against the gray, lowering skies of winter, like gnarled hands lifted in supplication. Even the frozen expanse of Grenadier Pond, so often the jocund scene of winter festivities, seemed like a blank gray eye, staring upward into an unanswering cosmos.

And yet . . . I thought . . . and yet: there is Hope here, and amid the merciless winds and frozen landscape! For if winter comes, can spring be far behind? Those immortal lines flickered across my mind like some small hibernating animal. And just then the pitiless wind rent the scudding clouds, and the watery evening sun broke through, bathing the frozen castles in a pale majesty of pink . .

Oh! The glory of it all!

SPRING: It happened yesterday. The timeless cycles of renewal and change comes tripping elfin-like into our souls once again, as the first harbingers of the season of rebirth make their presence known in Toronto.

There I was strolling in hip-waders through High Park. The sky was gray and menacing. Patches of soot-streaked snow lay sullenly on the sodden ground. The ice on Grenadier Pond has broken into jagged shards, like the fractured iris of some demented eye, staring upwards into the cosmos. This, I thought to myself, is truly the winter of our discontent.

And then it happened. There beside the footpath, peeping impertinently from the brown and sodden earth, was a purple snowdrop! And beside it, as though sheltering in its pristine aura, was the season's first robin – a cocky, plump, strutting fellow! He seemed oblivious of the fact that it was only May 23, and that Old King Winter's icy grip still holds sway in Toronto . . .

SUMMER: Their skin is brown, these bare-armed girls on King St. in their skimpy summer frocks, and I'm reminded once again of the timeless cycle of . . .

The hell with it. Write it yourself. And isn't it time you put some anti-freeze in the rad?

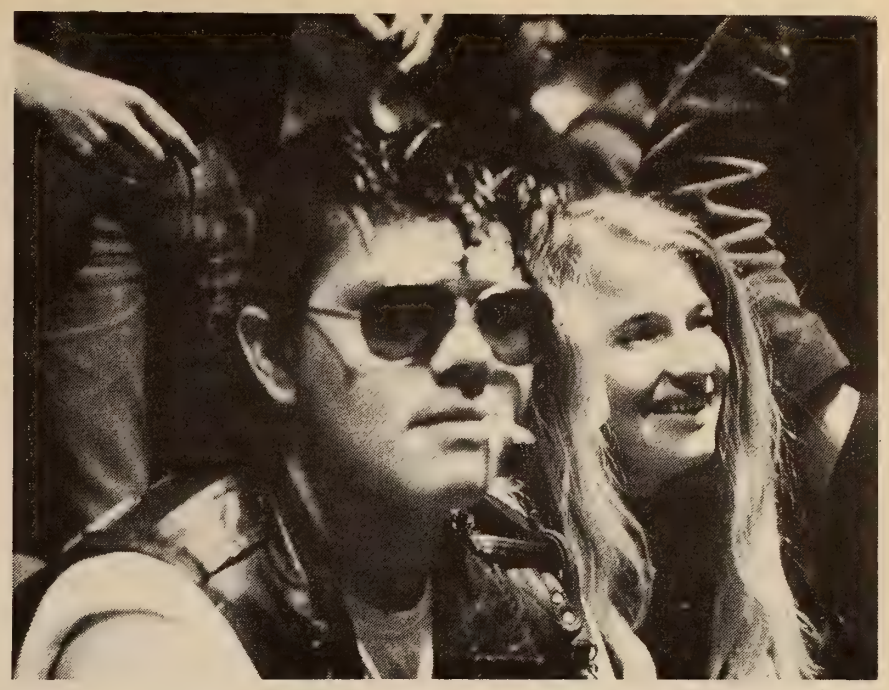
Kristofferson

"He's a poet,
He's a prophet...
He's a walking contradiction
Partly truth and partly fiction
Taking every wrong direction
On his lonely way back home"
- The Pilgrim: chapter 33

These lines are drawn from a cut on the latest album by Kris Kristofferson who will be performing here on November 28. Kristofferson is himself a walking contradiction who has taken every wrong direction on the lonely way to his place as today's leading song writer and singer - what New York Times Magazine describes as "his position of spiritual leader of the growing underground folk-country writers in Nashville. His pre-stardom career includes a Rhodes scholarship, a degree at Oxford, two unpublished novels, five years in the army as a helicopter pilot, a period in Nashville of digging ditches, emptying ashtrays, and tending bar.



In 1969, his break came when Roger Miller recorded his song "Me and Bobby McGee" Since then, Kristofferson has composed a number of hits "For the Good Times", "Sunday Mornin' Comin' Down", "The Taker". His own recording of "Lovin' her was Easier", is currently popular.

For his overall contribution, he was chosen Songwriter of the Year, by the Nashville Songwriter's Association, in 1971. "Sunday Mornin' Comin Down" was selected Song of the Year by the Annual Country Music Association awards. Kristofferson's appeal is much greater than that which is generally associated with country music. Paul Hemphill, New York Times writer explains: "The term "country" is used advisedly, of course, bearing in mind that we are in the midst of a period when the distinctions separating all types of popular music are being blurred. Still, you can call Kristofferson's best stuff country, using the term loosely, because the thing that makes it go is a basic simplicity and a tight, simple story line aimed straight to the gut".

Further indication of his universal appeal is a Cashbox album review of "The Silver Tongued Devil and I", Kristofferson's latest album: "Kris Kristofferson is the most contemporary writer currently in the music industry. His songs are pieces of dreams realized. His delivery, honest, sincere and right to the point".

In short, listening to Kristofferson is easier than anything you'll ever do again. Find out, Sunday, November 28.

GREASE ! ! !

solman

by Dick Loney

What can one say about a Queen's concert which was enthusiastically and favourably received by those who have every right to be rewarded with suitable entertainment for their price of admission? That satisfaction had been achieved for the paying customers was evidenced in the standing ovations leading to three encores by the stars of the show – the twelve man satiric-ensemble named after the background chant of one of their prime numbers-Sha Na Na.

Somehow, in spite of the reception of Sha Na Na, they evoked a slickness, a taste of a group programmed through countless performances, which detracted from the overall effect that these New York City rockers presented.

That is not to say that in their field they can be equalled: either in their outright satiric mockery of the Great Groups of the Fifties and Sixties; or in the perfection of choreographic stage techniques. Since their first national exposure in the Woodstock documentary Sha Na Na have certainly gained much in their vocal art and in achieving a distinctive background music that can mock such divergent styles as Jerry Lee Lewis's pumping piano on "Whole Lotta Shakin'" (Sept. '57), or gently poke fun at the sacharrine Don and Phil Everly rendition of "Walk Right Back" (March '61).

Sunday's second show revealed that Sha Na Na have extended their "art" beyond the mere imitation of the lead vocal and background "dip dip dip dip's" and "sha na na na, Sha na na na na na's" of "Get A Job", into an auditory and visual potrait of Little Anthony and the Imperials bending and swaying and chanting their way through "Tears On My Pillow" (Oct. '58). The similarity between Sha Na Na's version of "Teenager In Love" and that by originators Dion DiMucci and the Belmonts (from May 1959), is sufficient grounds for a gigantic musical plagiarism suit!

From their spirited opening selection "Get A Job", until their third encore "Lovers Never Say Goodbye", Sha Na Na pilfered the Golden Years of Rock n' Roll to come up with a selection of eighteen songs ranging from the gold lame version of Elvis' "Jailhouse Rock" to the hilarious spoof of the animated Ventures' guitar solo on "Walk Don't Run". Bridging these "Golden Years", from "Shake Rattle and Roll" of July '55, to "Blue Moon" of April '61, Sha Na Na displayed considerable virtuosity and versatility in lead-singers and soloists. The three cavorters in gold-sequined jump suits usually held the attention at the centre of the stage, but one willowy-limbed individual was consistently flexing non-existant biceps to the amused delight of the Queen's audience.

The soloist on "Yakkety-Yak" (the Coasters July '58), was nattily-attired in plain brown pants, sneakers and four-day old undershirt. But neither his abundant poundage nor his B.O. proved any impediment to his making the sax run through all the notes in the chromatically-fractured scale that served rock sax soloists on all those early rock numbers which invariably relied on a saxaphone bridge to expand the song to its conventional three-minute duration.

The singing on Sha Na Na's slower numbers–notably "Lovers Never Say Goodbye" and "Teen Angels"--so precisely mimicked the originators that one was tempted to forget that this was satire–in a musical vein. The one failing was perhaps the fact that a viewer had the feeling that if something upset the continuity of their finely choreographed show, pandemonium would reign and dancers and guitarists might collide in some stage catastrophe resulting in electrocution, or at least dislocation of limb caused by excessive grease-spots that resulted from constant hair-combings by our greasy friends.

Indeed, when M.C. Greg Stewart of CK-WS Radio-T.V. exhorted the audience to try to call back Sha Na Na for yet a fourth encore, at the conclusion of Show No. 1, he was mildly reprimanded by a Sha Na Na spokesman who claimed that they "never did any song after 'Lovers Never Say Goodbye' ", and would he please refrain from making the group look bad.

Anyone in attendance realizes the group never "looked bad", but perhaps they did appear a little mechanical, over-rehearsed, or unresponsive to the audience's appeal for a bit more show than the strict one hour's fare that constituted Sha Na Na's half of the evening's festivities.

In contrast, the way that the supporting act-Calgary's Stampeders-- responded to audience participation with their performance was a sight to be seen to be believed.

After witnessing a mass exodus in the middle of an outstanding Byrd's concert some two years ago, and being appalled by the rude actions of members of a Queen's audience during a Lightfoot concert (when the applause accorded Big Gord was sparse, and given seemingly out of convention as opposed to appreciation for musical services rendered) the greeting for this Canadian group was as re-assuring as it was spontaneous.

Perhaps all of those concert-goers who were inclined to leave their hands on a shelf at home with their Tricolor have all thankfully graduated, or gone on to apprentice at some enormous undertaker's establishment–whatever the case, the audience for the second show (and for the first, as reports go) of Stampeders—Sha Na Na was one displaying unquestioned spontaneity and a verve of appreciatory-response unparalleled in a tradition of Queen's-audience indifference. Soon word will out, and rumours will spread that Queen's audiences are responsive and appreciative, and maybe some day groups will actually look forward to playing here!

The Stampeders did it with the most common ingredients--a smattering of a couple of hits: "Carry Me", and "Sweet City Woman"–a spoof on superstars singing a particular hit song (You Keep Me Hanging On)--and a singalong which pitted one half of the audience against the other in a contest of singing prowess. There was almost too much patter between the diminutive drummer Kim Berly, and bassman and principle showman (in white Buckskins) Ronnie King, but musically, for a three-man group they put out a big sound, if at times their mikes were rather distorted on the shouter numbers (apparently they had extensive equipment difficulties during the first show, so that explains their audio failings).

Third member, and lead guitarist Richard Dodson writes most of the Stampeders material, and after launching into their current release "Devil You,', two of his compositions were featured--"Stick By You", and "Johnny Lightning". One of the highlites of their show had to be the extended version of the Ray Stevens-Coasters hit "Along Came Jones", and the mileage they got out of this old rock chestnut was surprising.

If you have a good thing going, the consensus is generally "Don't knock it"-but it is rather perplexing to consider the effect that bass-player King's grade six humour had on this astute gathering of university students. Groups like the Byrds should take note: next time here, insert a few Saturday morning cartoon-type anecdotes into your act, and you'll wow 'em at the oil thigh'd Halls of Queen's! But then, the Guess Who's performance at last year's Science Concert was a rather mechanical re-run of all their hits and album offerings, and they were greeted with generous applause! It's hard to figure!

Suffice it to say, Stampeders did a standout job, especially in view of their deficiency of members, and Sha Na Na gave us what we expected–Rock satire, in a somewhat rigid framework of presentation. And, wonder of wonders, the concert was only one hour late–surely a new Queen's record!

Ottawa freaks over leaks

OTTAWA — Reacting with shock and embarrassment, the federal government Tuesday launched an investigation into the leak of a confidential cabinet document on foreign domination of the Canadian economy to a Montreal newspaper.

External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp told reporters the government would call in the RCMP, if necessary, to get to the bottom of what is seen as the most serious security breach since Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau took office in 1968.

The investigation, in effect, puts every member of the Trudeau cabinet, their closest aides and secretaries under suspicion. It also raises new questions among opposition critics about the extent of Trudeau's control over the cabinet and the Privy Council office, which organizes cabinet proceedings.

Sharp said publication of a text of the cabinet document by the Montreal Gazette yesterday was "far more serious" than the Canadian Forum magazine's publication Friday of a version of the Gray report on foreign ownership of the economy.

The Gray report was a study prepared by civil servants for cabinet consideration, while the document published yesterday was an actual record of cabinet proceedings, which are supposed to be guarded with the utmost secrecy.

Hundreds of civil servants could have seen the Gray report, but only the members of Trudeau's 29-man cabinet plus a handful of aides, advisors and civil servants had direct access to the cabinet document, Sharp said.

The document, dated July 29, says cabinet agreed in principle to the main Gray report recommendation that a screening agency should be set up to oversee proposed foreign takeovers of Canadian corporations.

CANADA

OTTAWA — Loans to students under the Canada Student Loans plan will be raised from a maximum of $1,000 a year to a maximum of $1,400. The most any one student can borrow in total will be raised to $9,800 from $5,000.

The federal Government guarantees the bank loan and pays the interest on it for college students who need the assistance to continue their full-time studies. Students are expected to begin repayments six months after the end of their studies.

Thirty-seven per cent of all full-time post secondary students in nine provinces were currently benefiting from the program.

Since 1964, he said, 740,000 loans have been made totalling $480-million. The plan is expected to cost the federal Government $30-million in the current year.

HALIFAX — The Liberal Government of Premier Gerald Regan retained its majority position in the Nova Scotia Legislature as a result of two by-elections Tuesday.

The Liberals gained one of two seats, increasing their majority in the 46-seat House to two over the combined Progressive Conservative and New Democratic Party opposition.

Both seats —Kings West and Queens— were previously held by the Conservatives.

NEW YORK — Canada has been excluded from the vast National Hockey League expansion program which is expected to total 24 teams by the end of 1979.

The approval last week of Atlanta and Long Island NHL franchises for the 1972-73 season is the prelude for what one NHL owner describes as the Americanization of pro hockey.

"I approved this latest expansion," said Philadelphia Flyers' president Ed Snider, "because I want hockey to become the national sport of the United States."

KINGSTON - A driver escaped prosecution on a charge of refusing to submit to a breathalyzer test because the judge held that the man was in such a state of intoxication when apprehended that he was unable to understand the order to submit to the test.

The driver was convicted on a charge of impaired driving, however, and was fined $250 and prohibited from driving for nine months.

MONTREAL - The Quebec government will change its method of making French the working language of the province from gentle persuasion to "direct intervention in industry," Cultural Affairs Minister Francois Cloutier said Tuesday.

Cloutier said his department will use a $250,000 grant from the French government and $1,100,000 of the province's money to install "strike forces of linguistic specialists in the Montreal and Qebec City areas.

The specialists would go from company to company setting up programs to switch offices and factories over to the use of French, he said.

KINGSTON - The Santa Claus parade is this Saturday, starting at the Kingston Shopping Centre at 10 a.m. and proceeding down Princess St.

It will be nearly as big as Toronto's, held last week.

OTTAWA - The 10 provincial premiers ganged up against Ottawa yesterday to demand greater consultation on the economic management of the country -- particularly on how to reduce unemployment.

All the premiers, meeting in closed session here, supported either totally, or to a large degree, a proposal by Ontario's William Davis for establishment of a joint federal-provincial economic committee.

The premiers were meeting with Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau at the first day, Monday, of the long-awaited federal-provincial conference to discuss unemployment and the economy.

They claimed Ottawa, acting by itself, has badly mismanaged the economy, creating unnecessary unemployment, and that Finance Minister Edgar Benson's optimistic reports about the overall state of the economy are unfounded.

ONTARIO - Bell Canada telephone operators in Ontario and Quebec are voting overwhelmingly in favor of strike action, which was legal anytime after midnight Wednesday.

Last week, the association, whose members now average $95 a week in the top-rated pay zones, rejecting a conciliation board's recommendations for two pay increases, of $10 and $9 an hour, over a 26-month contract.

In late October, before the board presented its report, the telephone operators staged wildcat walkouts .

OTTAWA - Union leaders of striking letter carriers asked their members to go back to work Wednesday while they discuss the current post office dispute with Postmaster-General Jean-Pierre Cote.

James Mayes, national vice-president of the Letter Carriers Union of Canada, said late Tuesday afternoon that the response from striking carriers seemed to favor a return to work for one day at least "to see what the reaction of the minister will be."

Tuesday, groups of letter carriers were continuing the series of 24-hour strikes that have hit areas of Ontario and the Maritimes.

Tuesday's walkouts involved about 700 letter carriers in Ontario, including 194 in London, 184 in Windsor, 110 in St. Catharines and about 100 in Toronto. Another 500 inside workers, sorters and handlers did not report for work at post offices hit by the walkouts.

THE WORLD

PORT HURON, Mich. - Harlem Globetrotters, basketball's international goodwill ambassadors, refused to make an appearance for a scheduled exhibition game here Tuesday.

Elliott I. Goodman, a Chicago lawyer who acts as bargaining agent for the Globetrotter Players' Union, said the team is on strike against management over "bad working conditions."

WASHINGTON - The Washington heeadquarters of the Communications Workers of America has given its blessing to the withdrawal of its 4,000-member Canadian section so that it can establish a national communications union in this country.

The move is believed to be unprecedented in the relations between parent international unions and their Canadian sections.

GENEVA - China scored two impressive diplomatic victories here yesterday -- without even trying.

First GATT, the major trade organization, withdrew Taiwan's observer status.

Second, the International Labor Organization (ILO) moved towards expelling Taiwan as a full member and inviting China to join.

In neither case had Peking indicated even a remote interest in joining the two organizations.

The U.S alone fought against the two decisions.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa - Many white South Africans are increasingly questioning the amount of personal freedom and liberty they really possess.

Their anxiety has deepened following a new, big anti-subversion drive by the South African security police and the conviction on three charges under the sweeping Terrorism Act of the Anglican dean of Johannesburg, Very Rev. Gonville ffrench-Beytagh.

Liberal and moderate circles here fear that in its efforts to contain Communist subversion and militant black nationalism, racially segragated, white-ruled South Africa may be heading toward totalitarianism.

JUNEAU Alaska - Alaska's commissioner of fish and game says his department's perliminary observations at Amchitka Island indicate between 300 and 800 sea otters may have been killed by the U.S underground nuclear blast on the island Nov. 6.

Wallace Noerenberg said Monday a department biologist responsible for studying the Aleutian island discovered "quite a credibility gap" in reports on animals kills by the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission.

About pages 6,7

The pictures on pages 6 and 7 are of the remains of St. Mary's convent on the corner of Bagot and Johnson St., a building which was considered to have no historical value until it was decided to tear it down.

Demolition began in July, 1970, because the building was declared a fire hazard, and after the Notre Dame sisters, who own the building, had been assured by city council that no one was interested in preserving it. However, demolition was halted last fall when city council changed its mind, then began again, only to be halted last summer when some citizens decided the 150-year-old building was, after all, of historical interest. All that remains of it is shown on the centre spread.

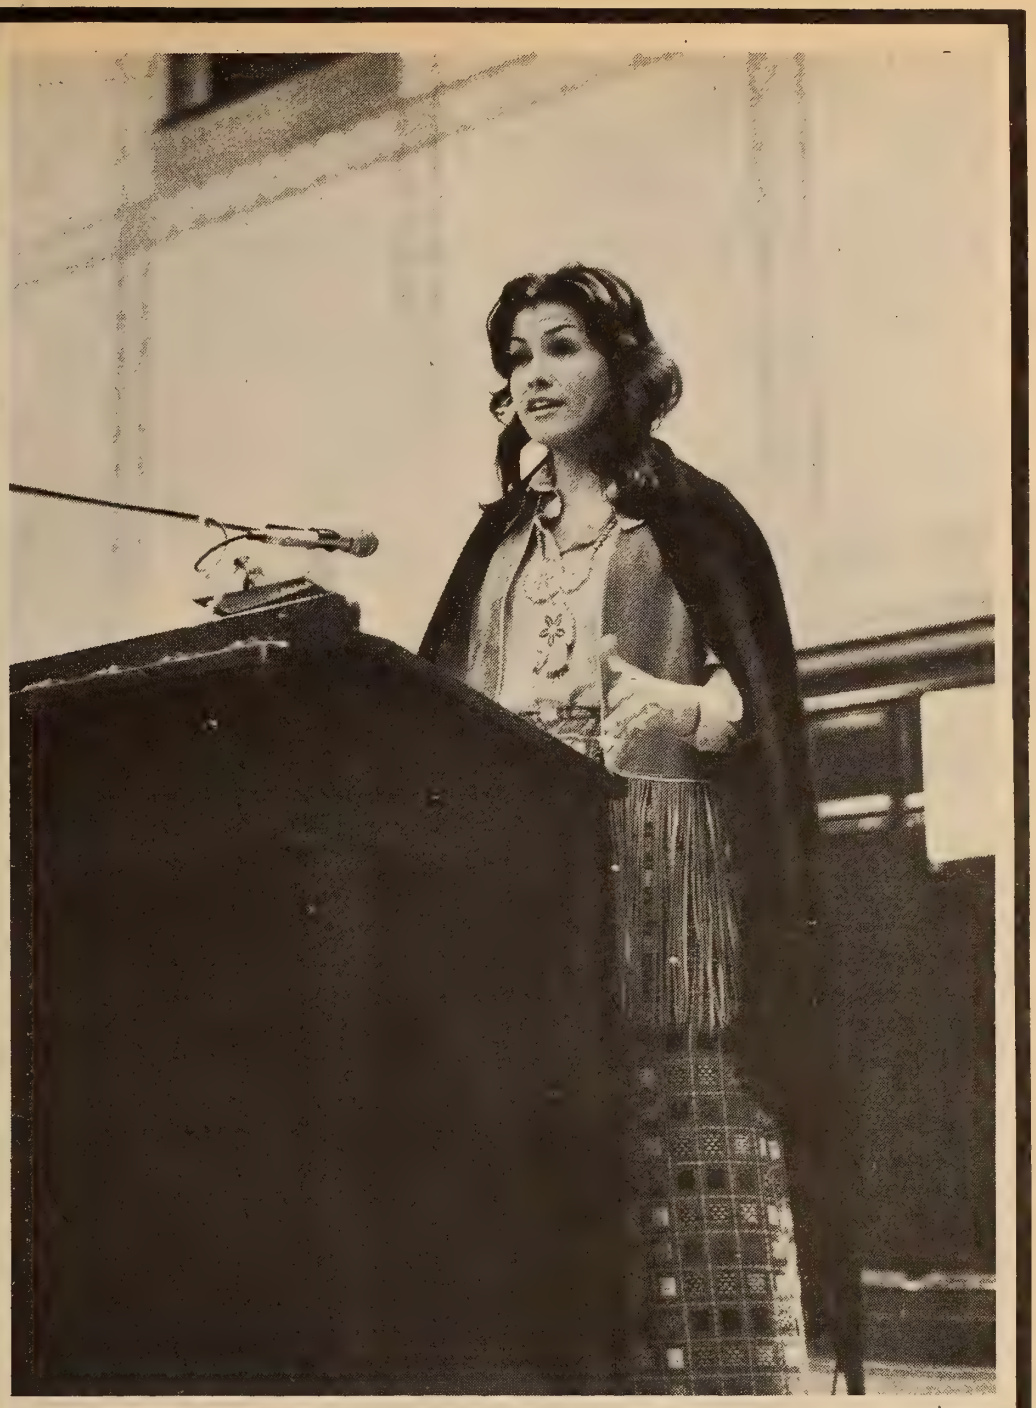
Correction: coed



The Journal got some numbers wrong when we printed the coed residence referendum results on Friday.

The important numbers were right: that women gave the proposal a 65 per cent majority, and men 89 per cent. But when we broke down the men's results by year, we got it mixed up.

First year men favoured the proposal 488 to 61, for 89 per cent. Upper-year men had about half a percentage point more, voting 264 yes and 30 no.

Sorry.

KAHN-TINETA HORN SPEAKS AT QUEEN'S

by Mary O'Rourke

"I've discovered in my research over the last eight years that Indians are different," said Kahn-Tineta Horn, speaking on Indian rights at Grant Hall on Thursday. She went on to outline her career as an Indian activist and spokeswoman over recent years.

Miss Horn, a Mohawk from the Caughnawaga reserve near Montreal, first came into the public eye eight years ago when she was voted Miss Indian Princess by the National Indian Council. Her political career began three months later when she discarded the title upon discovering that the National Indian Council was just "a private real estate corporation" run by white men. Since then, she has also won the position of executive director of the Indian Legal Defence Committee.

Since Indians are different, Miss Horn said, so are their problems, but whites aren't prepared to recognize this fact: "No matter what I say, I'm criticized for it." But this has proved, if anything, an incentive, she said. She speaks out for Indians on issues including health, education, employment, welfare, prejudice and persecution, often making officials' hackles rise.

Miss Horn started with the health problem eight years ago, when she tried to get Indian health authorities to reeducate Indians to their traditional diet. She maintains that milk, a virtual religion with white people, is detrimental to Indians; reduction of supplies to Indians, at her request, has produced a significant lowering of the incidence of respiratory troubles, tuberculosis and infant death. Further dietary reduction would include a drastic cut in the amount of carbohydrates, which Miss Horn says are responsible for early puberty among Indians - and, in turn, such problems as unwanted pregnancy and an increased number of school dropouts. As for a return to traditional diet, Miss Horn reports that the Mohawks were cannibals, a fact which she suggests has interesting possibilities.

Birth control, however, is not an issue among Indians: "It's you white people who are responsible for the population explosion. We're only two per cent of the population, and we want birth control kept away from Indians so we can catch up with you."

Many of the current problems Miss Horn deals with as director of the Legal Defence Committee result from the high incidence of urban migration among Indians. Because they are not accustomed to the entirely different city way of life, she said, tremendous problems can arise.

"You just can't housebreak an Indian; he is an outdoors man first, and will readily abandon his job, instead of sticking to it for forty years like a white man!" Miss Horn predicts great problems for Vancouver and Toronto, and slightly less for Winnipeg, with the lack of employment and organization to deal with the increasing Indian migration.

She turned for a moment to compare the Indians' struggle for equality with that of American blacks. "They call themselves blacks; I still call them negroes, because that's what I've always called them. We have more important things to quibble about than what we're called." She doesn't think negroes have achieved much, particularly by the use of violence, and said many Indians are against them.

"Our cause shouldn't be compromised, mixed with or confused with any others. We're the original landlords of this country and we've been reduced to five per cent of what we were, while our tenant oppressors have increased a hundred fold. Everyone's a racist, but we're not hypocritical about it."

She added, "The strength we Indians have is our disorganization. The white man has been trying to wipe us out for centuries, but we were never united in one place long enough for them to get us." She stressed that this is still the basic practical philosophy of the Indian organizers: they're not going to tell white men how they're organizing.

Miss Horn described triumphantly the violent and heated battles in which she has engaged in recent years. Her present crusade is against governmental failure to oust white squatters from Indian reserves. The government justifies several such cases under the Canadian Bill of Rights, saying that although under the Indian Act an Indian woman gives up her rights as an Indian when she marries a white man, this constitutes sexual discrimination under Canadian law, and therefore the woman can retain her right to live on the reserve with her husband.

To prove her point, Miss Horn has turned both her wrath and a legal action against her own sister, who is married to a white man and lives on the Caughnawaga reserve. The action, which is coming to trial in December, technically is against the Queen under the Indian Act, requesting removal of the offending Mr. Pickapitch, Miss Horn's brother-in-law. It has landed in the Queen's lap, Miss Horn said, because there is so much buck-passing in the government that both the minister of justice and the attorney-general have ignored her frequent requests to oust Pickapitch, and thus forced her to go over their heads.

Another addition to what she calls her batting average was the destruction of the Chretien White Paper advocating changing the reserves into municipalities, which would incur huge tax burdens. Miss Horn, heckling Indian affairs minister Jean Chretien in Ottawa the day he introduced his paper, was the first to denounce it. She subsequently succeeded in gathering enough support to get it defeated.

She prides herself on having put a curse on the ill-fated Toronto Telegram after an altercation with a 210-pound editor, which resulted in an assult charge and a $100 fine. And she suggested that Cornwall, Ontario, is not doing so well since she won five charges arising from the battle over Indians' Jay Treaty rights to cross the international border there freely.

Getting back to Indian proglems, Miss Horn warned that the urban problem represents a big bill coming up in welfare costs if white men insist on alienating Indians from their own reserves by letting white squatters contaminate them.

She said she freely believes in apartheid, and emphatically renounces white-Indian intermarriage and the seductive attractions of white media and society. As for intermarriage, she said love is another white man's invention, contrived by Madison Avenue to sell deodorant.

But to win Indian rights, Miss Horn says she is not interested in violent or illegal action, despite her previous brushes with the law. What is needed, she says, is what she is trying to provide: Indians' knowledge of their rights, and native lawyers to protect them.

She quoted Chief Dan George's questions about the Indians' plight: "Do you know what it's like to know you are of no value to society, what it's like to be without pride or confidence in nation, family or self?"

"Sad questions" said Miss Horn, "but I don't have sad answers. I think my record speaks for itself."

Incidentally, she mentioned that George has volunteered to tell the department of Indian affairs that he's the father of the child whose paternity she has refused to reveal.

Miss Horn said Indians are of great value, reminding Canadians that it was they who represented the balance of power in the defeats of the Americans in 1776 and 1812. Since then, she says, white men's history books have championed the great American "melting pot". "Have you noticed an interesting fact? -- all the scum rises to the top!"

In the question period which followed her address, one student asked whether she found any difficulty straddling two cultures in her job. She said that she can cope with the problem only because of her strong faith in the Indian tradition and knowledge of it. Her father, and his father before him, were chiefs, she said, so that her loyalty is deep-rooted.
